To this rigid censorship, and to the air of Siberia, may be attributed the cramped genius of Pouchkin, and the almost silent Mickiewicz: the one has inhabited distant parts of the empire much against his consent, and the latter, a Pole by birth, is somewhat very closely resembling a prisoner in Petersburg or Moscow. Of the former, it is impossible to speak too highly; he has all the vivacity, all the imagination, and all the originality of some of the greatest poets; he is styled by the Russians the Byron of Russia, and is by them believed the greatest poet in existence. To the unfortunate, barbarous country in which he was born, may be attributed the little, the very little knowledge even of his name in more civilized nations; and who, in the name of Allah, would go through the fatigues of learning the Russian language, which out of Russia is never heard, even for the gratification of reading this great poet in his own language? All translations are faint copies of original pictures; and those who have read some of the translations of Shakspeare into French, even by Voltaire, may know the truth of this assertion; but my readers are perhaps not prepared to believe that a Russian poet has translated several of the tragedies of the bard of Avon, and is allowed (by his countrymen) to have surpassed the original. I confess, when I heard this, all my national vanity exhibited itself in a trice; and in spite of the guarded manner in which I had conducted myself, this last communication from the Anacron of Russia was received with a "poh!" which quite startled my northern friend.

Mr. Bowring, in the Russian Anthology, has given translations of the principal Russian poets, in very good English verse, and has not translated, as Lord Byron said was Mr. Hoole's practice, "with a crab-stick." The poets are satisfied with the production, as far as they can understand it; and many gentlemen who have arrogated to themselves the distinguished title of "poet," are pleased to be enrolled in the same work with some very creditable Russian rhymers; but, in general, the Russian poetry is sad trash, merely little songs, and not half so good as the generality of English ballads. There are exceptions—Devzhavin, Boydanovitch, and a thousand other hard names, unknown or forgotten in every other country but Russia. Of the present date are Zhukovsky, Pouchkin, Batinshkof, and a Pole, now a Russian prisoner, Adam Mickiewicz, Wrasemki. The minor songsters are not worth mentioning; but the partial Russian historian, and author of reams of bad poetry, Karamsin, is entitled to a place: he is a pretty flatterer in either prose or verse.

It will be seen by a study of Russian poetry, that the German school has been followed in preference to the rest; so closely followed, indeed, that one might be mistaken for the other. Look at Zhukovsky's "Svetlina," it is nearly, in some parts, word for word, "Leonora;" it ends differently, and begins differently, but the vision is nearly the same, and the ideas decidedly borrowed: it certainly does not merit the eulogiums bestowed upon it by Granville, or Ancelet—the latter translated it into French prose.

Pouchkin is entitled to all praise; and it is much to be regretted that no English author has translated his works. Kasloff, a blind poet, and an enthusiastic admirer of Lord Byron, undertook to translate one of Pouchkin's poems into English verse, and to dedicate it to his lordship. Kasloff told me he had forwarded some of the translations to him, but had not received an answer: the fact is, Byron died about this period, and poor Kasloff's poetry has met the same fate. He was anxious I should see some of the poem, and he forwarded to me the following lines, a pretty fair specimen of the style, measure, and beauty of the original; and when it is considered that Kasloff taught himself English, is as blind as a bat, and his lower extremities paralyzed, it is quite wonderful how his head could have produced any thing half so correct. I give the verses, without the slightest alteration, as sent to me in Kasloff's hand-writing:

"But where is she, Zarena bright,
The star of love, the harem's light?
Alas! she lingers, weeps alone,
Her sweetest dream for e'er is gone:
To her what wretchedness belongs!
No jocund tales, no playful songs.
Like the young pain, whose tender bloom
Was blighted by the tempest's gloom,
So stood that fair and lovely maid,
Ere yet forsaken or betrayed.
Yet still in beauty who can be,
Poor Georg! an slave, compared to thee?
That forehead beamed divinely fair,
As sparkling through the raven hair;
Those eyes, so lovely and so bright,
Are clear as day, and dark as night;
What voice so fondly could impart
The bashful wish of woman's heart?
What form could yield such magic bliss,
Or lips bestow a warmer kiss?
The man who sigh'd within those arms,
How could he dream of others' charms?"

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

TO A CITY PIGEON.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

Stroop to my window, thou beautiful dove!
Thy daily visits have touch'd my love.
I watch thy coming, and list the note
That stirs so low in thy mellow throat,
And my joy is high
To catch the glance of thy gentle eye.

Why dost thou sit on the heated eaves,
And forsake the wood with its freshen'd leaves?
Why dost thou haunt the sultry street,
When the paths of the forest are cool and sweet?
How canst thou bear
This noise of people—this sultry air?

Thou alone of the feather'd race
Dost look unscarred on the human face;
Thou alone, with a wing to flee,
Dost love with man in his haunts to be;
And the "gentle dove"
Has become a name for trust and love.

It is no light chance. Thou art kept apart,
Wisely by Him who has tamed thy heart,
To stir the love for the bright and fair
That else were seal'd in the crowded air;
I sometimes dream
Angelic rays from thy pinions stream.

Come then, ever, when daylight leaves
The page I read, to my humble eaves,
And wash thy breast in the hollow spout,
And murmur thy low sweet music out,
I hear and see
Lessons of heaven, sweet bird, in thee!

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A QUIET MAN.

BY THE SAME.

I WENT to college with but one very decided aversion—the smell of a sick room. With a sanguine temperament and high health, I had once been "laid up" for a winter with a lame knee, and the odors of a physician's appliances, never particularly agreeable, had become associated in my mind with confinement and pain and everything repulsive. I loved the open air with an eccentric affection. Sleeping under a tree, or encamping for the night in the shaft of a quarry, on my mineralizing excursions, were incidents I exulted in. To awake at any time and snuff the morning air gave me a thrill like a release from imprisonment. I lived out of doors.

Accident made me a nurse. My most intimate friend fell ill, and with the caprice of a boy, would submit to no government but mine. I was under the necessity of administering all his medicines, and watching with him, and performing for him the thousand kind offices which the sick demand. He lay in my room a month, and one by one, I insensibly overcame my aversions. The smell of ether and the close air and the sight of disgusting medicines had become at least endurable. The day he got out I was at a loss. Strange as it seemed to me, worn out, and weary, and impatient of it all as I had become, I wished him back again, making the same nervous complaints, and calling upon me for the same recurring services, and querulously refusing every other watcher. From this time I have had an unhealthy passion for scenes of this description. Like all other passions, too, it has sated itself with one degree of misery after another, till now nothing satisfies it but the deepest—death or wild insanity—whatever tries the sufferer most, and demands in the spectator most of sympathy and nerve. I think my heart was never hard, and I am sure that, instead of becoming indifferent to distress, it grows more sensibly alive by every repetition to sympathy and pity—but there is an excitement in the high-wrought circumstances which accompany sickness, which feeds in me a spring of curiosity, which, I cannot but think, is one of the deepest-seated cravings of my nature. Men are nowhere without disguise but in a sick room. The character is nowhere else so tried, the weaknesses so uncovered, the fine godlike under-traits, which it is the way of the world to cover and keep down—disinterestedness and courage, and patience—nowhere else so irresistibly developed. I could never be deceived in a man I had nursed in sickness.

In a body of five or six hundred young men, many of them new to the climate, opportunities were not wanting to indulge such passion to its extent, and I soon became a desirable attendant from my skill and knowledge of the offices so necessary to the patient. I learned a thousand little assiduities, and studied the slight but refreshing changes of position, and could dispose a pillow skilfully, and graduate the light pleasantly to the eye, and relieve, by many an unseen wile, the terrible monotony and weariness of disease. I had in my memory, too, stores of poetry and romance, and no one can tell, who has not been so attended, how grateful it is to a mind weary with feeding on itself, and crowded upon with sickening images, to be stolen away by a winning narration to the land of faery, and have the self-sated sympathies diverted to the light and shadow of the beautiful changes in a tale. How often have I, by a touching story, drawn tears which I knew had in them more healing than medicine! It is easy, for the heart is tender in sickness; and no one can tell how pleasant it is, for, tears when the eyes are hot, and the brain iron-bound, as it seems to be, with the dryness of fever, exceed the freshness of water.

In the pursuit of such a passion I have naturally met with many distressing scenes, not only in sick rooms, but in all places where human nature is brought into extremity. There is here and there one in my memory, the singularity of which may possibly excuse the painfulness of narration.

I sat one cold night in January, watching with a senior who was insane. He was otherwise in perfect bodily health, but had been confined now a week with a periodical madness to which he was subject, and which was hereditary in his family. He was a man of powerful muscular frame, gentlemanly, and full of spirit; and, with the passionate gesture and the wild energy of expression in his dark eyes and fine countenance when the fit was on him, he was the handsomest creature I ever looked upon.

It was two o'clock in the morning. The moon shone bright out of doors, and the late noises in the college rooms had all ceased, and the night was as still as death. I was reading the Book of Martyrs. The chapel clock startled me as it struck two, and I rose from a harrowing description of impalement, and walked to the window to collect my nerves. The clear sparkling snow lay like fairy-work over the beautiful common, and the trees, laden with the feathery crystals, looked like motionless phantoms in the moonlight. I could see down into the town, and far along the streets on either side of the common, and there was not a figure to darken the white sidewalks, and I listened till my ear was pained with silence, and could not hear even a dog's bark. I turned from the window with an undefined feeling of dread, and looking at my patient, replenished the fire, and sat down again to my book. I had read perhaps half a page, when he rose suddenly in the bed, and pushing the long hair from his eyes, looked at me steadily. I thought he was dreaming. His mouth had a fixed curl of hatred, and the whole expression of his face was terrible. I sat still, and looked him fixedly in the eye. His fingers were working like a man's who is feeling for a weapon, and he was drawing his feet almost imperceptibly under him, as if preparing for a spring. The unearthly fiendishness of his look at this moment is indescribable. The glare of the bright fire on his face, his tangled hair, his white night-dress, and the utter malignity of his set teeth and frowning brows, might have shaken stronger nerves than mine. I was convinced that the least motion on my part would be followed by an instantaneous spring; and in the hope of looking him down with the steadiness of my gaze, I sat as motionless as a statue, with my eyes still fixed upon him. The three or four minutes thus occupied gave me time to collect myself. I was slender, and by no means remarkable for my personal activity, and in the event of a struggle I knew I stood but little chance. I thought of shouting for assistance, but even if I had been heard by the sound sleepers in the rooms about me, such noises are too common in college to excite anything but a curse on the rioter. I thought I would speak to him. In a quiet and pleasant tone I called him by his name, and asked him what he was going to do?

"Kill you!" was the brief answer.

"For what?"

"Because," said he, speaking with his teeth shut as he rose upon one knee, and grasped the pillow firmly, "I have found you alone, and I know you!"

The next moment he sprang into the middle of the floor, and with a stealthy and rapid tread, like a tiger's, glided to the door, and locked it. I did not move from my position, except to place my feet in an attitude to rise instantly. He approached slowly, putting down one foot firmly after the other, as if to be certain that the floor was strong, until he stood close before me. The light-stand was between us, holding two candles and the large quarto from which I had been reading. I still kept my eyes on him without moving a muscle, and once or twice he quailed under my gaze, and looked aside. I was beginning to hope he would abandon his intention, when, with a single motion of his arm, he swept away the stand, and sprang upon me. The violence of the shock overthrew me, and we fell to the floor. His knees were upon my breast and his fingers at my throat in an instant. For a minute I struggled hard to throw him off, but with his powerful frame he sat as firmly as a rock, choking me nearly to strangulation with the closeness of his grasp. As a last hope I attempted to shout. Exhausted as I was, my feeble "help!" was scarce louder than a whisper, and I felt my eyes flash, and the blood crowd into my head with a terrible sense of suffocation. In the agony of the struggle I threw out my hand into the fire near which I had fallen, and, with an instinctive desperation, seized a handful of burning coals, and held them for a minute to his side. They burned through the night-dress instantly, and he sprang to his feet with a curse, leaving me on the floor with scarce the power to move a limb. The next moment the tutor, who had been disturbed by the noise of my fall, burst into the room, and with a singular habit of obedience, the madman slunk to his bed, and covering up his head lay as quiet as a child till morning.

It is the custom in some parts of New-England to watch by the dead night and day till interment. I was once called upon for this service. A young girl whom I had known died in my neighborhood, and I was requested to sit up for the night in an adjoining room with two female relatives of the deceased. It was my office to go into the room frequently where the corpse lay, and attend to the lights which were burning at the foot of the bed; and with this occupation and reading aloud, the night passed without much weariness till twelve. About that time my companions, two stout country girls, fell asleep. I threw aside my book, and walked from one room to the other, looking out sometimes upon the night, and sometimes stopping to gaze on the ghastly features of the corpse. There was no moon, but the stars looked near and bright, and the absolute silence and the sweet spiciness of the air combined with the solemnity of my vigil in giving the night almost a supernatural beauty. I began to feel a kind of pleasure in the powerful contrast of the scene. I turned from the still and deathly face lying in its revolting fixedness before me, to look out upon the starry and living splendor of the night, and breathe the life-giving moisture of the wind, and inhale the delicious scents of the flowers; and when the strange feeling of saturation and insufficiency which accompanies natural beauty came upon me, I returned, with a pleasure I could not understand, to peruse once more the rigid features of the corpse, and muse on the terrible nature of death.

It requires intense thought to believe death real. To look upon human lips formed and colored like our own, and wearing their familiar expression, and comprehend fully that they never will stir again—to gaze on eyelids, softly and naturally closed, and believe that they will never again lift from the eye—to peruse a forehead marked with character and thought, the hair parted on it as if with its own volition and taste, and know that the curious organs beneath it will never work more—these are convictions as difficult as they are painful to the mind, and such as are rarely attained by the ordinary gazers on the dead.

And it seems to me that it is not the pain of dying, nor the dread of corruption, nor any of the common horrors of death that make it most terrible. These are circumstances, fearful, it is true, but such as the courage of a strong heart may meet. But it is that nature will survive—that our friends will live on without us—that the stars will sparkle and revolve, and the flowers come in their seasons, and the ambitious and the pleasure-loving seek fame and pleasure—and not a star's ray be interrupted, nor a leaf fall, nor a human foot slacken in its pursuit because we are not with them. It is this leaving us behind—this thrusting away and forgetting us, like broken instruments, that touches us. To me, at least, death would lose half its terrors with this thought. If I could escape it in any way, my happiness would be tenfold. If my spirit would pass into a flower and consciously live on—if I could become a voice and speak my own name, at ever so distant periods, to my friends—even if an urn containing my ashes might lie in a familiar place, and be a pleasant ornament in the house of some one who had loved me, I should be more content. I love this world, and its scenes, and its people, too well to pass willingly away. I know not whither. The thought of a disembodied and spiritual life apart from the tangible objects I have grown to, and the delightful affections I have given and won, is, with all its mystery and beauty, delightful. I would live forever where I am, if it were mine to choose. There is not an evil except death that appals or sickens me. The daylight, and the air, and the interchange of social life, and simple health, are blessings enough, and give me but these, and mankind as they are, and such as the world is abused, I will take it for my portion while it endures.

With such thoughts passing in my mind, I walked away from the corpse to a window in the adjoining room. It opened on a flower-garden, and with my mind excited to the highest pitch, I stood breathing the scented air, and gazing intently on the stars. A sudden noise from the room in which the body lay startled me. It seemed to me like the struggle of animals or the beating of wings. Totally unable as I was in the rapid reflection of the moment to imagine the cause, my courage half failed me. I was about waking my companions, who slept soundly in their chairs, when the thought of their probable fright and uselessness deterred me; and summoning my resolution, I entered the room. Everything was as I left it, but the noise was still there. The corpse lay unmoved, and the candles burnt clear; and though the noise was loud, in the confusion of my senses I stood doubting from what quarter it came. It grew louder, and my hair seemed absolutely to creep. Still louder—and then a plunge—and the fire-board was dashed down, and a large white cat sprang into the room, and was on the corpse in an instant. I had heard of the demoniacal appetite these animals have for the flesh of the dead; but, though it flashed upon me immediately, it was a minute at least before I had sufficient strength to move. She had buried her claws deeply in the cheek and breast, and her white face was smeared with the blood when I seized her. She did not seem to be aware of my approach, and I had grasped her round the throat with both my hands before she took the least notice of me. Her claws were fastened in the sheet, and fearing to pull her off too roughly, I tried to choke her on the spot. The moment my fingers tightened, she sprang out of my hands with a suddenness for which I was not at all prepared, and flew into my face with the fury of a hyena. I succeeded after some struggling in seizing her again, and throwing her to the floor. I held her down with my feet till she struggled. A wild beast could not have shown a more desperate ferocity. My two fellow watchers, strangely enough, slept through it all. I went to the well, without waking them, and washed the blood from my hands; and composing the sheet as decently as I could over the desecrated body, I resumed my walk and my excited thoughts till morning.

I once had a friend who could never sleep at the full of the moon. If it was a clear night he would draw the shutters, and stop every crevice in the windows to exclude the light, and pace the floor with a most troubled face till daylight. Sometimes it would seem too much to bear, and he would go out and ride furiously for hours, or row his skiff over the lake as if his life depended on his swiftness. While we were students together, I once made a christmas visit with him at his father's, a wealthy landholder on one of the western lakes. The full of the moon came round, and it was as cold as mid-winter. It was fine sleighing, but the broad waters about us had frozen completely over since the fall of the snow, and had been safely crossed by adventurous passengers.

As I lay one night, wakeful with some uneasy thoughts, I heard my friend's voice in the next room, talking passionately with himself. A moment after he came muttering into my chamber, and, evidently supposing me asleep, took down his skates, which hung in the closet, and left the house. I dressed myself hastily, and took my own skates, and descending to the shore-edge, found him as I expected, upon the ice. He turned his head as I stopped, but, accustomed to my presence at such times, he did not speak. As I fastened the last buckle around my ankle, he sprang upon his feet, and with the long safety-rod in his hand, (carried always in that part of the country as a security against the holes in the ice,) he shot away down the lake like the wind. We were both tall men and excellent skaters. The ice had frozen in a dead calm, and was without a flaw for miles along the shore; and with a strong westerly breeze directly on our backs, we skimmed it like birds. For the first mile or two I was occupied with the simple exhilaration of the exercise. The extreme polish of the ice sent us forward with very slight exertion at great speed, and it seemed to me as if we shot over the long shadows from the shore with a superhuman swiftness. We kept down, following the curve of the bank, where the water, from the shelter of the land, had frozen smoothest, till I saw by some marks familiar to me that we were ten miles from home. Still my companion led on. His strength seemed unabated, and leaning forward eagerly, he threw out his limbs in long and powerful strides, speaking not a word, nor even turning his head when we passed, as we did occasionally, the glare of a hunter's fire. I began to grow fatigued, but at the same time my interest in the adventure assumed a wildness which I tried in vain to shake off. The extreme rapidity of our motion, the dim haze of the moonlight, the partial distinctness of the naked trees on shore, and, when we crossed a longer shadow than usual, the transparency of the ice, reflecting every star as distinctly as a mirror far beneath us, all combined with the knowledge that I was following one who was wild with a mysterious fear, in exciting and bewildering my imagination. I could not speak to him. My heart rose in my throat at the effort. Another hour we skated on before the wind in silence. My limbs began to grow stiff, and obeyed mechanically and painfully the impulse of motion. Hill after hill went by, and I began to see more rarely the objects with which I had become familiar in my summer excursions. We were getting beyond the point of my most adventurous voyages. The shore grew bolder and wilder, and the fires of the hunters occurred more rarely, and still my companion's speed was unslackened. With my greatest efforts I could not overtake him. He was a better skater than I, and with an instinctive quickness, he instantly apprehended my intention, and sprang on with increased velocity at the attempt. My eyes began to grow dizzy. I have an indistinct remembrance of skating on and on, long after I ceased to feel or notice anything but the necessity for following the figure before me, and I remember nothing more till I was awakened by a rough shake in broad daylight. The embers of a large fire were glowing round a stump near me, my friend lay soundly asleep with his head across my body, and through a break in the trees I could see the broad icy bosom of the lake, stretching away in the clear light of the morning, with a look of almost interminable distance to the opposite shore. It was with some difficulty that I could stir. With the help of the hospitable hunter who had granted my friend's request for a shelter by his fire, I gained my feet, and after a walk of three or four miles to a farm-house, procured a sleigh, in which, after a cold drive of forty miles, we reached home at noon.

RELICS AND SOUVENIRS.

"Let but the commons hear this testament,
And they would go and kiss dead Cæsar's wounds,
And dip their napkins in his sacred blood;
Yea, beg a hair of him for memory,
And, dying, mention it within their wills,
Bequeathing it, as a rich legacy,

THE doctrine of associations will in a measure explain why an object indifferent in itself may be invested with an extraordinary value, by the fact that it once belonged to some celebrated or beloved place or person. Sceptical and phlegmatic individuals sometimes affect to ridicule this idea; but that the generality of mankind collect such relics with eager avidity and guard them with care, proves the principle from which they derive their importance to be founded in nature. I have often been amused by displays of these imaginary treasures in my circle of acquaintance. Some of them are indeed extremely interesting. A lady, the other evening, indulged me with the sight of a lock taken by herself from the skull of Major Andre at the time of the removal of his remains to Westminster Abbey, by order of the British government. I gazed at it with warm emotions, which were somewhat chilled by an impertinent fellow who remarked that he did not believe the hair had ever belonged to Major Andre any more than to Colonel Pluck, for that the place where the unfortunate young man's bones had been deposited was doubtful. Thus the fine delight rising in my mind made a ludicrous figure by the insinuation, that we were wasting our sorrow upon the remnant of some common clown. As the sentiments connected with this subject are among the most refined gratifications of which the mind is capable, so they are frequently derided by the coarse-minded. It is a sad thing for sensitive persons to fall into the hands of such rough reasoners, for it is a difficult matter to prove the identity of this species of property; and it is truly laughable, it must be confessed, to see a great fellow with tears in his eyes gazing on an old ragged handkerchief which some wag has palmed upon him as the quondam possession of Byron, or a literary old lady boasting of the extra relish of her snuff, erroneously believing that the box is made of a part of Shakespeare's mulberry-tree. It would be a curious subject of amusement, if one could possess some unerring method of testing the truth of the innumerable articles of this kind afloat about society. For although no one values them more highly than myself, when once proven to have sprung from so great an origin, teeming as they do with such a variety of powerful and delicious associations, yet my interest in such exhibitions is often crossed with certain misgivings, which greatly interfere with my pleasure. An esteemed lady sometime ago showed me a tolerably large package which, after the opening of envelopes almost as numerous as the grave-digger's waistcoats in Hamlet, disclosed a single hair of Napoleon, which she cherished as a token of that wonderful man, and could never look at it without strange emotion. I feigned an excess of admiration, being too polite to express my true opinion; but if Napoleon ever wore half the hair handed about as his, he must have had the head of a lion, and Sampson was a fool to him, and I have no doubt there have been canes, snuff-boxes, inkstands, &c. cut out of the aforesaid mulberry-tree sufficient to have built a seventy-four. I have myself seen several swords avouched to have been worn by Columbus at the time of his landing in America; and being once sojourning in a retired village in one of the southern states, imagine my surprise at finding a worthy man coining money, as the expression is, by showing Pompey's head to the wondering natives. My astonishment was somewhat heightened by the fact that I had left another head of the same hero in the Philadelphia museum. Addison, in his tragedy of Cato, has the line, "Great Pompey's shade complains that we are slow," but if it could look down upon the proceedings of the southern museums, I think he would not repeat the assertion.

In this country we are not so rich in these mementos, which may be termed wealth for the mind. Our stock consists mostly of revolutionary relics, of which those emanating from Washington are probably the most valuable. This great and good man, by his wonderful virtue and strength of mind, has shed a lustre not only on his country and human nature, but upon the smallest trifle which appertained to his person or property. How illustrative is this of his fame. A book he has read, would now bear a high price. His very garments are distributed "as a rich legacy" to his friends and relatives. His hat is exhibited in the medical college at Charleston as one of its greatest curiosities, and even a leaf torn from his grave is impressed with the invisible enchantment of his greatness, and arrests the eye, and awakens the imagination of all who behold it. In Great Britain there must be an immense field for the researches of the antiquary. So vast a population has there been compressed within so small a space, such numbers of splendid geniuses in literature, politics, and war, have mingled in the exciting scenes of her history and laid their bones in her soil, that a collection might be there formed which, at least in this country, every one would flock to see. For although nature decrees that the brightest genius must perish soon and pass away, yet the inanimate objects which he has loved during his existence, do not fade so suddenly away, but often come into the possession of such as do not appreciate them. Distance and time give them value. How carelessly would those who dwell in the house with Shakespeare or Milton have destroyed the bits of manuscript which they threw aside, and yet one of them at the present day would be an ornament for the palaces of the greatest among men. A friend of mine has fairly conceived a passion for collecting relics. His bureau was the furniture of a great poet, his cane of a celebrated statesman. He has a looking-glass which once belonged to Jefferson, and an inkstand which he declares Byron used in the composition of one of his best poems. A visit to his chamber is delightful, for at every step you are struck with some agreeable astonishment. You are sitting where Washington once sat. You stir the fire with a poker that has been handled by Dr. Franklin. You take up an edition of Campbell or Rogers, and he tells you the marks were made by the authors, and you prick your finger against a spur worn by Wellington at the battle of Waterloo. It is dangerous to destroy even the most insignificant piece of his paper, for ten chances to one it will turn out to be an original scrap of the Waverley novels or of the declaration of independence. I am told he carries this propensity so far that an imprudent man of celebrity having ventured alone into his presence, he whipped out a pair of scissors and cut off a few inches of his coat-tail by way of a memento. The other day I flung into the fire an old broken stick, which he snatched out with signs of horror, informing me that I had nearly ruined a fragment of one of Captain Parry's boats wrecked in the Polar seas. I cannot but esteem these little conceits not only innocent, but in some degree commendable. They are generally found in dispositions the most amiable and affectionate, and are a pure source of harmless pleasure.

If mementos of individuals who are nothing more to us than they are to all the world, may be so valuable, with what a superior interest must we regard objects which forcibly recall to mind departed relatives and friends. However I may be inclined to smile at the enthusiasm sometimes elicited in one by the relic of a person he never saw, I entertain a kind of sacred respect for emotions, no matter by what aroused, which spring from the recollection of those beings who once mingled familiarly in our everyday occurrences of life, but who are now either absent or dead. There is something beautiful in this clinging of our lacerated affections to every fragment of the wrecked object. It is a pledge of the original excellence of our natures, and conveys an impressive lesson to the sceptic and the misanthrope. What this quality is by which we are attracted towards each other with such delightful and irresistible influence, I cannot attempt to define, but it is directly at variance with selfish impulses. It allures the soul on to noble sacrifices and lofty undertakings, and is a fountain of pleasure in the barren path of the afflicted. It is wonderful with what deep sources of delight nature has invested us, and when wretchedness darkens and howls about us like a tempest, and drives our thoughts tremblingly to the inward world of our own bosoms, how clearly and refreshingly these flow to our lips like sweet cool streams to the thirsty pilgrim. Paradoxical as it may appear, I have thought the great secret of actual happiness was to be found only in the gloomiest passages of anguish, and then only do we learn to truly know ourselves, to read aright the universe, to comprehend what exquisite pains nature has taken to form it and us. The child of prosperity lives and dies without suspecting what a creature of wonder he is. He is full of secret qualities; under the flowery and sunshiny garden of his heart are gems and medicines hidden from his perception. He only sees the surface; but the unfortunate look deeper, test their capacities to endure with a proud though mournful triumph, and discover their latent energies with a delightful surprise. The reveller at the feast drains goblets of the rarest wines, but knows not half the rapture with which the weary laborer poises the "moss-covered bucket" at the well, and drinks its dripping coolness; and he who has never parted with a dear friend, is ignorant of that secret and undefinable joy which diffuses itself through all the soul, while cherishing even the veriest trifle associated with recollections of the distant or the dead. My mind was attracted to this subject by the overlooking, during the late heavy rains, of several old drawers, containing many of these reminiscences. The present external world was so dark and dismal, that I was glad to seize the occasion presented by a pretty extensive collection of keepsakes, to fly back to past times. In the course of this task I was by turns soothed and stung with agreeable and painful recollections. Everything I touched was a history. I sat like an enchanter in the midst of spells. Each one was impressed with an invisible but potent quality to conjure up the scenes and persons of years fled away. Here was a ringlet of soft auburn from a lovely girl now in her grave; here a ring placed on my finger by one whom I only met to part from; here a heap of letters from my father, received at school; a beautiful needlecase, worked by the very fingers of some one I know of—God bless her—whom I shall never see again; and here a chain given me by Fred. F—, a being whose heart is as sound as his head is clear, and whose long absence has never impaired the friendship which bound us to each other in boyhood, when we roved through the woods together, with guns on our shoulders, or paddled our leaky boat across the noble Hudson. While engaged in reverie, thus excited by these and many others of the like, the beating of the rain against the window, and the sound of the tempest as it swept by, mingled with the low crackling of the coals in the grate, formed a kind of lulling music, which came over me with a drowsy pleasure. Leaning my forehead down upon the silken gift of her who, peradventure, has already forgotten what she gave, I fell asleep, and found myself roving through those scenes which in my life have afforded me the greatest satisfaction. With a dream-like indistinctness I was not confined to any particular spot, but sometimes even while rambling along the streets of this city, on turning a corner, I came into a full view of Trenton Falls; and thence, by a sudden wind in the path, I lingered among the softened summer loveliness of the Elysian fields. Everybody whom I had ever loved seemed thronging about me, particularly all whose presents I had been handling. Those who in reality had never met were here knit together in the most agreeable friendship. Some rambled through the woods and gathered fruits; some leaped into a fairy boat, and floated out gently into a glassy stream, blending their voices together in the most delicious music. My parents whispered in my ear words of love and virtue. Then Bonaparte stalked in, bending under a huge load of hair, followed by Columbus with swords stuck through every part of his dress. Washington came in covered with hats, and Pompey with a head under each arm, besides that which he carried on his shoulders. While I was laughing at these oddities, a sudden gust of wind rattled the windows so violently in their casements that it awoke me. As I gathered together my mournful treasury, I could not but smile at the power possessed by these inanimate objects over the mind, in deepening its memories and keeping vividly alive the impressions which might otherwise be entirely washed away by the ceaseless waves of time.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Autobiography of Sir Walter Scott, Bart. One vol. 12mo. p. 221. Philadelphia: Carey and Lea. 1831.

THIS is the third number of the Cabinet Library, and to inform the reader that it is a volume fraught with interest, that it sheds a light upon the private life of one of the most esteemed and extraordinary geniuses of the age, and that it admits us behind the scenes of those beautiful dramas which have charmed all civilized nations, would be altogether superfluous trouble. The mingled modesty, talent, and excellent good sense of this wonderful man require no comment. We are almost amused with the quiet simplicity and unaffected diffidence with which this author mentions himself and his productions.

"I enjoyed a moderate degree of business for my standing, and the friendship of more than one person of consideration efficiently disposed to aid my views in life. The private fortune, also, which I might expect, and finally inherited, from my family, did not, indeed, amount to affluence, but placed me considerably beyond all apprehension of want. I mention these particulars merely because they are true. Many better men than myself have owed their rise from indigence and obscurity to their own talents, which were, doubtless, much more adequate to the task of raising them than any which I possess. Although it would be absurd and ungracious in me to deny that I owe to literature many marks of distinction to which I could not otherwise have aspired, and particularly that of securing the acquaintance, and even the friendship, of many remarkable persons of the age, to whom I might not otherwise have made my way; it would, on the other hand, be ridiculous to affect gratitude to the public favor, either for my position in society, or the means of supporting it with decency, matters which had been otherwise secured under the usual chances of human affairs. Thus much I have thought it necessary to say upon a subject which is, after all, of very little consequence to any one but myself."

Apart from the interest with which we regard every incident connected with the life of Scott, we find scattered profusely over these pages sentences evidently fresh from the experience of a strong-minded man, and which are intrinsically valuable as specimens from an excellent essayist. For example:

"When a friend, whose judgment I respect, has decided, and upon good advice told me, that a manuscript was worth nothing, or at least possessed no redeeming qualities sufficient to atone for its defects, I have generally cast it aside; but I am little in the custom of paying attention to minute criticism, or of offering such to any friend who may do me the honor to consult me. I am convinced that, in general, in removing errors even of a trivial or venial kind, the character of originality is lost, which, upon the whole, may be, that which is most valuable in the production."**

"Lewis had announced a collection, first intended to bear the title of 'Tales of Terror,' and afterwards 'Tales of Wonder,' which last was finally adopted. As this was to be a collection of tales turning on the preternatural, there were risks in the plan of which the ingenious editor was not aware. The supernatural, though appealing to certain powerful emotions very widely sown among the human race, is, nevertheless, a spring which is peculiarly apt to lose its elasticity by being too much pressed on, and a collection of ghost stories is not more likely to be terrible, than a collection of jests to be merry or entertaining."

And also in correcting errors printed in "Medwin's Conversations of Byron," he says,

"There are some parts of this passage extremely mistaken and exaggerated, as generally attends any attempt to record what passes in casual conversation, which resembles, in difficulty, the experiments of the old chemists for fixing quicksilver."

We conclude this article by copying a letter from Monk Lewis to Scott, which will be found amusing to all, and particularly instructive to our young rhymsters.

"Supposed 1799.

"Thank you for your revised 'Glenfinlas.' I grumble, but say no more on this subject, although I hope you will not be so inflexible on that of your other ballads; for I do not despair of convincing you in time, that a bad rhyme is, in fact, no rhyme at all. You desired me to point out my objections, leaving you at liberty to make use of them or not; and so have at 'Frederic and Alice.' Stanza 1st, 'hies' and 'joys' are not rhymes; the 1st stanza ends with 'joys'; the 2d begins with 'joying.' In the 4th, there is too sudden a change of tenses, 'flows' and 'rose.' 6th, 7th, and 8th, I like much. 9th, Does not 'ring his ears' sound ludicrous in yours? The first idea that presents itself is, that his ears were pulled; but even the ringing of the ears does not please. 12th, 'Shower' and 'roar,' not rhymes. 'Soil' and 'aisle,' in the 13th, are not much better; but 'head' and 'descried' are execrable. In the 14th, 'bar' and 'stair' are ditto; and 'groping' is a nasty word. Vide Johnson, 'He gropes his breeches with a monarch's air.' In the 15th, you change your metre, which has always an unpleasant effect; and 'safe' and 'receive' rhyme just about as well as Scott and Lewis would. 16th, 'within' and 'strain' are not rhymes. 17th, 'hear' and 'air,' not rhymes. 18th, two metres are mixed; the same objection to the third line of the 19th. Observe, that, in the Ballad, I do not always object to a variation of metre; but then it ought to increase the melody, whereas, in my opinion, in these instances, it is diminished.

"THE CHASE.—12th, The 2d line reads very harshly; and 'choir' and 'lore,' are not rhymes. 13th, 'Rides' and 'side' are not rhymes. 30th, 'Pour' and 'obscure,' are not rhymes. 40th, 'Spreads' and 'inroads' are not rhymes. 46th, 'Rends' and 'ascend' are not rhymes.

"WILLIAM AND HELEN.—In order that I may bring it nearer the original title, pray introduce, in the first stanza, the name of Ellenora, instead of Ellen. 'Crusade' and 'sped,' not rhymes in the 2d. 3d, 'Mode' and 'shed' are not rhymes; and if they were, come too close to the rhymes in the 2d. In the 4th, 'Joy' and 'victory' are not rhymes. 7th, The first line wants a verb, otherwise is not intelligible. 13th, 'Grace' and 'bliss' are not rhymes. 14th, 'Bale' and 'hell' are not rhymes. 16th, 'Vain' and 'fruitless' is tautology; and as a verb is wanted, the line will run better thus, 'And vain is every prayer.' 19th, Is not 'to her' absolutely necessary in the 4th line? 20th, 'Grace' and 'bliss,' not rhymes. 21st, 'Bale' and 'hell,' not rhymes. 22d, I do not like the word 'spent.' 23d, 'O'er' and 'star' are vile rhymes. 25th, A verb is wanted in the 4th line; better thus, 'Then whispers thus a voice.' 28th, Is not, 'is't thou, my love?' better than 'My love! my love!' 31st, If 'wight' means, as I conjecture, 'enchanted,' does not this let the cat out of the bag? Ought not the spur to be sharp rather than bright? In the 4th line, 'Stay' and 'day' jingle together; would it not be better, 'I must be gone ere day?' 32d, 'Steed' and 'bed' are not rhymes. 34th, 'Bride' and 'bed,' not rhymes. 35th, 'Seal' and 'await,' not rhymes. 39th, 'Keep hold' and 'sit fast' seem to my ear vulgar and prosaic. 40th, The 4th line is defective in point of English, and, indeed, I do not quite understand the meaning. 43d, 'Arose' and 'pursues' are not rhymes. 45th, I am not pleased with the epithet 'savage'; and the latter part of the stanza is, to me, unintelligible. 49th, Is it not closer to the original in line 3d to say, 'Swift ride the dead?' 50th, Does the rain 'whistle?' 55th, line 3d, Does it express, 'Is Helen afraid of them?' 49th, 'Door' and 'flower' do not rhyme together. 60th, 'Scared' and 'heard' are not rhymes. 63d, 'Bone' and 'skelton,' not rhymes. 64th, The last line sounds ludicrous; one fancies the heroine coming down with a plump, and sprawling upon her back. I have now finished my severe examination, and pointed out every objection which I think can be suggested."

Knowledge for the People: or the plain why and because. By John Timbs. 13mo. No. 1. p. 72. Boston: Lilly & Wart. 1831.

Nothing is more difficult than to compose a treatise on natural philosophy so as to render it actually intelligible to an unlearned reader. There is a kind of aristocracy in science, as in everything else, and a vanity or a habit which unconsciously induce scholars, even when professing to teach, to lock up their arcana in technical terms so that an indifferent auditory may listen to a lecture with their ears wide open, and yet go home rather bewildered than enlightened by what they have heard. The fault of such writers is that they suppose their pupils have a fair understanding of all other scientific subjects but that one under consideration. In this little treatise, "illustrans commodam vitam," we discover additional cause of censure. We do not assert that Mr. Timbs himself is ignorant of the proper reply to his own interrogations, and that he is more at home in his "whys" than in his "because's;" but we do say that in many instances either from carelessness, or some other cause, he appears to find it much easier to ask questions than to answer them. Here is the first query and reply in the book, for an example.

"Why are coke and charcoal fires free from smoke?"

"Because the moisture has been previously dissipated; this moisture producing the smoke of coal fires."

Many will understand this thoroughly, but it will be only those who understood it before. He should inform the unlearned how moisture produces the smoke.

"Why does a fire burn briskly and clearly in cold weather?"

"The air being more dense, affords more nourishment to the fire."

This is saying literally nothing. The nature of this nourishment and the decomposition of the air should have been explained. They who were acquainted with this do not need Mr. Timbs's assistance.

"Why do we stick a pin in a rushlight to extinguish it?"

"Because the pin conducts away so much heat that the tallow will not melt, or rise in the wick."

We should answer, because the person had a hair-lip and could not find an extinguisher.

"Why is a decanter of cold water, when brought into a warm room, speedily covered with dew?"

"Because the temperature of the decanter is lower than that of the air immediately around it. The dew may be wiped off again and again, but will be constantly reproduced till the temperatures are equal. Upon this principle, the most convenient sort of hygrometer, or instrument for measuring the quantity of vapor in the atmosphere, is constructed."

This is just half defined. He does not ground his elucidation upon the fact, simple enough perhaps to him, but not to all his readers, that heat always holds water in solution, and that in the act of restoring an equilibrium between the air and the water in the decanter, the heat passes through the glass, but the moisture cannot, and therefore remains on the exterior surface.

Every one remembers the jest sometimes related of Dr. Franklin, that he asked some of his sage friends why a pail half full of water with a fish in it, was no heavier than the same without the fish; and after they puzzled their brains upon the matter, the doctor suggested that before they proceeded any further in their researches, they had better ascertain if the fact were really true. We are reminded of this by the first following answer.

"Why does the spout of a kettle emit a thick cloud or vapor?"

"Because the steam from the water is then cooled according to its distance from the spout; whereas steam is so transparent as hardly to be seen near the mouth."**

"Why is the shadow of a hand held between a candle and the wall, gigantic?"

"Because the light-giving surface is then smaller than the opaque body, and the shadow is consequently larger than the body."

It is but justice to add that there are several interesting facts scattered through the book, which in some measure redeem the inadvertencies.

The Little Merchants. A Story for Children. By Maria Edgeworth. 1 vol. 18mo. p. 78. New-York. Published for the trade. Franklin Press Office. 1831.

This appears to be a deserving little child's book, and is from an author whose name is an ample recommendation. Among such numerous juvenile publications as solicit the notice of parents and teachers, they sometimes are perplexed in making a selection. This is cheap, embellished with several pictures, and is instructive, simple, and clear. Take the annexed as a specimen.

"We must now give those of our young English readers, who may not be acquainted with the ancient city of Herculaneum, some idea of it. None can be ignorant that near Naples is the celebrated volcanic mountain of Vesuvius. That from time to time there happen violent eruptions from this mountain, that is to say, flames and immense clouds of smoke issue from different openings, mouths, or craters, as they are called, but more especially from the summit of the mountain, which is distinguished by the name of the crater. A rumbling, and afterwards a roaring noise is heard within, and prodigious quantities of stones, and minerals burnt into masses, (scoriae) are thrown out of the crater, sometimes to a great distance. The hot ashes from Mount Vesuvius have often been seen upon the roofs of the houses of Naples, from which it is six miles distant.

"Streams of lava run down the sides of the mountain during the time of an eruption, destroying every thing in their way, and overwhelm the houses and vineyards which are in the neighborhood. About seventeen hundred years ago, during the reign of the Roman emperor Titus, there happened a terrible eruption of Mount Vesuvius; and a large city called Herculaneum, which was situated at about four miles' distance from the volcano, was overwhelmed by the streams of lava, which poured into it, filled up the streets, and quickly covered over the tops of the houses, so that the whole was no more visible. It remained for many years buried. The lava which covered it became in time fit for vegetation, plants grew there, a new soil was formed, and a new town called Portici was built over the place where Herculaneum formerly stood. The little village of Resina is also situated near the spot. About fifty years ago, in a poor man's garden at Resina, a hole in a well about thirty feet below the surface of the earth was observed. Some persons had the curiosity to enter into this hole, and after creeping under ground for some time they came to the foundations of houses.

"They found, at length, the entrance into the town, which during the reign of Titus, was buried under lava. It was about eighty-eight Neapolitan palms (a palm contains near nine inches) below the top of the pit. The workmen, as they cleared the passages, marked their way with chalk, when they came to any turning, lest they should lose themselves. They branched out in many directions, and lying across them, the workmen often found large pieces of timber, beams, and rafters; some broken in the fall, others entire. These beams and rafters are burned quite black, and look like charcoal, except those that were found in moist places, which have more the color of rotten wood, and which are like a soft paste, into which you might run your hand. The walls of the houses slant, some one way, some another, and some are upright. Several magnificent buildings of brick, faced with marble of different colors, are partly seen, where the workmen have cleared away the earth and lava, with which they were encrusted.

"Columns of red and white marble, and flights of marble steps, are seen in different places. And out of the ruins of the palaces some very fine statues and pictures have been dug. Foreigners who visit Naples are extremely curious to see this subterraneous city, and are desirous to carry with them into their own country some proofs of their having examined this wonderful place."

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

"That it should come to this."

Nor many weeks ago, we learned that a vocalist named Anderson, was about soliciting the favor of a New-York audience. Next it was mentioned around carelessly that he had arrived, and was presently to appear. Then a rumor that he had quarreled with somebody, came over us, mingled up with items of the negro insurrection, news from Europe, and other shifting topics of conversation. After a few days a friend observed casually that Mr. Anderson had been beaten in a broil, and then we believe the theatrical advertisements announced that his debut was postponed. One of the papers ascribed it to indisposition, printing the word thus in italics. By and by Mr. Anderson's indisposition was so far overcome that he was announced. It was whispered that he had been expressing himself on board the ship, even before he had seen our shores, very freely against this nation, and that he would probably be hissed. The opera of Guy Mannering, selected for the occasion, was commenced to a house consisting mostly of males. Although no adept in these matters, we could perceive pretty decisive symptoms of—to use the favorite phrase of the day—a row. We hate rows. There is an inconvenience, especially to sedentary, peaceable, quiet persons, in being tumbled head over heels out of the second tier, or in having a few large bottles, relieved by occasional sprinklings of turnips, potatoes, and eggs, which have seen their best days, directed by facetious gentlemen at a distance against that part of the system upon which we editors place a great dependence as one of our principal means of support, id est—the head. Besides, on such occasions, there is "no hand on high to shield the brave," and as for verbal remonstrances, they do not always meet that respectful attention, or produce those immediate consequences which, we moralists feel, a smart, sensible observation deserves. It was not, therefore, without certain misgivings, that we found ourselves in a conspicuous situation in the "Old Drury," amidst sundry whoops, yells, whistles, and other rational expressions of sentiment known by the name of cat-calls, which might be construed into harbingers of a tolerably tempestuous entertainment. "Coming events cast their shadows before." We found that a kind of subterranean fire had been slowly burning under the smooth surface of our community, and that then a few flashes gleamed out as precursors of a volcanic eruption. After the sweet duet of "Now hope, now fear," in which Bertram sings behind the scenes, a neat-looking little gentleman sprang on the stage—and that was Anderson.

"At which the universal host up sent A shout!"

that shook the building to its base. This was persevered in, the opera was finished in pantomime, and there was much vociferous talking in the oyster-cellars, bar-rooms, and other public places adjacent to the theatre. If Mr. Anderson had been that night admitted to a private interview with General Jackson, he might have said to him, as Aboleno did to the doge, "this room now contains the two greatest men in Venice." We do not know who was benefited by it then but the retailers of brandy-and-water, and cigars, who might have slyly urged on an excitement so prolific to them of pecuniary profit.

Here it was an even race between Anderson and the republic, and although a few desperate democrats ventured a word on the side of the nation, Anderson was evidently the favorite, and bets ran two to one. A little peaceable Frenchman came near being tarred and feathered for answering to the name of Anderson in Chatham-square, and we were awakened about two o'clock in the morning by a stentorian cry of "The friends of Anderson meet in this street." It was now clearly evident that many were indignant that the deficiencies of the first theatre in the United States should be violated for the sake of a private brawl, while others swore they had rather see than bear the insolence of a bullying foreigner, or suffer him to be crammed down the throat of the public. On Friday the rejected player appealed to their generosity in a manner which we must say we deemed sufficient to atone for his fault. We will go, we thought, on his next appearance, to witness the grateful sight of reconciliation. We did go; but as for the reconciliation, that was not the order of the day. Multitudes filled the house and blocked up all the avenues and the street, and collected in the Park. Shouts "rent heaven's conclave." From a simple subject of jesting the matter began to assume a very serious and interesting aspect. We were quietly seated where we could take a survey of the proceedings. The first thing we saw was a man stepping from the pit into the boxes—the second, a large and heavy bottle of water hurled with startling violence from the third tier upon the stage. A gentleman behind us observed "No mistake!" We said nothing, but could not but reflect that if he or any one else had been where the missile alighted, it would have been a very great mistake. Thus

"The frame of things disjoint, both the worlds suffer,"

"Two truths were told
As happy prologues to the swelling act
Of the imperial theme."

At this crisis Mr. Anderson's popularity was below par. Had we been his thirty-seventh cousin, we should have disclaimed the relationship. Several gentlemen who raised their voices in his favor were the next moment observed making their way in a pretty straight line out of the front door, apparently in some haste, not even stopping to receive checks. Every shout in the interior was echoed by acclamations from the throng without, and a bulletin was established in the second story window to report progress to those in the street. He who has stood beneath a heavily laden apple-tree when some lusty swain above was shaking the branches, can comprehend the unpleasant situation of the performers at this period, except that the fruit hailed down on them consisted of oranges, penknives, turnips, keys, apples, potatoes, and eggs. Their dilemma was partially increased by the evident impropriety of coming before the audience with their heads covered. We remarked in particular that our inestimable actor, Mr. Placide, was for some time greatly perplexed between the contradictory suggestions of politeness and prudence. The sudden visitation, however, of an overgrown turnip turned the scale in favor of the latter. He took the liberty therefore to respectfully appropriate his "bonnet to its right use." It was a display of nature that warmed our hearts towards him. It was flinging himself upon the generosity of the public. Such heads as his are not as "plenty as blackberries." We trust his brow will be thinly clothed with locks of the purest silver before it is engaged in such a similar discussion. Mr. Simpson came forward, and after standing for some fifteen or twenty minutes, as one would pause almost deafened at the foot of Niagara Falls, listening to the din and discord, the roar and thunder of the clashing torrent, the noise subsided for a moment like a brief interval in the howling of the storm, as if the very winds and waves were exhausted with their paroxysms of fury. He seized the opportunity to announce that Mr. Anderson should be withdrawn, which few words again lashed the tumult to such a tremendous height, that we were reminded of an anecdote related by Plutarch of a shout so loud by the Romans on some occasion of triumph, that a flock of crows which happened to be flying over at the time, fell dead to the earth. As for us we felt ourselves before the omnipotence of the people. And this is the public, to whom we indite essays and paragraphs—whom we call "dear," "good," and "gentle." Henceforth shall we be respectful in our periods. Our blood runs cold to think how often we have been familiar with so powerful and gigantic a creature without knowing what we were about. How we have played with its beard, and like the keeper in the tower of London, put our head into its mouth. Think, reader, in confidence, what we have escaped.

The audience having denied a hearing to Mr. Anderson, we are in doubt whether he can legitimately come under this department. We have certainly nothing to say respecting his professional merit, for although we attended the theatre in order to judge of his vocal abilities, he was the only one of many thousands whose vocal abilities we did not hear. He might almost as well, therefore, come under the head of the fine arts, horrible accidents, or obituary notices of distinguished individuals. Among so many clashing opinions and reports, it is difficult to see our way clearly through. Many believe that he has not had fair play, and that blasting the interest of a stranger in our land, without affording him any opportunity to confess, contradict, apologize, or explain, is not consistent with the spirit of our laws, nor our boastings of the freedom of opinion among us. Others declare that the people are their own masters, and may refuse to receive an actor without being held responsible to any one, that there are influences about the theatre unfriendly to the country, and defying the wishes of the audience, and that the present crisis is only an opportunity for expressing a previously existing feeling upon the subject which should convey a useful lesson to all concerned. One party imagine that nothing can be more absurd than the notice taken of a play-actor's private opinions or quarrels, and are sarcastic upon the sovereign majesty of the people for driving away a poor devil of a foreigner for speaking his mind; for, say they, such exercises of inquisitorial power sink the character of the country more than all the idle talk of ignorant travelers, while their opponents reply that a becoming civility in one who lives on public favor is at least to be expected, and that as we did not invite the gentleman here, and have not inflicted upon him any personal injury, we have the same right to send him from the stage as that possessed by each one of us to hand an intrusive and disagreeable visitor out of our own house. To debate this question at present would only have a tendency to prolong an excitement, extraordinary in the highest degree, when we consider the insignificance of its origin, and which all must wish subdued. That a paltry broil between two persons should fling the city into an uproar, seems almost incredible, but thus the merest casual occurrences sometimes swell up into monstrous events, and the destinies of kingdoms, like those of theatres, are swayed by "trifles light as air." Charles the First lost his head (which may be found on our first page!) in consequence of an order to prevent the flight to America of the then obscure Oliver Cromwell, and it is said that the revolution in the Romish church was produced by the denial of the privilege to sell indulgences to Martin Luther.

To control the favor of a multitude by talking and writing is impossible. The press can excite a popular commotion, but not quell it when once aroused. Efforts made to soothe it are like the sprinkling of water upon a conflagration, which only causes the blaze to burst up more fiercely. The spirit of the human mind resembles the rest of nature's elements. Fire, water, air, when either of them are fairly awakened, will have their course, and at length gradually subside. The sea will roll and rage, and dash to pieces, and sweep away indiscriminately whatever opposes its current. A large crowd, assembled upon a question which has elated their passions, must be submitted to. We are certain, however, that Messrs. Simpson and Barry have the friendly feelings even of the violent opposers of Mr. Anderson. Indeed the manly and respectful appeal of Mr. Simpson, on Saturday evening, when the fury was at its height, was received with deep applause, and the recollection of the long and unwearied assiduity with which this gentleman has labored for the public, and his uniformly amiable and excellent character, evidently pervaded every bosom.

We should draw up a longer narrative of this affair, were we not convinced that the natural good sense of our fellow-citizens will incline them to perceive that the subject has already been rendered too important. It is not of sufficient dignity to excite the feelings of an enlightened community, and their over-flowing passions will, we trust, fall back quietly into their old channel.

On Monday evening the house was filled by gentlemen, who seemed to have attended in the cause of good order and decency. The appearance of each performer was greeted with a hearty welcome. It was apparent that the reaction which always follows such excesses in well regulated communities, had already taken place. Master Burke played Paul Pry without much force as a whole, but charmingly in points. This boy has a strong hold on the affections of the public. It was beautiful the other evening to see his bright unshadowed face smiling cheerfully and fearlessly amid the dark tumult, and the discordant elements hushed down into silence and attention before his sweet boy's look and the tones of his admirable music. It was like some gay spirit, calming by its melody a monstrous and savage beast. We regret to say, that a concourse of several thousand persons assembled before the theatre. They were, after a most unnecessary and unpardonable delay, partially dispersed by the police, headed by the mayor. For ourselves we are constrained to add, that whatever may be the right of an audience who have paid their money, to evince any opinion within the walls of the theatre, these riots are a deep stigma on the character of the city; and the perfect impunity with which they have been perpetrated, reflects a discredit upon the authorities of the town.

The popular opera of Cinderella returned to the stage Mrs. Austin and Mr. Jones. We have only room at present to observe that the prima donna was received with great enthusiasm, and the Tyrolienne air, and finale were rapturously encored. The New-York drama now resembles a fine country lately swept by a tremendous tempest. The thunders are rumbling in the distance—the broken clouds are scudding over the heavens—the swollen streams are "tumbling along their golden sands," and a few fragments of branches, and here and there a tree uprooted, betray the track of the departed storm; but the air is purer and healthier, and the world fresher and greener. Nature in all her works resumes her old operations. The birds are singing in the forests, and the flowers again bursting from their washed beds.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

Editor's Study.—We were sitting in our little secluded study the other morning, ruminating upon the most appropriate form of addressing you, our trusty reader, upon the vicissitudes of the past week, and had just dipped our pen in the ink, shaken off the superfluous drop, and darted the ebon point towards the paper with the impulse of an idea, when a knock, sudden, startling, and almost impertinent, caused us to lift our eyes. Rap—rap—rap. Come in! and the intruder stood before us. We do hate to be interrupted while we are writing. It sweeps over our placid temper like a breeze across a mirror-lake, covering it with innumerable ill-natured little ripples. It is too bad to crush the birth of a young thought—to startle away the timid bird-like visit of a new fancy—to break away the images of a faintly rising dream. No one but a writer can conceive the irreparable nature of such an interruption. You cannot calculate how much you have lost, dear reader, by these ill-timed intruders. Ideas on such occasions are like the sweet fairies dancing on a green, who dissolve into thin air entirely, the very moment chanticleer opens his brazen throat in "salutation to the morn." With a frown like a thunder-cloud, therefore, and an inward ejaculation not necessary to repeat, we gazed at the evil spirit, who has to answer this week for all our stupidity. He was a forlorn and dismal looking creature, and, by the blessing of charity, we had no sooner looked on him than the clouds melted from our brow, the ripples of our temper smoothed away again into the usual unruffled tranquillity, and the ejaculation which had bounded up from our heart before we were aware, softened into a downright, sincere, and rather sentimental "poor fellow." He walked with a steady pace to a chair, and seated himself with a gentlemanly grace and dignity which were broadly contradicted by the nature of his apparel. His hat was slouchy, and had evidently been brushed to death. It was one of those sort of things which the dainty would never lift but on compulsion, and then exclusively with the extreme tips of the thumb and finger. It was an antique. It might have been dug out of the ruins of Herculaneum. The elbows of his coat were a history, an ancient history, revealing much of his private life and circumstances, and with utter poverty written on every seam. Upon the subject of his nether integuments, we do—we shall—we must remain silent. To have addressed such a specimen of humanity in any other tone than that of kindness, would have been the part of a Polyphemus, and incompatible with the known benevolence of an editor. We therefore spoke with our most courteous and insinuating air. He handed us a paper in silence, with a slight and momentary glow over his rigid, ghastly features, and a bashful casting down of the eyes. We opened it. It was poetry—smooth, fair, love-breathing poetry. Our very soul bowed in respect and commiseration for this piteous being, who from the struggling anguish and humiliation of such a station, could feel, and love, and write verses. And this fellow now has arisen at early morn, and gone out to smell the flowers, and see the sun rise; and he has lingered at night beneath the moon, and brooded over his destiny. What crowds of practical curses must have broken in upon his meditations; what debts, duns, and bailiffs; what enraged landladies, supercilious clerks, and saucy bar-keepers; what disappointed schemes, vain yearnings, gloomy despondencies—poor, poor fellow. The verses shall be printed, we exclaimed, even before we had read them. The man of rags and rhymes reached out his arm and grasped our hand. He knew by intuition we had been thinking of his bailiffs and landladies. His lip slightly quivered, and a glassiness came to his fine hazel eyes, that might have been moisture or not, for ere we had time to conclude our observations, he drew himself up and with a smile that showed a perfect set of teeth, and in a low pleasant voice, said "It is my only enjoyment," shook us cordially by the hand, and was gone in a moment. Come, kind reader, let us see what he has been about.

THE DISMISSED.

"I suppose she was right in rejecting my suit,
But why did she kick me down stairs?"
Hallick's Discarded.

The wing of my spirit is broken,
My day-star of hope has declined;
For a month not a word have I spoken,
That's either polite or refined.
My mind's like the sky in bad weather,
When mist-clouds around us are curl'd;
And, viewing myself altogether,
I'm the veriest wretch in the world.

I wander about like a vagrant,
I spend half my time in the street;
My conduct's improper and flagrant,
For I quarrel with all that I meet.
My dress too is wholly neglected,
My hat I pull over my brow,
And I look like a fellow suspected
Of wishing to kick up a row.

At home I'm an object of horror
To boarder, and waiter, and maid;
But my landlady views me with sorrow,
When she thinks of the bill that's unpaid.
Abroad my acquaintances flout me,
The ladies cry, "bless us, look there!"
And the little boys cluster about me,
And sensible citizens stare.

One says "he's a victim to Cupid,"
Another "his conduct's too bad,"
A third "he is awfully stupid,"
A fourth "he is perfectly mad."
And then I am watched like a bandit,
My friends with me all are at strife—
By heaven, no longer I'll stand it,
But quick put an end to my life!

I've thought of the means—yet I shudder
At dagger, or ratsbane, or rope;
At drawing with lancet my blood, or
At razor without any soap.
Suppose I should fall in a duel,
And thus leave the stage with ecclat;
But to die with a bullet is cruel,
Besides 'twould be breaking the law.

Yet one way remains—to the river
I'll fly from the goadings of care—
But drown?—oh the thought makes me shiver—
A terrible death, I declare.
Ah no! I'll once more see my Kitty,
And parry her cruel disdain,
Beseech her to take me in pity,
And never dismiss me again.

In another page, we have copied some of Mr. Bryant's lines. A volume of such poetry would certainly grace the literature of this country in the eyes of foreigners as well as of ourselves, who, by the way, study our own poets much less than they deserve. There are hundreds among us better acquainted with the "Pleasures of Hope" and of "Memory," with "Rokeby" and the "Lady of the Lake," than with the "Ages," "Thanatopsis," "To a Waterfowl," and "Green River;" and yet, at least to those familiar with these rich and genuine creations of the poet, we need not expatiate upon their rare beauty, their simplicity, their vigor, their fidelity to nature, their fresh, still feeling and philosophy. These are conspicuous qualities in his productions, and will touch every heart and please every understanding.

Strangers in the city, at present, find ample occupation for all tastes. Great crowds have been attracted by the varied exhibition of the American Institute, held at Masonic-hall. It consisted of innumerable rich and elegant articles manufactured by the mechanics of this city and the neighboring towns. The Hon. Mr. Everett delivered the annual address on Friday evening, at St. Matthew's church. A vast multitude thronged to hear this eloquent and classic orator, and their anticipations appeared to be fully realized. The wits are all making naughty remarks about Monsieur Chabert, the "fire king," who holds his salamander banquet at Clinton-hall, swallows poisons, goes into heated ovens, and plays with the fiercest of the elements as familiarly as Jove did with lightning. His feats, it is said, make the inhabitants of this terrestrial globe open their eyes, and people do say—but that's a secret.

SHAWL DANCE,

PERFORMED BY MADEMOISELLE TAGLIONI, IN THE BALLET OF LA BAYADERE—COMPOSED BY AUBER.

MISCELLANY.

CURIOUS CEREMONIES.—In the evening the Governor (of Yakutsk) waited on me, and invited me to accompany him to a house, to see a ceremony performed, previously to a wedding that was to take place the next day. We repaired to the house, where we found a large party of gentlemen and ladies assembled. The bride and her attendants occupied one end of the room near a large table, on which were placed fruits, cakes, wines, &c. Tea and coffee were then served. Afterwards I was called to look at a procession from an opposite building or store, called in this country an anbar where every sort of provisions, effects, &c., are kept. I saw several low four-wheeled vehicles, each drawn by a single ox, loaded with furniture, clothing, &c. &c., for the new-married couple. Lights were carried before them, and a number of young girls, assembled near the door of the anbar, sang in concert, as each vehicle was loaded with the effects of the bride. This ended, the party returned to the house, when dancing commenced, and was kept up with spirit the whole night.—Before quitting the house, the parents of the young bridegroom requested me to come the following morning, and witness the ceremony of his taking leave of them, previously to his going to church. At twelve o'clock, on the twenty-second, we attended at his father's house, where a number of the friends of the bridegroom were collected: several large tables were laid for dinner, and at the principal one, near the images, which in a Russian house are always at the eastern corner of the room, sat the bridegroom and his attendants. A female relative, representing the bride, was placed in the chair on the left hand of the bridegroom; and the father and mother sat at the opposite side of the table. Three dishes of cold meat were placed before the principal attendant, and wine and watsky being at the same time handed round, he cut a large cross on the first one, placing it aside; then the second, then the third, in the same way; and at the cutting of each, wine and watsky were handed round to the company, who rose, and drank to the wedding party. Nothing was eaten, this being merely a ceremony to prepare the feast for the young couple when they should return from church. After this the bridegroom went round to the opposite side of the table, holding the image of the Virgin in his hand, and crossed himself on his knees, and bowed his head three times to the ground, before his father, who, when he rose, took the image from him, kissed him, and crossed him with it on his head. The same homage was paid to his mother, on which she delivered the image to another person, who preceded the bridegroom and his party to the church, where they met the bride and her attendants; and the couple were then led to the altar, and united in the holy lands of wedlock, by the Protopope, or Chief of the Clergy. The ceremony resembles the catholic church, except that, towards the close, the priest places a hymenial crown on the heads of the man and woman, and they walk three times round a table, where lie the cross and the bible. This part of the proceeding is regarded as binding them in strict allegiance to each other during the rest of their lives. There are also two rings used, which are exchanged, between the man and the woman, during the ceremony. The whole party now returned to the house of the bridegroom's father, where a repast was prepared for them, resembling all large entertainments of this sort. The healths of the principal persons of the place were drunk, and followed by a salute of three guns after each toast. The evening was crowned with an illumination and a ball, at which, as a stranger, I had the honor of leading off the bride.—Dobell's Travels.

POWERS OF THE FLEA.—The great agility and strength of this insect are exceedingly remarkable, it being able to leap further in proportion to its own length than, perhaps, any other creature that has not wings to help it; and its strength is so well known, and so extraordinary in the same proportion, that several curious artists, whose dexterity has been shown in the making curiosities of an uncommon and surprising smallness, have employed this little animal to assist in exhibiting their works, and proving the nicety and lightness of them. Dr. Power says he saw among Tradescant's rarities, a golden chain of three hundred links, though not above an inch long, that was both fastened to and drawn away by a flea. Moutet some time before this, mentions such another, of a finger's length, made by one Mark, an Englishman, whereto a flea was fastened by a collar of a most exquisite minuteness, with a lock and key adapted to it. This chain the flea dragged after him with ease, the flea, chain, lock and key, not exceeding altogether the weight of a single grain. He adds further, that he had been informed by people of undoubted credit, that a coach made of gold, with all its furniture of the same metal, had a flea chained to it, which drew it along without the least difficulty; thereby testifying at the same time the dexterity of the workman, and the strength of this little creature. Nor is there any room to doubt the truth of these accounts; for one Boverick, a watchmaker in the Strand, has lately made and shown to vast numbers of people, not only a chaise having four wheels and all its proper apparatus, together with a man sitting therein, the whole formed of ivory, and drawn along by a flea; but likewise a landau that opens and shuts by springs, with six horses harnessed thereto, a coachman sitting on the box, with a dog between his legs, four people in the landau, two footmen behind it, and a postilion riding one of the fore-horses. This equipage a flea is fastened to, and pulls very easily along. He has also made a chain of brass, about two inches in length, containing two hundred links, with a hook at one end, and a padlock and key at the other; all which together weigh less than the third part of a grain. Here the flea is made use of to draw the chain, which it does very nimbly, and with as little trouble as can be well imagined. Fleas thus employed are preserved alive and vigorous, by putting them upon the arm, or the back of the hand, to feed, once or twice a day.—Micrographia Restaurata.

AN ESTATE NOT TO BE TAKEN AWAY.—The following story used to be told by King George the First. About the year 1615, there was a nobleman in Germany, whose daughter was courted by a young lord. When he had made such progress as is usual by the interposition of friends, the old lord had a conference with him, asking him, how he intended, if he married his daughter, to maintain her? He replied, equal to her quality. To which the father replied, that was no answer to his question; he desired to know, what he had to maintain her with? To which the young lord then answered, he hoped that was no question, for his inheritance was as public as his name. The old lord owned his possessions to be great; but still asked him if he had nothing more secure than land, wherewith to maintain his daughter? The question was strange, but ended in this; that the father of the young lady gave his positive resolve, never to marry his daughter, though his heir, who would have two such great estates, but to a man that had a manual trade by which he might subsist, if drove from his country. The young lord was master of none at present, but rather than lose his mistress, he requested only a year's time, in which he promised to acquire one: in order to do which, he got a basket-maker, the most ingenious he could meet with, and in six months became master of his trade of basket-making, with far greater improvements than even his teacher himself; and as a proof of his ingenuity, and extraordinary proficiency in so short a time, he brought to his young lady a piece of workmanship of his own performance, being a white twig basket, which, for many years after, became a general fashion among the ladies, by the name of dressing-baskets, brought to England from Holland and Germany.

To complete the singularity of this relation, it happened some years after this nobleman's marriage, that he and his father-in-law, sharing in the misfortunes of the wars of the Palatinate, were driven naked out of their estates; and in Holland, for some years, did this young lord maintain both his father-in-law and his own family, by making baskets of white twigs, to such an unparalleled excellency as none could attain: and it is from this young German lord the Hollanders derive those curiosities, which are still made in the United Provinces of twig-work.—Dictionary of Commerce.

INDUSTRY OF GREAT PAINTERS.—There cannot be a greater contradiction to the common prejudice, that "genius is naturally a truant and a vagabond," than the astonishing, and (on this hypothesis) unaccountable number of chef-d'œuvres left behind them by the old masters. The stream of their invention supplies the taste of successive generations, like a river. They furnished a hundred galleries, and preclude competition, not more by the excellence than by the number of their performances. Take Raphael and Rubens alone. There are works of theirs in single collections, enough to occupy a long and laborious life, and yet their works are spread through all the collections of Europe. They seem to have cost them no more labor than if they "had drawn in their breath and puffed it forth again." But we know that they made drawings, studies, sketches, of all the principal of these, with the care and caution of the merest tyros in the art; and they remain equal proofs of their capacity and diligence. The Cartoons of Raphael alone might have employed many years, and made a life of illustrious labor, though they look as if they had been struck off at a blow, and are not a tenth part of what he produced in his short but bright career. Titian and Michael Angelo lived longer, but they worked as hard and did as well. Shall we bring in competition with examples like these, some trashy caricaturist or idle dauber, who has no sense of the infinite resources of nature or art, nor consequently any power to employ himself upon them for any length of time or to any purpose, to prove that genius and regular industry are incompatible qualities? In my opinion, the very superiority of the works of the great painters (instead of being a bar to) accounts for their multiplicity. Success prompts to exertion; and habit facilitates success. It is idle to suppose we can exhaust nature; and the more we employ our own faculties, the more we strengthen them, and enrich our stores of observation and invention. The more we do, the more we can do.

ANECDOTE OF D'AUBIGNÉ.—We find in the memoirs of D'Aubigné, an anecdote that is worthy of notice. In a battle that was fought during the wars of Henry the Fourth, D'Aubigné had a personal combat with a captain of the name of Dubourg. During the heat of the action, D'Aubigné perceived that an arquebusade had set fire to a bracelet formed of his mistress's hair, which he wore on his arm; without thinking of the advantage he gave his adversary, he instantly employed himself in extinguishing the fire, and preserving this precious bracelet, which was dearer to him than liberty or life. Captain Dubourg sympathized with and respected the sentiment, suspended his attack, inclined the point of his sword, and began to trace on the sand a globe surmounted with a cross.—Memoirs of Madame de Genlis.

GENUINE LOVE SCENE.—"Beloved of my heart, light of my eyes!" said she, embracing him; "know'st thou the proverb which says, that man is worth what he holds in his hands? Put thy hands then in mine that I may possess the greatest treasure in the world." Nureddin gave her both his hands, and she covered them with her kisses. While they were thus engaged, the stars began to glisten in the firmament, and the breath of heaven arose in the breeze of night.—New Arabian Nights.

POPULAR TALES.

MY COUSIN LUCY AND THE VILLAGE TEACHER.

BY JAMES HALL.

It has been well said, that memory never loses an impression that has once been made upon it. The lines may be obscured for a time, as an inscription is defaced by rust, but they are never obliterated; they may be buried under a crowd of other recollections, but there are times when these roll away, as the mist rises from the valley, and the whole picture stands disclosed, in its original integrity. Impressions made in childhood are the most vivid; years may pass, and other remembrances be gathered in, but those that lie deepest are longest retained, and most fondly cherished. Other events touch the heart and pass off without leaving a trace, but these strike in, engraft themselves, and become a part of our nature. Such, at least, has been my experience. I have lived a busy, and I trust not an useless life; I have seen much of the world; my feelings and passions have been excited, and my attention powerfully fixed, by events of deep interest; but none stand recorded in the same bold, indelible characters which mark some of the remembrances of my childhood.

Not far from my father's residence there was a school-house. It was a small log building, such as we often see in new countries, and stood in a grove, on an eminence near the road. Whether chance, or taste, or convenience, dictated the choice of the spot, I cannot tell; but it always struck me as being not only well adapted to its purpose, but remarkably picturesque. The grove contained not more than an acre or two of ground, but the trees were large spreading oaks, that I have seldom seen surpassed in size or beauty; for every observer of nature will agree with me, that trees, even of the same species, differ in appearance as widely as human beings. In every grove the vegetation has some distinguishing characteristic, just as all the inhabitants of a village have some trait in common. The trees are stunted, or luxuriant, spreading or tall, majestic or beautiful; or else they are vulgar, common-place trees, as devoid of interest as the unmeaning people whom we meet with every day. I never see a great oak standing by the road-side without observing its peculiarities. Some are round and portly, some tall and spindling; some aspire, and others grovel; one has a gracefully rounded outline, and another a rugged, irregular shape. Here you may behold one waving its head with a courtly bend, and there you may see another tossing its great arms up and down like some angular, long-limbed, gigantic booby. Trees, too, have their diseases, their accidents, and their adventures. They are torn by the wind, shattered by the lightning, and nipped by the frost; and while some of them have in their youth the aspect of sallow and dyspeptic invalids, others flourish in a green old age; and whether standing singly in the field, or crowded together in the forest, whether embraced by ivy, clothed with moss, or hung with mistletoe, they always attract attention, by the peculiarities which they derive from these and other incidents.

Our school-house oaks were of the majestic kind. They had braved the elements for at least a century, and seemed to be still in the vigor of life. Their great, dark trunks were covered with moss, and their immense branches interlocking far above the ground, shadows it with a canopy, that not a sunbeam could penetrate. The soil was trodden hard and smooth by the school-boys, and covered with a short green sward, over which the wind swept so freely as to carry away all the fallen leaves.

Here we played, and wrestled, and ran races; here, in hot weather, the master, forsaking the school-house, disposed his noisy pupils in groups among the trees; here the rustic orator harangued his patriotic fellow-citizens on the anniversary of independence; and here the itinerant preacher addressed the neighbors on the sabbath. On occasions like the latter, our grove became as gay as a parterre. The bonnets, and ribbons, and calicoes were as numerous and many colored as the flowers of the field. The farmers and their families generally came to the preaching on horseback; and it was a fortunate animal that bore a lighter burden than two adults and a brace of children. The young women rode behind their brothers or sweethearts, or in default of such attendants, mounted sociably in pairs, the best rider taking the saddle and holding the reins, as smart girls are always willing enough to do. It was a goodly sight to see the horses hitched to the trees in every direction, showing off their sleek hides and well-combed manes to the best advantage; and decked with new saddles, and gaudy saddle-cloths, and fine riding skirts, that were never exposed to the weather or the eye, except on Sundays and holidays. Then the people, before the sermon began, sitting in groups, or strolling in little companies, looked so gay and so happy, that Sunday seemed to be to them not merely a day of rest, but of thanksgiving and enjoyment. When they collected round the preacher, sitting silent and motionless, with their heads uncovered, and thrown back in devout attention, the scene acquired a graver and deeper interest. I have never witnessed that spectacle on a calm, sunny day, without a sensation of thrilling pleasure; and often as I have seen it, the impression that it made continued ever fresh and beautiful. There was a mingled cheerfulness and solemnity in this sight, that attached itself to the spot, and I have afterwards felt in the midst of my studies or sports on school-days a soothing calmness creeping over me, a feeling that the place was hallowed, like that which we experience when strolling in a graveyard, or lingering in the aisle of a church.

My memory clings to this spot, as the scene of the most vivid pains and pleasures of my childhood. I pass over the detail of all the sufferings that I endured from the brutality of ignorant and tyrannical teachers; perhaps I was more sensitive than other children; but be that as it may, it is certain that although I was fond of learning, and docile in my disposition, I imbibed, very early in life, a cordial hatred for the whole race of schoolmasters. But I loved my books and my companions; I loved to play at ball, and run races; and I loved the school-house grove, with its tall oaks and verdant lawn. I used to linger on a neighboring hill, to look on that graceful swell, and those fine trees, and to wonder why I thought the landscape so attractive. Those who recollect their sensations on first entering a theatre, or reading a novel, can form some idea of my feelings. That first play, and first novel, remain through life impressed upon the imagination, as standards with which all similar objects are compared; and it was thus that the most interesting spot that attracted my young fancy, became to me the beau idéal of rural and romantic beauty.

There was another charm connected with this spot, the secret of which I will now disclose to the reader, although for many years I hardly dared acknowledge it to myself. My cousin Lucy was my school companion, and I never think of that green hill without seeing her slender form, gliding among its shades, with the same calm blue eye, and meek countenance, and soft smile, that she wore when we were children. I hardly know why I loved Lucy better than any body else, for she was several years my senior, and never was my playfellow. I romped and laughed with the other girls, and played them all sorts of tricks; but I never hid her bonnet, or pinned her sleeve to that of her next neighbor. From her childhood she was sedate and womanly; her deportment was always delicate and dignified; there was a something about her that repelled familiarity, while the winning softness of her manners invited love and respect. When I came near to Lucy I was no longer a wild, mischievous boy, but was elevated into a better and more rational being, by the desire that I felt to please and serve her.

We had a succession of schoolmasters, the most of whom were illiterate men, who remained with us but a few months. At last there came one of higher pretensions than the rest. He was a young man of liberal education, who brought with him the highest testimonials of his character and attainments. He strolled into the neighborhood on foot, and so great was his modesty that it was some time before anybody discovered his acquirements, or suspected the object of his visit. At length he proposed, with some diffidence, to fill the vacant situation of teacher; and, having produced his credentials, was readily admitted to that thankless office. He was altogether a different man from any of his predecessors. His temper was even, his heart kind, his manners easy, and he had the rare talent of commanding respect and communicating knowledge, without the appearance of an effort. He was as bashful as a girl, and as artless as a being as ever lived. Everybody liked him; his good sense, his cheerfulness, his inoffensive manners, and industrious habits, made him the favorite of young and old.

It was customary in those days for the schoolmaster to board with his patrons, each one entertaining him for a week at a time, in rotation; an arrangement which, while it divided the burden of his subsistence equally, enabled the whole neighborhood to become personally acquainted with the pedagogue. When the latter happened to be a dull, prosing dog, scantily supplied with good manners and good fellowship, the week of his reception wore heavily away, the table was less plentifully spread than usual, and the whiskey jug was sure to have suffered some disaster on the day previous to his arrival. The head of the family indulged himself on such occasions in liberal remarks upon the idleness and effeminacy of learning; and the good wife by frequent allusions to the scarcity of provisions, and the high price of schooling, gave the unfortunate teacher to understand that he was considered as a mere incubus upon the body politic, a Mr. Nobody, who was only tolerated, and fed, and allowed to sit in the chimney-corner, for the purpose of keeping the children out of mischief. But if the schoolmaster was a pleasant fellow, one who read the newspapers, and played the fiddle, and told a good story, the week of his visitation brought holiday times and high doings to the farmer's hospitable fireside. Then the good man heard the news, the girls heard the violin, and the mistress of the house found a patient auditor to the recital of all the misadventures which had befallen the family within the scope of her memory.

Then the boys wore their holiday clothes every day, the hospitable board groaned under a load of good things, and the cheerful family enjoyed seven long days of good humor and good eating.

Of all schoolmasters Mr. Alexis, the gentleman above alluded to, was the most popular one that ever darkened the door of a farmhouse. In his time the "schoolmaster's week" was a week of festival. He not only read the news, and played the fiddle, but could sing a good song, and recite the veracious biography of a hundred real ghosts. He could explain all the hard words in the Testament, all the outlandish names in the newspapers, and all the strange hieroglyphics which are mischievously set down in the almanac, to puzzle the brains of simple country folks. Then he was affable and talkative; with all this he was good-humored, and, what perhaps was more effective than all the rest, he was good-looking. With such qualifications he was always a welcome visitor, and I can well remember the stir that his coming occasioned in my father's house. On the preceding Saturday there was an universal scrubbing; the floors, the windows, the chairs, the pewter plates, the milk pails, and the children, were all scrubbed. The dimity curtains, that lay snugly packed away in the great press, sprinkled with lavender and rose leaves, were now brought forth, and hung over the parlor windows; and the snow-white counterpanes, that were kept for great occasions, were ostentatiously spread upon the beds. The yard was swept, and the great weeds that had been suffered to grow unmolested, were plucked up; and the whole menagerie, out-houses, tenements, and appurtenances, made to look as fine and as smart as the nature of the case would admit. Then such baking, and brewing, and cooking! The great oven teemed with huge loaves and rich pastry; yielding forth from its vast mouth puddings, and pies, and tarts, enough to have foundered a whole board of aldermen. The fatted calf was killed, the brightest ornaments of the pig-sty and poultry-yard were devoted to the knife, and the best blood of the farm was freely spilled to furnish forth delicate viands, with which to pamper the appetite of that important and popular character, the schoolmaster.

I am often singular in my opinions, for I do not consider myself bound to believe anything, merely because everybody else believes it. As to the schoolmaster I disliked him from the very first; and when everybody else praised him I was silent. I had an inherent antipathy against all pedagogues. I viewed them as our natural enemies, a race created to scourge and terrify children; and for the person in question I entertained a special and particular aversion. This was the more singular as I was by nature confiding and placable, and never indulged a malignant feeling towards any other human being. He treated me with kindness, instructed me with unwearied patience, and I verily believe would have found the road to my heart, had I not suspected that he was searching out the way that led to my cousin Lucy's. I was always jealous of her, because the disparity of our ages placed her at a distance which almost extinguished hope, and because she always treated me as a boy and a relation, and either never did, or never would see that I cherished feelings towards her infinitely more tender than any that the mere ties of consanguinity could have awakened. A boy in love becomes cunning beyond his years. Unable to enter the lists as a candidate, and obliged to look on in silence, he becomes the secret and vigilant enemy of his unconscious rival. I was continually watching the schoolmaster and my cousin Lucy; and not a glance, nor a blush, nor a touch of the hand escaped my jealous eye. An indifferent observer would have seen nothing in their intercourse to excite the slightest suspicion; an enamored boy, who had loved devotedly from the first dawn of intelligence, read volumes of meaning in every act and look. The conduct of both of them was perfectly delicate and unexceptionable. There was not the least approach to gallantry on his part, not an inviting or an encouraging glance on hers; but I could mark the softened tone of his voice, and the involuntary reverence of his manner, when he addressed her. I could detect the brightening of his eye when she spoke, and the courteous bow with which he replied to any question from her, so different from the commonplace civility with which he treated his other female pupils. He often walked home with her, but never without other company, for she was always surrounded by children, one or two of whom she held by the hand, as if to prevent the possibility of a tête-à-tête. Perhaps she never had a thought that there was any particular meaning in his attentions; but there is an instinct in female delicacy, and although it might never have occurred to Lucy that her teacher had opportunities beyond other men, which required that she should place a careful watch over her affections, nature regulated her conduct. I was often with them; they conversed without constraint, and never spoke of love, or courtship, or marriage. But he pointed out to her the finest traits of the landscape, gathered for her the choicest flowers, and discoursed of poetry; sometimes reciting the most beautiful passages, in so eloquent a tone that I could have knocked him down, and was ready to quarrel with Lucy, for the apparent interest with which she listened. Often did I wish that he was a thousand miles off, or that I was a schoolmaster.

It would be too tedious to set down all the mischievous pranks that I played our teacher, in revenge for his supposed attachment to my cousin. Though fond of learning, I obstinately persisted in a resolution to owe nothing to his teaching; and more than once disgraced him and myself by wilful blunders, at our public examinations. I incited the biggest boys into conspiracies against his peace and dignity. Once when he was going to a tea-party at my uncle's, a little better dressed than usual, a troop of us scampered past him as he was crossing a miry brook, and, pretending not to observe him, splashed a shower of mud and water over his holiday suit. We sent him one day into a large company with a grotesque figure chalked on his back; and on another occasion scorched off his eyebrows by exploding gunpowder under his nose, while he was intently engaged in working a problem in algebra. None of these persecutions ever ruffled his temper; and when my mother, who could not believe that the fault was mine, reproached him with the slowness of my progress, he mildly told her that the greatest geniuses were often dull boys at school, and that I would no doubt make a shining man.

At length the term of the schoolmaster's engagement expired, and my heart bounded with joy when I heard that he was going to quit the country. I was at my uncle's on the morning of his departure, when he called to take leave of the family. Lucy was in the garden, and Alexis went there to look for her. Young as I was, I could readily comprehend that a latent passion would be most apt to betray itself in a parting interview; and that of all places in the world, a garden is the fittest to excite tender feelings in the bosom of young lovers. In a moment a thousand thoughts flashed through my mind—in another moment love and jealousy prompted me to observe a meeting which my foreboding heart told me would be fraught with more than usual interest. It was a mean act, but jealousy is always mean. I was too young, too much in love, and too angry to reflect; and if I had reflected, who could have thought it improper to witness anything which could possibly take place between two such perfect beings as my cousin Lucy and the schoolmaster?

I crept secretly to the garden, and from the covert of a thick hedge saw Alexis approach my cousin. He took her hand, and told her that he had come to bid her farewell; that he had bade adieu to all his other friends, and had deferred calling upon her until the last, because to part with her was more painful than all the rest. There was a touching softness in his voice, and a corresponding melancholy clouded his features. "What a canting rascal," said I to myself; "I'm afraid Lucy will never be able to stand it."

He then dropped her hand, and began to pluck twigs from a peach-tree, while Lucy was industriously engaged in demolishing a great rose. At last he said, "There is one subject—" Lucy stooped down, and began to pull the weeds from a tulip-bud. The schoolmaster stopped, and looked embarrassed.

"Silly fellow!" said I exultingly, "why does he not kneel down, and lay his hand upon his heart?" I took courage when I saw his trepidation, believing that he would never be able to tell his love, or that Lucy would discard so clumsy a lover.

"Miss Lucy—" said the schoolmaster.

"Sir!" said Miss Lucy.

"What a canting villain!" said I.

Mr. Alexis looked round, as if fearful of observation.

"He looks as if he were stealing," said I; "and well he may, the vile pedagogue!"

Alexis sighed, threw down his eyes, and resumed, "There is one subject, Miss Lucy, upon which I have long wished—" He looked up, but Lucy was several paces off, twining the delicate vines of a honeysuckle through the lattices of the summer-house.

"She will never have him!" said I, in an ecstasy; "I know she would never have a whining, canting, pitiful schoolmaster!"

Alexis followed Lucy to the summer-house, and remarked that "the honeysuckles were very fragrant."

"Very!" said my cousin.

"He has dropped the subject," thought I; "dear Lucy! how well she managed him! Ah! these schoolmasters know not how to make love; if I were there I could show him how!" I breathed freely, and thought it was all over.

Alexis stood by the side of Lucy; he leaned towards her, and spoke in a low voice. What he said I know not, but the words were potent, for Lucy turned her head from him, and I saw that her face was covered with blushes, redder than the coral flowers that hung around her.

I thought she was angry. "If he has dared to insult my cousin," said I, "how proudly will I avenge her quarrel!" I looked again, and could scarcely believe my eyes! Lucy's head was reclining upon the shoulder of Alexis, and one arm was thrown gently around her! I thought their lips met!

I could stay no longer. I fled from the hateful scene, burning with rage and jealousy, and deeply mortified at my own meanness, in having become the voluntary and secret witness of that which should have been sacred from every eye.

In a few days after this occurrence I left my native country. I had long been destined for the sea, and having now received a midshipman's warrant in the navy, set out for the sea-board. After I had bade adieu to all my other friends, I went to take leave of Lucy; for I, too, felt that this was the most painful of my separations; the parting with her seemed like breaking the last and tenderest tie that bound me to the land of my birth. She had always treated me with the affection of a sister, and never did her manner seem so tender as at this moment. When I left her father's house she followed me across the little lawn before the door, and as I threw the reins over my horse's neck, and lingered to repeat my adieu, she put a paper into my hand. Her eyes were filled with tears, and my own were not dry.

I was some miles on my way from home before my emotion subsided sufficiently to permit me to read Lucy's note. In this she disclosed to me her engagement with Alexis; she said it had been approved by her parents, and that the marriage would take place whenever he should be established in a profession, for which he was preparing himself. She spoke of the fair prospects that smiled before her, in an union with one so amiable and highly-gifted. She said that she made this disclosure because I was her nearest and dearest relative, after her parents, and was on the eve of so long an absence, that the separation seemed to be almost final. More she said, which I need not repeat; it was all kind and sisterly, and I vowed that I would always love my cousin Lucy, whether she married the schoolmaster or not.

Her note had one good effect, which harsher measures would have failed to produce. Her generous confidence subdued me; and as I reflected upon it, in my cooler moments, I determined to smother my ill-fated passion, and to love Lucy only in manner and form as her cousin lawfully might. I resolved, moreover, to forego all my vengeance against Alexis, and to think of him with kindness.

In a few days I embarked. We had a brilliant cruise. The war with Great Britain was just declared, and the ocean swarmed with our enemies. We were frequently engaged, and generally successful. The novelty and excitement of this life soon caused a wonderful revolution in my feelings. I was no longer a romantic boy, brooding over a hopeless passion, with the single object of my adoration continually before my eyes. My heart had set up other idols; it had now ample sea-room, and, like our gallant vessel, rode gaily over the sparkling ocean of life. I learned to think of Lucy as the destined bride of another; yet I thought of her as a lovely and a hallowed being, and sometimes pronounced her name with the reverence with which a devout catholic utters that of his tutelary saint. Often when our ship lay becalmed, when the clear moonlight was spread over the ocean, when the waves were at rest, and everything was still, I would lie for hours upon the deck, thinking of the school-house, and its beautiful grove, and my fair cousin. Then I would think of the honors that awaited me—of the time when I should be numbered among the heroes of my country; and would sigh to reflect that the lovely flower which so proudly I would have twined among my laurels would be blushing unseen in the lowly cottage of a country schoolmaster.

During my first cruise, which lasted nearly two years, I was so fortunate as to distinguish myself on several occasions. But I panted for higher honors; and on our return to port, finding a fine frigate on the point of sailing, I solicited permission to join her, and being considered as an efficient officer, my request was granted, and I sailed on another cruise, without setting my foot on shore. This act of devotedness to my profession raised me in the eyes of my commander, who afforded me every opportunity of acquiring distinction. I now rose rapidly. When at sea I was engaged in every hazardous enterprise, and when in foreign ports my superior introduced me into the best society. Among the exotic beauties whom I beheld, I saw none so beautiful as Lucy, but many who were more polished; perhaps my taste became vitiated, for although I still cherished the memory of her unpretending graces, I learned to admire the more dazzling charms of others, and to indulge the thought that I might at some future day adore another in her stead.

After a long cruise, in which many dangerous exploits were attempted, and some of them brilliantly accomplished, we were homeward bound, when we fell in with a fine frigate of the enemy. Both ships were soon cleared for action, and after a bloody engagement we succeeded in capturing our foe. I was now acting as a lieutenant, and having the good fortune to be stationed on the spar-deck, immediately under the eye of my commander, received his compliments for my conduct.

We came into port triumphantly. Public honors of the highest character were awarded to us. Dinners and balls were given, and the population of a great city vied in the expression of their patriotic gratitude; while the newspapers throughout the whole continent were filled with our praises. I was promoted to a lieutenancy, and had the gratification of seeing my name emblazoned in the public prints, with those of my distinguished superiors. In these proud moments I did not forget my fair cousin; entirely as I had resigned her, and cordially as I wished her happiness, I sighed to think of her obscure and lonely fate. With a partner so bright, so gentle, and so dear, to share my laurels, I should have been supremely happy; and I could not but marvel at the capricious decree of fortune, which had doomed one, who might have shone as the bride of a naval hero, to drag out her existence in the vulgar lot of wife to a country pedagogue.

I had written to my parents on my arrival; but a round of entertainments, given in honor of our victory, prevented me from visiting them. One evening, as I strolled through the streets with a friend, we passed a spacious church, into which crowds of fashionable people were hurrying with apparent eagerness.

"Let us go in here," said my companion, "and hear the fashionable preacher, one who has turned the heads of the whole town, and is more talked of than Commodore Perry or General Scott. He is a new man, who has eclipsed all his contemporaries by his eloquence, while his learning and modesty win universal esteem."

We entered the church, and I looked round upon the novel exhibition, as upon some fairy scene. It was long since I had sat in the bosom of a worshipping congregation; and how different was this from the rustic assemblage that I had been accustomed to see, gathered in pious silence under the school-house oaks! Here was a splendid edifice, ornamented with gilding, decorated with rich hangings, and lighted with brilliant chandeliers, whose intense effulgence awakened in my unpractised heart a thrilling sensation of excitement. But the audience, how gay, how gorgeous, how beautiful! Those to whom such scenes are familiar can form but a faint idea of the impression made by a fair and fashionable crowd upon the mind of one accustomed only to rustic assemblages, or to the hardy multitudes who fill the camp or crowd the quarter-deck. Here were gems, and plumes, and silks, and glowing cheeks, and sparkling eyes; but there was also a simple elegance in the attire, a sedateness in the demeanor, and above all a devout humility reigning throughout this thrilling scene, that added to it a solemn grandeur, which exceeds my powers of description. My heart was elevated as I gazed on that rich, and silent, and motionless picture; and I felt how the omnipotent influence of religion can quell the happy, and soothe the wretched, and win the gay, and calm down all the tumultuous passions of human nature, as oil poured upon the waves reduces them to a placid surface.

At length the preacher arose, and every eye was turned towards him. I looked up, and what was my surprise at beholding Alexis! I could not be mistaken, for there he stood in the same simple attire, with the same humble aspect, and the same benignant smile, that were so familiarly impressed upon my recollection. His manner had all its former mildness, and his voice its accustomed melody; there was only a little more of fullness and compass in the one, and a slight tinge of self-confidence added to the other. His sermon was eloquent and able; the language was clear, classical, and simple, the manner of its delivery calm and unassuming. His voice was never strained, and seldom elevated above its ordinary pitch; it swelled and softened upon the ear, without the slightest effort on the part of the speaker, without the least violence to the sense of the hearer. There was no labor of the body; the arm was never extended, the hand only was raised occasionally from the cushion. The whole manner of the speaker was mild and persuasive; his argument was acute, close, and powerful, without any attempt to adorn it with the graces of composition, or to win applause by the arts of oratory; yet such was the effect produced by the delicate choice of harmonious words, their symmetrical arrangement and chaste delivery, together with the apostolic earnestness, and an air of pious conviction that breathed throughout, that all felt and acknowledged that the speaker had opened a new vein of genuine eloquence.

The deep silence that prevailed during the sermon, and the subdued murmur of applause that ran in whispers through the congregation when the service was over, attested the powerful effect of the discourse. As the people dispersed I endeavored to make my way to Mr. Alexis, but the crowd was so great as to prevent me from reaching the pulpit until he had disappeared; and as it was late I returned to my lodgings, determined to seek him on the following day. I now saw that Lucy was not wedded to obscurity and indigence, and gave her full credit for having discovered a man of genius and feeling in the despised schoolmaster, who had been so long the object of my contempt and aversion. I took shame to myself for having presumed to institute comparisons between Alexis and myself; and felt humble in acknowledging that my ephemeral honors would be soon forgotten, while his useful career and splendid powers would sustain for him a brilliant reputation during his existence, and earn a name, which his countrymen would cherish with gratitude when he should be no more. One thing flattered my pride and consoled my prejudices: I learned that Mr. Alexis had long since abandoned his former vocation, and that my cousin had not, after all, married a schoolmaster.

On the following morning early Mr. Alexis anticipated my visit, by calling to see me. We met cordially; and on the day after were jogging sociably together towards my native place. I found Lucy a proud and happy wife. They had built a neat cottage on the school-house hill, in the midst of that beautiful grove, which they carefully preserved in memory of former days; and I now found that I had not been singular in my admiration of its sylvan graces. The school-house had been removed; and a large plain meeting-house, on a neighboring eminence, is occupied by a numerous congregation, under the ministry of Alexis. Loved and honored by his former pupils, the worthy pastor is surrounded by them, who look up to him with gratitude as the teacher of their youth, and with reverence as the guide of their maturity; while the happy Lucy, in the society of her early friends and chosen partner, enjoys the sweetest fruits of innocence and virtue. Here they live in contentment and honor; and when I witnessed their placid lives, their pious labors, their active benevolence, and simple virtues, I scarcely knew which to love and admire most, my fair and gentle cousin Lucy, or my ancient rival, but now my very reverend and much honored cousin, "the schoolmaster."

PRISON SCENES.

THE heavy portals closed on me. I heard the rattling of chains and the step of the turnkey retreating. The dampness and gloom of the dismal walls curdled my very soul. I was a prisoner, thrust in among thieves, pirates, murderers, and brutal wretches of every description. The tenderness of a woman stole into my heart, and I sat down on a broken bench in a shadowy nook, and covering my face with my hands, suffered the large hot tears to swell up and gush out freely. As the night advanced, the keeper came to me. He was a huge man, with the look of a brute. Every vile bad passion seemed to have added an expression to his scoundrel face. His eyes were small and of a greenish gray, a pointed hooked nose, enormous whiskers, and bilious sallow complexion, were set off with a frown, which constant bullying among the wretches under his charge had deepened into a permanent scowl of cruelty and hatred. He had the most disagreeable voice I ever heard. It resembled the discordant cry of a savage bird of prey, and always made me shudder. His salutation was suited to his appearance.

"Here, clear out from there," he said with a shove. "It's bed time."

The blood mounted into my temples, with a passion that was painful. I raised my arm to strike, when he cut me on the head with a whalebone whip, and screamed out for a guard, who grasped me with an iron hand by the shoulder, and almost lifted me from my feet. Loading me with every epithet of insult, the keeper struck me again with his stick, while the soldier held me with the strength of a giant, and the next moment I found myself lying at full-length on the stone floor of a narrow cell, in which I perceived I was locked for the night. A faint light shone in through a grated window, and discovered two straw beds, the only furniture, on one of which sat another figure. He was motionless as a statue, and in the confusion of the moment I scarcely knew whether it was an apparition conjured up by my excited fancy, or a figure hewn out of granite, or a human being and wretched prisoner like myself. I looked at him with a fearful interest. He was of a colossal size. An expression of fixed and stern despair was in his rough and savage face; and seated on the pavement his cheek and temple rested on the outspread palm of his brawny hand. He did not even look at me, although the manner in which I was hurled into the apartment was sufficiently abrupt to have at least excited the notice of any ordinary person. There was a dead silence for a minute, during which he sat gazing steadily at the narrow piece of sky visible through the small barred window. There was something in his attitude and aspect that made my blood cold, and sent it back from the swollen veins of my forehead, and deadened the fury which had burned in my heart.

"Who are you?" I exclaimed, in a whisper so low that I scarcely knew whether it was more than my own thought, but it sounded distinctly through the deep hush of the dungeon, and he slowly turned his large fierce eyes upon mine. As he moved, too, there was a rattling of chains; and I perceived that he was heavily fettered by manacles, which were fastened by massive iron rings close to his ankles and wrists.

"I am Lopez, senior," said he, with a foreign accent, and in a voice full of melody.

I actually started, and lay with my head drawn back as far as possible against the rough stone wall, and a feeling of horror vibrated through every nerve of my body. He was a pirate, of noted ferocity, who had committed more monstrous murders than men could enumerate. He was a by-word around the winter fire of thousands of families, and his name used to check the smile of the sailor's wife, and make the merry faces of his children turn white with awe. I remembered to have heard that this terrible ruffian had been captured, and was waiting the punishment of death in the prison of N—; but in the hurry and anguish of my own sudden calamity I had forgotten it. I was not likely to forget it again.

I began soon to distinguish his features more accurately as my eye graduated itself to the dim light, and I perceived a smile slowly break out upon the shadows of his face, betraying a line of white teeth, contrasted finely with the sable curl on his lip, and his deeply expressive eyes lighted up for a moment. He really looked beautiful. A picture of him, with that proud deliberate smile, the black soft hair curled closely upon his broad clear forehead, and the collar falling back from his athletic throat and chest, might have passed for the hero of many a romance, which steals the sweet eyes of the enamored girl from her midnight slumber.

"Boy," he said, with a rich Spanish accent, and in the same mellow tone, which touched me like a rebuke for its gentleness, "what, are you, too, afraid? I will not hurt you. I will never hurt any one again. Let us be friends. Here is my hand."

I reached out mine, and he shook it with feeling.

"And how long have you been here, Lopez?" I asked, in some measure recovering my natural mood.

"Two months."

"And how long—" I stopped.

"You are a stranger here—no?" he inquired.

"Yes," I answered; "I never was here before."

"Then I know what you want," said he. "You want to know when I shall die?"

I shuddered, and nodded my head.

"To-morrow morning," said he, with an indescribable expression, and a kind of ashy paleness settling over his features, yet in a voice remarkably firm. "I must be dragged out to-morrow like a beast before my fellow-beings, and to-morrow night you will be sitting here alone—and where shall I be? Oh God! Oh God!"

The barrier of his feelings seemed to have been no longer strong enough to contain them, but to break away on a sudden, and he shook with an agitation so tremendous, that I thought his existence would end at once. Presently he recovered. It was wonderful to see him force himself back into an air of resolute calmness, and dash away the tears from his lashes.

I had always experienced a feverish curiosity respecting the effect upon the mind of a brave villain of immediate death, and began in conversation with this wretched individual to realize a fearful pleasure. He was strangely hardened upon the subject of his crimes, which he confessed freely, and in that respect only differed from other people. We have a false idea, many of us, that a murderer or professed pirate is an intrinsic monster; but I found this unfortunate being only a man—gifted with many of man's best attributes, compassion, courage, perseverance, generosity, and even delicacy of sentiment. He was only a man, who had committed monstrous deeds, with the same qualities as ourselves, but led away into dark places by sophistry and passion. I name this distinction that the innocent and high-minded, in perusing the history of such a creature, may not look upon it as something with which they themselves can have no relation, but rather as a career into which they may be plunged unless ever watchful to shun the most trifling deviations from principle, and avoid cruelty or impetuosity in ordinary affairs.

As the weary hours of the night rolled on, I spoke these sentiments to the condemned pirate, and won so on his confidence that he told me I was the only being who had ever treated him with kindness since his boyhood.

"Had you possessed parents," said I, "to train you up in the proper course?"

"It was my father's cruelty," interrupted he, "that made me what I am. When once guilty, I despaired of forgiveness from man or heaven, and went on desperately shedding blood; but my father drove me from my home by a blow. A blow," he repeated with a fierce glance, as if he even yet writhed beneath it, "and I was a villain from that moment. I shall think of that to-morrow, when strangling before the thousands. I will tell you," he said, "how I was blasted when I was a boy. I was not tame and crouching, like other boys, but nature had filled me with unmanageable feelings. When any one made me angry, I lost my self-command; when they were kind to me, I never forgot it. I could not sleep for gratitude. My father was a cruel man; he never loved me, and I should have left him before but for a girl. I was only a boy, and we loved each other. One night I had been sitting with her, we had mutually promised to be faithful, and I left her with such a full happiness that I scarcely heard the stern question of my father, 'Where have you been so late, senior?' Instead of repeating it, he struck me. I dashed away like a wild deer. It happened that the very day before I had been strongly persuaded to embark as sailor on board a ship bound for the West Indies. I flew to the friend who had made me the offer, and accepted it. We were to sail the next day but one. My heart failed me afterwards, and I went back to my dwelling in the night. It was a cloudy and blustering evening. I looked in at the window, and saw my mother and sisters: they were weeping—weeping for me—and Rosa was there too; and several times she turned her large clear blue tearful eyes full upon the window where I stood. My soul relented, and I was about to rush in when the door opened, and my father entered with his erect form, and cold, stern, cruel look. The sight of him brought back all the tumult of my bosom. I stamped my foot and clenched my fist, then cast one last look upon my aged mother, my affectionate sisters, and dear Rosa. I never saw them more. They are ignorant of my fate. Perhaps to-morrow, when I am struggling in the last agonies, they will be smiling. They have forgotten me. Oh that to-morrow were past!"

I asked him if he did not repent of his crimes since committed.

"No," he answered, with the look of a demon—"No: I glory in them. Man has hunted me, and fortune too. I have never known friendship nor kindness; and now they have taken me as others would a monster, and will put me to death. I have no regret for any crime except one, and that, I confess, haunts me, and always has haunted me. When I was in the Caribbean sea, I commanded a piratical brig, and we boarded and took a merchantman well loaded with specie. We murdered all the crew, cut them to pieces, or shot them down just where they happened to be. The deck was slippery with blood. They were all massacred."

"Monster!" exclaimed I—"Execrable monster!"

"Nay," he continued, with a hoarse horrid laugh, "that was nothing. It is no more to me at this moment than if they had been so many adders, and I had crushed their venomous heads with my heel. But—"

He paused, drooped the lids over his eyes, and drew his breath in between his half closed lips, as if recalling to memory some horror which stung him acutely to the nerve. I was almost frightened to be thus alone, at midnight, in a dungeon with a being capable of such atrocious deeds. I thought his desperation might next induce him to grasp my throat with those giant hands, and from the very wantonness of the madness that seemed creeping over him, add one more victim to the bloody catalogue.

"Do not go on," I exclaimed, shrinking from him as far as I could. He seized my arm with startling energy. The chains upon his limbs rattled and clashed.

"But I will go on." His voice had now altered to a scream—shrill and piercing. "I must go on, boy. You must hear it. It has been locked up in the core of my heart for years, like a living coal, burning and burning and burning; and if I do not reveal it to you, I shall never reveal it; for to-morrow, you know, I am to take the leap—ha, ha, ha—short time for story-telling, my friend; but I will tell you—and I would tell you," he added, with an oath that made my head swim, as his dilated eyes glared with terrible ferocity—"I would tell you, though I knew it would bring these accursed walls tumbling down about our ears. What! you are frightened, my poor fellow. Well, come," he said, relaxing his grasp and patting me on the shoulder affectionately, "why should I injure you? Why should I rush into the presence of an already offended God, with my hands reeking and smoking with the blood of the only one who ever looked on me with pity, or said a gentle word to me, since I turned away from those blue eyes of Rosa's, for ever and ever. Rosa," he repeated, musingly—"Rosa—why may not this be all a dream? Why may I not wake presently and find that same sweet face bending over me, and feel the soft kind hand on my lot forehead, and hear that beloved voice instead of the clank of chains, and open my eyes to the graceful drapery of curtains, and gaze on the soft June sky through the window, and feel these hideous dungeon walls melting away from around me, as the fumes of slumber pass off."

He resumed the attitude in which he sat when I entered, and remained long without speaking. I even began to feel sleepy. For several nights I had been a watcher; and so I stretched myself down upon the thin straw, and wished, like my companion, that this might be all a dream. He soon followed my example, and by his silence I thought him

"As fast locked up in sleep, as guiltless labor,
When it lies starkly in the traveller's bones."

After some time he started up and paced the narrow room with a desperate impatience, sometimes uttering such a groan that my eyes were filled with tears of compassion. He saw them as our eyes met, and I perceived that he himself was again weeping; he came to me softly, and taking my hand, kissed it, and said—

"If you wish God to bless you in your last extremity, hear me speak this secret. I will be gentle. I wish to unload my conscience. It is the only act of my life that I never could remember without trembling. I told you of the merchantman—the murder of the crew. Mother and child, husband and wife, were struck that day in each other's arms, and went down into the still sea. The bubbling water, stained with gore, told that the flood was finishing what the axe, the bullet, and the knife had half performed. But of all these, there was one—a young girl of such a remarkable loveliness, that her perfect face touched me—even me whose red fingers were but just unlocked from the blood wet hair of her father. The old gentleman was game—I half liked him, for he showed fight to the end, and fired at me with a pistol for putting my hand under his girl's chin. Ha, ha, ha—he'd have got over that squeamishness if he'd lived a little longer; but that could not be. The girl prayed so hard for life on any terms, that I could not resist, and we spared her. I could not but think how many throned kings, how many dukes and lords would have given their eyes almost, to have had those lips to touch; and to sit still and make those delicious blue eyes look up into their face for protection on any terms as they did in mine. I saved her for several weeks; but we found it necessary to put into shore, and the crew began to grumble, and I thought myself that we stood a chance of a rope should any one fall afoul of us with this tender thing on board. So one morning—" (his face grew deadly pale) "the creature was standing with me near the gangway. She seemed to have clung to me through the whole of it, and called me her preserver—and I stood with her here talking as I might have done to Rosa herself, had I grown up in virtue and honor, and been a happy and proud husband of so much love and beauty. She had not the slightest suspicion of my purpose, and when I drew out the cutlass, she took the glittering blade in her fingers, played with the jewels on the handle, and even with a kind of sweet sportiveness fitted it to my thigh, and said 'I looked the soldier well.' I should have spared her at all risks, but I knew my men, and they were exchanging signs together, and the mate, who was a devil incarnate, came twice up to me with a gruff shout—'We're nearly ashore, captain!' I never shuddered at any thing before. My heart sickened, my eyes were wet, and my hand trembled. She inquired, in a voice of tenderness that could not have been assumed, if I was unwell. I put my lips to hers and kissed her with an agony, and then the flashing cutlass descended on her curled head, and I was covered with her blood. She screamed!" Here his voice faltered—his face grew paler and paler, resembling the pallid countenance of a corpse—"she clung to the shrouds—I seized her sweet form in my arms and threw her over. Still she clung with a convulsive tenacity, and—and—"

I covered my ears to shut out the conclusion, but could not.

"She gave me one look as I cut off her hands, one of which lay bleeding on the deck. The body fell with a heavy splash into the smooth clear water. Her lovely head, with its beautiful tresses, lingered a moment on the surface—then the ripples died away quietly in extending circles. I heard her voice never again, except when the scream startled me from my midnight slumber. I have told my secret. To-morrow, at sunrise—"

He started up wildly and gazed from the window. The stars were paling their beams, and a faint light beamed from the horizon, growing every instant broader and clearer. Then the fiery streaks shot up and glanced far along the reddening arch. My companion shook his head, and calmed his manner; then he stooped, and laid his ear to the floor; a minute after the door opened, officers of justice and clergymen entered. A man gave him a white dress, which he put on in silence. His face was absolutely yellow, and a streak of white upon his upper lip betrayed his agitation; but he was firm and proud in his demeanor. He shook me once by the hand, closed his eyes a moment, and then motioned them to lead the way. There was a bustle in the prison. I sat watching the fantastic clouds burning in the east, till the dazzling rim of the sun peered above the line, as it slowly lifted its vast circumference into full view. A kind stranger in an hour brought me a riband, which he said Lopez had desired should be handed me, after all was over, with his last farewell. I cannot express the strange thoughts with which I looked on this token of friendship.

SEDLEY.

CONCERT.—We perceive that Madame Brichta intends giving a concert on Thursday evening next, at the City hotel. The orchestra is to be strengthened by auxiliaries from the French opera. The entertainment will no doubt be attractive, and we trust that this appeal to the liberality of the public will be successful.

London, September 6th, 1831.

GENTLEMEN—I have been at a phrenological gallery—a collection most industriously and ingeniously made, till it has become a marvel—a specimen of the effect of perseverance, and a place to dream strange dreams in. Its owner, too, Mr. De Ville, is an original—he is a tradesman in the Strand, but a rich one, and he rides his hobby magnificently, and has built up a reputation on this whim, till he has made himself recherché at great tables, is consulted upon the education of young geniuses, and sought for as an oracle in cases of lunatico inquirendo. He deserves to be modelled in plaster and placed on high among the assembly he has convened; for I assure you there are more worse heads among them than better, and that on some of the fairest shelves. He has earned his celebrity well, sparing neither money nor pains, nor cool assurance; but if you have a head remarkable for coronet or mitre, or for a triangular shape, so that it looks like a cocked-hat when you have none on, or if you are a good specimen of hydrocephalus, or a poet, or a statesman, or a fool, he lets you know no rest till you are modelled and set among your class on his shelf in plaster; only if you are mad, he lets you die first, for much experience has proved that in that case there is no hope of taking you alive. And when you arrive at this haven, where you must be, what a choice of neighborhood! Are you a pugilist?—there are Crib, Spring, Mendoza, Gully, Batavian Sam, and the Game Chicken—whose jowl will you put your cheek by? They are not dangerous, taken without their fists. Are you a bishop?—there is an equal choice, though I cannot call names so readily; or what you will, there is a place for you and a row of fit companions, stony-featured fellows, "lifelike but lifeless," where like Sardanapalus, you may find such sympathy

"as if they
Had lost the half of death to come to you,
And you the half of life to sit by them."

There is a long row of heads remarkable for nothing but the very great or very small development of some organ; each one in its succession exemplified in each of its extremes, associated as I have known people at dinner parties, where every man is as unlike its next neighbor as possible, and where no two can blend their opposition into any thing harmonious any more than can these lumps of plaster. And there is another set, to which each individual subject has furnished two or three casts at different times of his life and stages of his character. First perhaps he was avaricious, griping and mean; one that would "grind the faces of the poor," and "circumvent God;" a wretch that doted upon halfpence. You need not tell me so—can I not see it? His organs of acquisitiveness are puffed out like watches—they are deformities, positive wens; and then his benevolence—his unseen benevolence—its place is represented by a trench, a deep channel—what a stream of charity would that be that should fill it! Yet look again—'tis full! That next cast is the same individual, but taken four years later, and quantum mutatus! The mountains and hills are brought low, the valleys are exalted; and when this cast was taken, was not the whole man changed? Indeed he was—this is no dream nor fiction—the unclean spirit was gone out of him—he was liberal, and humane, and affectionate; and every eye that saw him blessed him. But opposite there is crime; a collection of deadly looking fellows, moulded in prisons, some of them with the expressions yet upon their features, of the stinging hunger that drove them into deeds which they were called to expiate before it was appeased. Cadaverous and ghastly, their sunk cheeks and hollow eyes suit well with the paleness of the plaster. Look at them, for they are not all devil. Here is one who was educated for this end. He was qualified for much of good or evil. He had

"All the energy which should have made
A goodly frame of glorious elements,
Had they been wisely mingled."

but he was elaborately prepared for a victim to temptation, blindfolded assiduously and led on to disappointment, and shaken out suddenly upon a world so inhospitable that he found his first harbor in a dungeon that opened on a grave. "Hath this man sinned, or his father?" Read his history or examine his head; their evidence is the same. But pass on—here is that that shall reconcile us to the law. It is a foreign criminal; a villain priest, who insinuated himself into a family under the mask of religion, and attempted to enrich himself by getting them disinherited; failing in that he forged a will, and then committed a murder to make it available, and another to be rid of an accomplice; and thus far he went on securely, and might have rested in possession of the reward he had labored for; but over caution led him one step further. He attempted another murder of one whom he thought suspected him, and failed in the attempt, and his whole train was blown up in the investigation it gave rise to. But this man was wary and calculating—mathematical even—his head shows it, and he possessed the talent; and worldly wise to that degree, that with a soul capable of all these things he lived in honor and respect until he did them; and self-possessed, so that no look or word betrayed him, and hardened so that though the damning proofs of his guilt were multiplied into tenfold certainty, he faced them all, asserted his innocence meekly, but inflexibly, and died with the air of a martyr. Cruelty, avarice, caution, tenacity of purpose, (I spare you the technicalities) such are the phenomena of this head, and so well do its developments correspond to the use the wearer made of it. Pass on—the next class are well placed next. They are the casts of lunatics. Here is a fellow that died for love—a fond fool, that adored the beau ideal and went about in search of it; that strayed to and fro through the earth seeking for such a resting place (for his heart) as never did and never will exist, and wandered and no end of wandering found. And here is his counterpart—a saucy wench, that refused half a dozen good offers, some of them half a dozen times. There is nothing amiable about her head; but I love her better dead than I ever should have thought to do while she lived. She is a very rare and valuable specimen. And here is a religious madman, a starved anchorite, one that worshipped the "All Giver," by refusing his gifts; by living in cynic independence, scorning the name of enjoyment. And here is a row of fanatics in the same sort, in less and less degrees, but all of them were mad. And now their contrast is an atheist, who lost himself in speculations upon the possibility of a world without a presiding intelligence, till his own brain became the type of it. Here is an old bachelor, who lived only for his own narrow views of enjoyment, and fancied that because one and one make two in the arithmetic, it should be the same in a household; an inert brute that never took the pains to learn even the true theory of selfishness. Here he is—the outside of his head is moulded faithfully, and the inside I doubt not equally well represented.

But enough. Suffice it for the present to add, that I came to this strange place a scoffer, and came out of it a convert, almost if not quite altogether, to the doctrines of its master. And let me advise all those who are in the habit of exercising their wit at the expense of phrenologists, to improve it by an acquaintance with some of them, for though no doubt much that is visionary has been advanced on this subject; much also that is curious and useful has been discovered and demonstrated. Yours, truly,

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

BARON VON RAFFLEOFF, THE PEDLER.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

I SHOULD like Lebanon better, if the Hudson had thought proper to roll through its broad valley, and if mine host of the inn had not lodged me in the bath-house. One gets tired of pacing those rectangular piazzas, and gazing on the foliage of the great hills, heaving their everlastingly green summits up to the sky, as if there were no other color in nature. The only décennuyé hour I spent there was in learning to make hair rings of the old gaberlunzie who drives that trade at the well.

Saratoga is more tolerable, because it does not pretend to scenery, and therefore you do not fret yourself about it; because, if you are not disposed to stifle in the bachelor's wing at Congress-hall, you may lodge like a luxurious hermit at the Pavilion; because the four hotels draw each their own kind of company, and you may choose between them; because the lake is within an unbroken trot; and because Mr. Drake is the prince of hotel-keepers, and makes rare juleps. I do not like to live on a sand bank, however, and the stage-runners have a pestilential habit of thrusting their cards at you, if you but button your coat or shake hands with a friend on the piazza. Besides, I never drink water, and a man is nothing at Saratoga who cannot bolt seven tumblers before breakfast.

But Ballston—quiet, exclusive, insouciant "Sans Souci!"—with its cool halls and its aside parlors—its pretty village and its bubbling wells—its nice rooms and its learned bar-keeper—"in! satcharine!" he would say, as he added the last lump to the arrack punches! glorious Ballston! quiet as the caverns of Trophonius, and yet social as a pic-nic by a stream—how little are you prized by many, and how lovingly are you haunted by the few!

A summer or two since, I was set down by Messrs. "Rice and Baker" (fresh cattle and new coaches all the way—the driver periled his salvation on it) under the broad elms of Sans Souci. A bath and a brief toilet left me just time, before dinner, to bespeak my pale sherry and send up my card to my fidus Achates, Tom Lascelles, who had preceded me by a day or two. Hunger is an incurious animal, and under cover of Lascelles, who had given me a seat between himself and a deaf gentleman, I played my fork through the succulent courses in silence. We were at last fairly down to the mahogany, and I commenced my observations. There were some three hundred well-dressed people at the tables, most of them, of course, like the razor-grinder, with, "no story to tell," and all too busy, (the old with their wine and politics, and the young with their fate-almonds and flirtation) to mind a brace of modest bachelors, though they leveled their glasses at them never so inquisitively.

I think the pleasantest hour in the twenty-four is the one which follows the removal of the cloth from the dinner-table. It is particularly true at a watering-place. You must, of course, have an agreeable woman on one side, a friend to listen to your "asides" on the other, no duenna within earshot, and no popular dish near enough to trouble you—but these are circumstances within the compass of good generalship, and it is your own fault if you are not so situated. I say, the first hour after the cloth is removed, because, though you sit longer, the ladies do not, and a gentleman party without them (unless they are choice spirits and a little less promiscuous than society is apt to be at the springs) is one of those horrors from which heaven send us a good deliverance! Before that period, there is no pleasure beyond that of eating, for no civilized person ever converses during that operation. But, with the cloth, all materiality passes away. The rich odors of the wines pervade the hall, the senses are all at repose, the mind is tranquil and fruitful, and a sentiment of conscious grace and self-satisfaction is felt by every one who is capable of such a feeling. If you would deepen the color of a flirtation, that is your time. If you would dazzle a new acquaintance, you will never be more felicitous. If you would conciliate the Hesperian dragon, (Anglice, your mistress's aunt) if you would conquer an aversion, if you would improvise, or theorize, or do any desperate thing—this is la bonne heure—the gods are propitious.

My inquiries were very general, and Tom answered them with great particularity. The characters of my story, however, are the only ones of the three hundred who would at all interest the reader.

A pale, singular looking girl, with high cheek bones, and prominent blue eyes, struck me particularly. She sat leaning upon the table, and watching the fate of a written almond which the fellow next her, in whiskers, had just dropped into her glass. Her mouth had that expression of slight scorn about it which is so captivating in a woman, and her dress and the arrangement of her hair, without being negligent, a graceful carelessness of style infinitely becoming. I think for an ugly woman, as she certainly would be called, she excited my curiosity more than any one I had ever met.

An elderly man, with a foreign air, sat just opposite us, talking to no one, and having nothing in his grave features which could be construed as an encouragement to conversation. His nose was long and slightly purpled, and he drank his claret from a large, singularly formed glass of his own, in quantities which would have accounted for even a deeper tinge. I had met him before at different watering-places, but never had learned more of his history than was comprised in the "Lord C—" entered by his servant upon the book. His habits were singular but unobtrusive; and though he was naturally the subject of much curiosity, his grave and respectable demeanor always repressed impertinence. For several weeks he had appeared at Sans Souci regularly on the first of July, and disappeared regularly on the thirtieth, had worn always a broad-rimmed hat, with a round air-hole in the crown, and promenaded in fair weather and foul, his habitual number of hours upon the piazza. The greatest mystery about him, however, was his familiar acquaintance with all the diplomatic characters and distinguished foreigners who arrived, and the uniform silence they preserved with respect to his rank and character. Notwithstanding his severe gravity, I had liked him from the first time we had met, and thought I could detect beneath his repulsive manners a natural and suppressed kindness of disposition. By slight courtesies I had, the year before, so far won upon him, that on alternate days we exchanged the compliment of taking wine together, and on meeting me now, again he acknowledged the acquaintance by a slight bow, and something which was meant for a smile.

We left the table early, and as I passed out, I observed a young man standing outside the window, and looking earnestly through a crevice of the blind, in the direction of the interesting German. He was a pedler, Tom informed me, who, from a practice of getting up a raffle every morning for his jewelry, and a certain amusing dignity he sometimes assumed, was called Baron Von Raffleoff. He had entertained them since his arrival by singing troubadour songs to his guitar, which he did with great skill and sweetness, and by the passionate manner in which, sometimes, in a fit of enthusiasm, he addressed his song to the fair Meeta, who was his most attentive listener.

In a day or two, we had made the acquaintance of all the visitors who were worth knowing, and fell into the usual routine of occupation and amusement. Breakfast at nine, a drive to Saratoga or the Lake in the morning, and perhaps a pic-nic dinner at Barhydt's, a dance at evening, or a ramble by moonlight to the wells, made up, with the usual agremens of such places, the day's history. Added to this, Lascelles, who was a wit of the first water, and a scribbler of any velocity, published, with the assistance of those who were disposed, a daily manuscript Gazette of half a sheet, in which the bores were quizzed, the assuming epigrammatized, and incidents, arrivals, and departures formally recorded. It was by no means the least amusing circumstance of the day, and I commend the experiment to all bachelor annuals who would avoid the foul fiend and get fame for bad verses.

Among so many belles, there were some, of course, who were beautiful, and some who were agreeable but not beautiful; and I have in my eye (my mind's eye) at this moment, a head whose toes would "fire another Troy," and a figure and step, with the voice they moved to, and the laughing figure they bore, that would stay any gentleman angel from Paradise. But Meeta—my own interesting, though not beautiful Meeta—with all the deep-hearted enthusiasm of her nation sleeping in her melancholy eyes, and a voice that would fill with feeling like a reed, or murmur if she was happy in the clouded cadences of water—strange, visionary, glorious Meeta—I preferred her then, as now in my reminiscences I prefer her, infinitely to them all. I scorn to deny, however, that sometimes in the dance her tall proportions contrasted awkwardly with the gliding graces of the lighter-framed houri about her; and I have detected a skulking suffusion in my cheek when some critical glass from the "wall-flowers" was bent superciliously upon her angular chassé—but a tone, or a look, or better still, a golden thought whispered in my ear, has revived my admiration, and enveloped her rude figure with the lightness and floating grace of a Hebe. There was something so new and startling about her—she had such a way of sending the fire into her immense "lamping" eyes, and her way of thinking was so gloriously fresh and peculiar, that talking with her was a constant surprise. The king in the story need never have offered gold for a new sensation with such a woman in his kingdom.

I had been at Ballston a week, and had become exceedingly interested in Meeta. We rode and rambled together, she taught me German and I taught her billiards, we discoursed and satirized and sentimentalized, talked of every thing dreamed of in philosophy—but strangely enough, whatever the theme with which we began, we were sure to fall at last into speculations upon the pedler and his accomplishments. The interest, to my surprise, too, seemed to be mutual, for we encountered him at every turn in the road, and I met his eye fixed upon me from some window or door—dancing or promenading—whenever and wherever I was in company with my air friend. Even at Barhydt's, when we had paddled off in a canoe, to float away a hot afternoon under the cool shelter of the wood upon the western side of the little lake, the pedler's voice, singing one of his richest ballads, came out over the water, and presently his figure appeared among the trees, and he stood, thinking himself unseen, and watched us till we went ashore. I was a little captivated with the romance of the circumstance, and as we drove loiteringly home at sunset, I indulged myself with a famous castle in the air, apparently much more to my own amusement than that of my fair companion, who leaned over the side of the tilbury, absorbed in her own thoughts, and scarce paying me the attention even of an encouraging monosyllable.

There was no dance that evening, and the pedler, as usual when there was nothing else to be done, was called in to sing. Meeta had been walking up and down the long hall hanging upon my arm, and as she seated herself upon the sofa, he took his station opposite, where the light of the chandelier fell upon his face, and struck at once into one of his most passionate songs. The excitement of it seemed to transform him. His head rose gradually from its usual drooping position, his lips curved into an expression of mingled scorn and tenderness, and at passages of his verse he struck his foot violently on the floor, and threw his hand over the strings with an energy that I supposed common only to the excitable frame of the improvisatore. He stood a moment when the song was closed, and then, without bowing to the company, or assuming his general modest demeanor, as usual, he threw his guitar with a haughty gesture over his arm, and strided out of the room.

There was a general silence for a minute, and every eye was fixed on the door through which he had passed. Pride, in one of an inferior station, however, is not a quality likely to meet with much favor in such an atmosphere, and the severe remarks made in our hearing upon his conduct were fast bringing a cloud over the changeable features of Meeta, when I broke in upon her reflections with some expressions of admiration at his fine pride, which seemed to give her a satisfaction scarcely warranted, as I thought, by the importance of the subject. There is a convenient vanity in our nature, which disposes readily of these doubtful cases, and soon forgetting my wonder, I grew eloquent upon an impromptu theory of the effect of musical talent in ennobling the character, and when we parted for the night, I went to my room with a feeling of self-complacency much more elevated than usual.

I found Tom seated at my table with his claret and sandwiches, laughing, in the full tide of composition, over a new-born epigram. It was two hours to midnight, and I sat down and commenced a sonnet to Meeta, for the morning's Gazette. I hammered upon it, crassa Minerva, till near twelve, and was just vexing out the last limping Alexandrine, when a rapid and spirited air upon a guitar from the court beneath arrested my attention. The next moment a blind creaked upon its hinge, and looking out I saw a handkerchief shaken through the opening, and heard the sweetest of the German diminutives of endearment which I had learned the day before, addressed to the musician. An earnest conversation followed, and at last, after a few words in a more passionate tone from the gentleman, the lady disappeared, as I presumed, to join him below. Lascelles was too busily occupied to attend to what he supposed was only an ordinary serenade, and leaving the room without question, I gained the outer door just in time to catch a glimpse of a white dress passing out before me. The length of the winding staircase had given me time to reflect, and I stood a minute with my hand on the lock, doubting, even if my suspicions were correct, the honor and propriety of intruding. Jealousy and wounded vanity, however, soon overcame all scruples, and stepping out upon the colonnade, I saw before me, in the broad moonlight—Meeta and the pedler!

It seemed to me as if the night had grown suddenly sultry. I wondered how I could have been so cool the last two hours. My sonnet, perhaps, (ahem!)—hang the sonnet! I was glad I had not finished it! my sonnet must have absorbed my attention. Well—what should I do? knock down the pedler, or go to bed—or give Meeta a specimen of heroics? I was turning up my wristband, with an indefinite determination for something, I did not know what, when a heavy hand, without any warning of approach, was laid upon my shoulder.

"You had better not," said Lord H—, as I turned suddenly round, and met his steady eye, which even in the deep shadow of his broad hat, had an expression perfectly legible.

"And why not, sir," I replied, preparing to follow the lovers, "is he not a puppy of a pedler, and—"

"No, sir!" (how very positive a voice sounds by moonlight!) "No, sir,"—he is not a pedler, and if I do not mistake him, he is no puppy. But if you must follow them, with your leave I'll bear you company." And slipping his arm very coolly through mine, he walked me off in the direction they had taken.

"And pray, sir," said I, when we were fairly in the shadows upon the dark side of the street, "what interest have you in this romance?"

"None—except the desire to see two very true lovers happy. I was struck with the appearance of the pedler on his first arrival, and his various accomplishments soon convinced me that he was masquerading. I observed his attention to the movements of your fair friend, and in one of my unseasonable rambles overheard a conversation in German, like the one which first startled you to-night. I found an opportunity the next day to take him aside, and he told me what I now think proper to tell you, that he was a forbidden lover of Meeta's from the Rhine—a gentleman German student, who has had the romance to follow his mistress to this country, and after a year's wanderings as a pedler, has found her accidentally here. She is travelling with her uncle, who does not know him personally; and to-night, if you do not mar the plot, I think it probable he will persuade her to elope with him—a measure I should not recommend if I had not studied his character, and did not believe it for their mutual happiness."

Here was a thunderbolt! I saw through the matter. Her preference for my society had arisen from my innocent admiration of her lover! I was but the stalking-horse after all! Well—if I ever trust symptoms more—

We had arrived at the end of the street, and Meeta and her friend were entering the covered alcove of the South wells. We approached, and overheard him pleading eloquently with her to abandon her uncle. She hesitated long, but at length consented.

"And yet," said the baron, checking himself in the midst of his raptures, "I have no horses, and we cannot get away at this time of the night."

I flatter myself I stepped out very dramatically from behind the large elm that flings its shadow over the spring.

"Don't let that fret you, my dear baron! my friend Lascelles' horse Tempest is a fourteen-miler, and will put you in Albany before daylight, without whip. I will take the responsibility of Tom's anger, and harness him myself in five minutes."

I have an idea that Lord C— is the wandering jew. There is strong proof that he has been Julius Caesar, Napoleon, and Charles the Tenth, and I have contrived a pretty theory, (remind me to tell it to you,) proving that he will appear next in Portugal, and after crucifying Don Miguel, will cross over into Spain, and revive the glory of the Abencerrages.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 117.

I AM fond of a walk through the woods in autumn. The time and scene arouse a throng of unworldly, pleasant thoughts, which never visit the mind without strengthening and refreshing it. I make it a point to take a ramble of this kind just after the first frost, when the dying branches begin to change color, and the leaves to fall. The delights of the scene are so universally acknowledged, that scarcely an essayist or poet has ever existed without composing something upon the subject. Indeed falling leaves and fading forests have been so much handled by scribblers, both good and bad, that, like the moon and some other objects I could name, one is almost ashamed to have any thing to say about them. The other day, while reading the works of a great poet, I found so many recurrences to them and similar images, that I inwardly resolved never to resort to them for any assistance, in the course of my humble writings, however hard pushed I may be for a comparison, and to beware of stars, breezes, brooks, and birds, as if they were so many basilisks. If my lady's cheeks are ever so red, and her lips ever so ripe and pouting, I will not hint a word about roses or cherries; and I shall disclaim all acquaintance with alabaster, swans and new-fallen snow, in attempting to give the reader an idea of the beauty of her neck. These refinements in language must have been exceedingly interesting when discovered by the first writers, for they present resemblances between the moral and material world wonderfully striking and beautiful; but all their changes, in every imaginable combination, have been rung in the ears of readers for so many thousand years, that I have at times thought literature nearly at an end, the regions of thought and poetry exhausted, and that an original writer would be an absolute miracle. Not only have we to complain that language itself has been utterly used up, but that all the realms of imagination have been explored and appropriated by millions of litterati, swarming like locusts. I have no doubt the very subject which I am now bewailing has been bewailed by some disconsolate person hundreds of years ago. I do not see how mankind are to be rescued from this dilemma but by a general deluge, or an inroad from some savage hordes, who shall burn our libraries as they did that of Rome.

There is a friend of mine who somehow or other detected me in the act of inclosing one of my letters to the editors of the Mirror; and knowing my habits and modes of thinking, accused me so violently of the authorship of these numbers, that I was at length obliged to plead guilty. He, however, complimented me very highly upon their merit; and that I might be convinced of the sincerity of this praise, handed me several manuscripts of his own, requesting me to correct and criticize just as I pleased. He has read enough to catch the slang of poetry without getting sick of it, and he has no idea but that everybody relishes a good round simile as well as himself; although, in fact, it resembles the cast-off clothes of a gentleman, worn only by the lower orders. When I tell him such a sentiment is very fine, but he had better erase it, he lays me down such a host of noble writers who have used the same thought, that I dare not say any thing further against it. It is the easiest thing in the world, consequently, for him to compose. He has all his materials ready-made, and only troubles himself to put them together on the particular subject which engages his attention. All his heroes' eyes flash fire, and his heroines are formed like sylphs, nymphs, and angels. Their voices are like music, except some are silken and some silver. When any young girl loses her lover, his treachery strikes her with lightning, of course; and if she does not recover soon she turns into a flower, with a worm in the bud, or a dove shot under the wing. Every hope that is not realized scatters his pages with withered leaves. I had quite a warm discussion with him respecting a rainbow, with which he persisted in ornamenting one of his communications, and I only succeeded in taking it down by promising to let in a little frozen brook, and a bird with a broken pinion to represent a youth whose mistress had rejected him. He had no sooner established them in their places than he astounded me by the introduction of a thunderbolt, by means of which he informed the reader what an effect the news of her subsequent marriage had on her lover. This latter article, indeed, is a peculiar favorite, and flies about his compositions at such a rate that one would think him Jupiter Omnipotens himself.

My friend the other afternoon just left me as the sun was setting. I had been slashing one of his essays all to pieces. It made my heart bleed to see the neatly written pages scarred over as if one of his favorite bolts had fallen on it. I had demolished whole gardens of flowers, and drawn my pen across two or three temples, handed out several painters and sculptors, and extinguished an incredible quantity of moonlight, which breaks in upon him at all hours of the day and night. He was hurt. I saw his face darken, and he spoke in an under tone. It is a cruel pain to a youthful writer to see his fine gifts broken to pieces and swept off as trash. He went out and shut the door. I pitied him from my soul.

I was seated in my still room, away up in the attic of a high hotel. I wish, dear reader, you could peep in upon me here sometimes, and see how quietly and uniformly time, which works such miracles and overturns kingdoms like ninepins abroad, passes over me. There have been no revolutions here, except, peradventure, a gift from some passing friend may lie on my table, or a choice book added to my slender library. There is, I confess, a new high-backed, elbow rocking-chair, with a luxurious cushion, in which I sit in the twilight, swaying myself to its dreamy motion, and indulge in reveries upon life.

There are no other alterations, and I still live in complete solitude amid the noises of the town, almost as much alone as if I were in a desert. The evening came on gradually, and the light from the window grew fainter, and the distinct glow of the coals in the grate filled the room with grotesque shapes and shadows. I heard the carts thundering homeward, far beneath my window, and a burst of music from a company of soldiers, and the voices of the idle thoughtless boys mingled with the din. There is a fine gratification in this consciousness of being in the midst of a mighty city, and yet perfectly withdrawn, like Robinson Crusoe in his cave, revelling in his utter solitude, yet within reach of so many invaluable blessings which he had not. Firelight reveries for me, over the thoughts of all other seasons. I hate lamps and candles. Besides, the glare and the smoke and making my eyes ache, they put to flight pleasant reflections. I leaned back in my chair with an indolent ease, and fixed my eyes on the magnified outline of a table reflected on the white wall. Presently it seemed to change shape, till in its stead gleamed a lucid brightness, which spread out into the mirror, by the side of which stood the Genius, with his finger on his lips. He motioned me to look in the glass in silence. It showed Broadway full of belles and beaux, and crowds of all kinds, which passed before me like the scene of a moving panorama. At first I recognised many familiar faces, but gradually they became less frequent, till at length every thing assumed a new aspect. New countenances and forms, new buildings, new dresses, new vehicles: the last relic of the present time which I could distinguish was the City-hall, a blackened and broken mass of ruins, which soon gave place to a temple so lofty and magnificent, that I started back with wonder and delight. At length we seemed to stand before this superb palace, and by one more change we discovered the interior. It was decorated with a splendor of which before I had never even conceived, and a description of which to the present generation would appear swollen and absurd. Every surrounding person and object corresponded with the idea that I was indulged with a sight of some future period in the history of our country. The walls displayed tablets, a few of which I could read. One was erected to the memory of a warlike president, who had beaten back the king of Oregon; another to a mighty statesman who in the year two thousand had cut a canal through the isthmus of Darien; a third to a philosopher, who in the year two thousand three hundred and thirty-one had ascertained the cause of magnetic attraction, and established a communication with the inhabitants of the moon; and another to celebrate the science of the chemist who discovered the machine by which an army of twelve millions of men may be destroyed in a moment; how storms might be raised or quelled, and the ocean navigated at all times with perfect safety. After glancing over these inscriptions, I proceeded to examine the vast assembly of sages convened around me, and was interrupted in observing the extreme singularity of their garments, by the voice of an aged man, whose words seemed so exactly to fall in with the subject which had that evening engaged my attention, that I listened with admiration. I perceived that this was a meeting of learned men and philosophers, and the speaker was addressing them on the subject of literature. It was with the greatest difficulty that I could understand him, and I concluded at first that he was actually uttering some language to me unknown; but my companion set me right, stating that it was English, only corrected in its pronunciation and forms of speech by the lexicographers who had preceded him. With the aid of the Genius, I understood the substance of the oration to be this:

"I have to communicate a plan for the redemption of our literature from utter destruction. The faults and difficulties that surround young writers have induced me to this step, and I have drawn up a list of words, similes, sentences, and sentiments, which have been so utterly worn out that they have ceased to convey their original meaning. This complaint began several hundred years ago; and in a periodical work entitled the New-York Mirror, the only copy extant of which is preserved as a curiosity in the Museum of Antiquities, some writer favored its readers with an ingenious essay upon the subject, which exactly pointed out the danger to which we were exposed, of seeing all the finest sentiments of the poets in the possession of the vulgar for the emergencies of common life. Real poets, and other authors of excellence now, are no longer distinguished for their embellishments, but for their total destitution of them. All the similes that nature affords are occupied." He here went on to read a long list of those, which, in his time, were to be recorded as common-place. The turns of the expressions were different, but the meaning was much the same as those of our own day. Among them were all those hacknied figures which many of the rhymsters and scribblers of our time drag into their descriptions. There was a great quantity of ivy, with the tendrils twining around oaks and old ruins, shipwrecks, volcanos, earthquakes, torrents, streams overflowing their banks, and lions roaring in the woods; lips made of rubies, eyes full of April showers, whirlpools, falling leaves, naked branches, gloomy clouds, deserts, and the like. "Is it possible, I thought, that authors can have gone on so long in the old way?" He then proceeded to read a composition of a popular author, and afterwards to take it to pieces, tracing the expressions to some one who had flourished before, and he proposed that the academy of which he was a member should fix upon measures to exclude all such tiresome efforts of imagination from the poet's aid.

"The world, master student," said the Genius, "will be going on in pretty much the same manner after the rolling away of a thousand years as at present. There will always be a large number of candidates for the honors of literature, who but circulate the sentiments and phrases of others, like merchants, that instead of cultivating the earth themselves, only carry about its fruits from one country to another. The idea of the academicians to whom you have just listened, that the evil may be partially rectified by fixing a stigma upon the style of common authors, is not without its worth. And you yourself, my friend, may take the hint, and strike out from your lucubrations all those superfluous and silly attempts at imagery, which fatigue and disgust every intelligent reader. Think what an ordeal your productions would go through in the year three thousand, in the hands of the academy who should undertake to seek in them for images which had ever been appropriated by those who have gone before you."

As I was shuddering at the thoughts of all the rosy cheeks and pearly teeth of which I had been guilty, the scene suddenly changed, and I appeared haunted with the ghosts of my old essays, which, with the indistinctness of a dream, seemed to have been metamorphosed into persons, and to torment me with the repetition of numerous shameful common places, and instances of carelessness, in consequence of which they told me they were doomed to much unpleasant treatment, and, in the end, to be drowned in the river Lethe. I had produced nothing but what here flitted before me with its phantom form and uttered its complaint. One told me it was near the most delicious reward which a composition could aspire to, in the tear of a hardened worldly man, but that in consequence of a pair of wings suddenly appearing, the sinner fell a laughing. Another informed me that a beautiful girl had been in the act of cherishing it as her favorite, but was prevented by a line which she had heard the day before from the lips of a footman. And a third declared, with tears in his eyes, that he had been admitted into the first of company, and had even sat side by side with Washington Irving, Walter Scott, and Lord Byron, but had been ejected by the master, who found upon him certain ornaments which he himself had flung away in his early youth. I begged them to inform me if any of them had ever succeeded better, but they all shook their heads in a mournful way, pointed to the sluggish, heavy stream, whose muddy waters could scarcely be discerned through the murky shadows, then glided towards it with considerable speed, and disappeared one after another in its waves. I reached out my arms to hold the last, when a sudden noise caused the whole scene to vanish. I found myself alone. The twilight had deepened into a stronger gloom, the stars were glimmering through the window, and a large dictionary, which I always keep by me on the table, had just fallen upon the floor. I was not sure whether the whole had not been a silly dream; but I shall, nevertheless, be careful hereafter how I deal in figures of speech. If the ideas and phrases not justly their own, could haunt our writers in a visible form, some authors would have a precious train. I think the profession of scribblers would thin down wonderfully, and that there would be a great fall in the price of labor among tinkers, blacksmiths, and other honest tradesmen. F.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

We have but little space this week for the theatres. Cinderella at the Park, with Abon Hassan and Burke. The finale and Tyrolienne, by Mrs. Austin, continue to receive an enthusiastic encore. She gave "Even as the sun," also the other evening twice with great effect. Burke is going through his old characters. The American theatre has an attraction of increasing strength in Miss Clifton, who deserves a larger notice than we have now time or room to bestow upon her. Several splendid dramas have been produced at this establishment. The French opera at the Chatham is fashionable, and deserves to be so. They performed "La Muette de Portici," and the "Marriage of Figaro," with much applause, and to excellent houses.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Ladies' Magazine, and Literary Gazette, edited by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale. Vol. IV.—October—No. X. Boston: Marsh, Capen & Lyon. Published monthly.

We have several times endeavored to attract towards this deserving journal, the attention of such as are not familiar with its pages. The female portion of the public should support it as a duty, which a short acquaintance would render very agreeable, and as a work really calculated to benefit them—of a character uniformly intelligent and exclusively original, and one through which, besides the effusions of the editress herself, the contributions of several pleasant writers are given to the world; it possesses a claim upon general patronage not the less strong because urged with modesty. We should by no means recommend a bad publication from gallantry to a lady; but when we find one of decidedly superior merit, conducted by female talent and perseverance, we cannot be too distinct in the expression of our wishes for its success. From the number before us we copy the following article as a more substantial proof of its excellence than empty commendation.

PRESIDENTIAL INAUGURATIONS.

"Sketches of the inauguration of the presidents of our republic have been kindly furnished for our magazine by a distinguished lady of Washington city, who is well acquainted with the manner in which the ceremonies have been conducted since congress assembled at the present seat of government. Of course, no political speculations or opinions mingle with them—they are simply descriptions of the fête, and its effects on the feelings, manners and opinions of those engaged in the ceremonies—in short, a lady's view of the pageantries of government.

"We feel sure our readers will be highly gratified with the articles. The two now given are neither so new nor so interesting as those which will follow, because in these instances the writer was obliged to recur to the history of events, and depend on the recollections of others; in the succeeding ones she gives her own impressions, mingled with those pictures of social life where woman is privileged to preside, and which therefore she can so finely describe. It was the lack of this social information by the writer which has made the notice of President Adams so meagre—there was but little public display on the occasion of his induction into office, the violence of parties making it expedient that the ceremonies should be conducted as quietly as possible.

"Few remain who were actors in the interesting scenes of the inauguration of our first president. That generation has passed away. The aspiring hopes—the deep laid schemes—the agitating feelings of the participants in the events of that period passed into the bosoms of those who succeeded them on the theatre of life. Yet, the passions remain—swaying with equal force the purposes and desires of each successive generation.

"Crowds still throng the steps and follow with their plaudits the favorite of the day. But never again in our country, will any individual be hailed with acclamations so heartfelt and sincere, as those that welcomed Washington, when he landed on the shores of New-York.

"His whole journey from Mount Vernon to the seat of government was one continued triumph—not such triumphs as attend kings and heroes, returning from the conquest of nations, whose laurels are steeped in blood. No, it was the triumph of virtue, crowned with the civic wreath; moistened with the tears, not of widows and orphans, but of grateful hearts, exulting in the presence of the defender of their rights—the savior of their country.

"At Elizabethtown, in Jersey, the president was met by a committee of congress, and attended over the bay in an elegant barge of thirteen oars, rowed by thirteen pilots.

"The display of boats," observes Washington, in his diary, "which attended and joined on this occasion, some with vocal, others with instrumental music on board—the decorations of the shipping—the roar of cannon, and the loud acclamations of the people, which rent the sky, as I passed along, filled my mind with sensations as painful (contemplating the reverse of this scene which may be the case after all my endeavors to do good) as they were pleasing."

"The multitude was immense—the enthusiasm was boundless, that awaited him on his landing. The place of his debarkation was ornamented with all the insignia of patriotism and national glory. Here he was received by the governor of New-York with military honors, and conducted through the immense concourse of people, to the house fitted up for his reception. In fact, the thronging crowds that shouted his welcome, left no space for him to move, until a way was opened by his military escort, who formed a line on the pavement, to keep off the otherwise irresistible multitude, who pressed forward to catch a glance of their beloved Washington. Throughout the day, friends succeeded friends, to lavish on him every demonstration of regard. In the evening, foreign ministers and other persons of distinction made him congratulatory visits. At night a general illumination took place; and this day, the twenty-third of April, was closed in a blaze of light.

"In congress, it was resolved, that the inauguration should take place on the thirtieth of April—that the oath of office should be administered to him in an open gallery or balcony adjoining the hall of the senate—after which, that the vice president and members of the senate—the speaker and members of the house of representatives, should accompany him to St. Paul's chapel, to hear divine service, performed by the chaplain of congress.

"In the morning of the day appointed for this purpose, the clergy of the different denominations, assembled their congregations in their respective places of worship, and offered up public prayers for the people and president of the United States.

"About noon, a procession, followed by a multitude of citizens, moved from the president's house to the old federal hall, in Wall-street; the troops formed a line on each side of the way, as they came near the hall, through which Washington, accompanied by Adams, (vice-president) passed into the senate chamber. Immediately after, accompanied by the members of both houses of congress, he went into the gallery, fronting on Broad-street; and before them and thousands of his fellow-citizens, took the oath of office, which was administered by the chancellor of New-York. An awful silence prevailed among the spectators during this part of the ceremony—it was a sublime moment! In another, the solemn silence was succeeded by the roar of artillery, and the acclamations of thousands, as the chancellor with a loud voice, proclaimed George Washington president of the United States!

"The president bowed respectfully to the people, and then returned to the senate chamber, and addressed both houses of congress, there assembled.

"Efforts had been made by some of the members of the cabinet, and other friends, to introduce many courtly forms into the ceremony of the inauguration, and afterwards into the social intercourse between the president and his fellow citizens. These he uniformly resisted, and in some cases where they were carried into effect, it was without his knowledge. For instance—at the first public ball that took place after the inauguration, the arrangements that were made by a committee of gentlemen and Mrs. Knox, were so discordant with his views, as to render the whole evening most irksome and unpleasant to him. A sofa, raised several steps at the head of the room, was the seat assigned for him and Mrs. Washington.

"The gentlemen were required to wear their hair in bags, and to dance in their swords; each one was to lead his partner to the foot of the sofa, make a low obeisance to the president and his lady, and when the dance was done, again to bring his partner to the foot of the sofa, to make new obeisances, and then retire to their chairs. These ceremonies, it is believed by his desire, were never repeated.

"For more than three weeks after his assumption of office, he resisted the proposition of having levees. At last he found the absolute necessity of having some designated day and hour to receive company, as his time, otherwise, would be utterly consumed by the crowds calling on the chief magistrate.

"In a letter to Mr. Jefferson, he explains this necessity, and expresses some fears, lest this ceremony should be imputed to improper motives, adding, 'It is impossible to please every body—I therefore adopted that line of conduct which embraced public advantage with private convenience, and which in my judgment was unexceptionable in itself. These visits are optional. Between the hours of three and four every Tuesday, I am prepared to receive them.'

"A porter shows the company into the room, and they retire from it when they choose, and without ceremony. Visitors at their first entrance, salute me, and I them, and as many as I can talk to, I do.

"What pomp there is in all this, I am unable to discover; perhaps it consists in not sitting: to this two reasons are opposed; first, it is unusual; secondly, because I have no room large enough to contain a third of the chairs which would be necessary. It is supposed that ostentation or the form of courts gave rise to this custom, I boldly affirm that no supposition was ever more erroneous; for were I to indulge my inclinations, every moment that I could withdraw from the fatigues of my station, should be spent in retirement. Similar to the above, but of a more familiar and sociable kind are the visits every Friday to Mrs. Washington, where I always am."

"Such was the origin of levees and drawing-rooms, observed during the administrations of Washington and Adams, but discontinued by Mr. Jefferson. He had but two public days for the reception of company—the fourth of July and the first of January. The original plan is probably the best, as it preserves a decency and dignity of manner, which it has been found impossible to maintain in the heterogeneous crowds that collect together on these rare occasions.

"At the first levee, Colonel Humphreys had the arrangement of ceremonies, according to which an ante-chamber and presence-chamber were provided. When the door at his inner room was opened, Colonel Humphreys appeared, calling out in a loud voice, 'The President of the United States!' The president was much displeased with this form, and never allowed it to be repeated, but had the company introduced as they arrived in the room where he stood to receive them. On the opening of each session of congress, the president always went, as it was called, in state, to deliver his speech—that is, he was preceded by the marshal, constables, each with their white staffs, and accompanied by the heads of departments. On these occasions he always wore his sword—Mr. Adams observed the same forms—but no president since. Mr. Jefferson, instead of going himself, sent a written message by his private secretary to congress, and his example has been followed ever since by successive presidents.

"Washington's farewell was far more affecting and interesting than his inaugural address. He could not have bequeathed a more valuable legacy to his country; it cannot be too often perused, too deeply studied.

"After having assigned his reasons for retiring from public life, he says, 'Here perhaps I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no motive to bias his counsels.'

"The warnings of a parting friend!—parted from our sight, but not from our hearts, is the father of his country!—May his solemn warnings not be given in vain, but may that union which he calls the palladium of our political safety, be watched over with the jealous anxiety which he so emphatically recommends, and the advice he has given in his parting moment, be acted on by the present, and deeply impressed on the minds of the rising generation."

ADAMS—1797.

"The animosity of party spirit raged with such violence at the period of this patriot's coming into the presidency, that his inauguration was not hailed with the enthusiasm, nor accompanied by those popular demonstrations of respect which attended that of his idolized predecessor. The whole nation was divided between two hostile and conflicting parties; who, while under the dominion of the spirit that these dissensions engendered, were too much blinded by prejudice to do justice to each other. 'This spirit of party,' however, as Washington in his farewell address describes it, 'unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments; more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed, but in those of the popular form, it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.' And, as he adds, in another passage, 'It is itself, a frightful despotism; and leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation, on the ruins of public liberty.

"May experience avert such a catastrophe, and by the proofs which it exhibits of the existence of equal virtue and patriotism in the opposing parties, introduce that mildness and toleration into political differences, which it has into those of religion.

"But perhaps it is only from posterity that impartial justice can be expected. Yes, time with its lenient and healing influence, will allay the virulence, and rectify the prejudices of party spirit, and the good and great men, who have been reviled and calumniated by their inflamed and interested contemporaries, will then be unanimously applauded and venerated—then the light clouds which obscured their fame will have passed away, and their real worth shine forth in all its brightness.

"Mr. Adams on his journey from Massachusetts to Philadelphia received but few of those marks of popular favor that attended Washington's progress from his home to the seat of government—but neither was he annoyed by any open manifestation of the hostile feelings of the opposing party.

"On the fourth of March, 1797, John Adams took the oath of office. Washington attended him on this occasion, and much admiration was expressed at the complacency and delight he manifested at seeing his friend clothed with the authority with which he had himself been invested.

"Mr. Adams retained the forms of social intercourse which his predecessor had adopted, and received all who visited him, with a cordiality equalled only by the dignity of his manner. During the last year of his presidency, the seat of government was removed to Washington—but the short term of his residence prevented his knowing, or being known intimately by the citizens, or his having any opportunity to evince his good disposition to the infant metropolis."

Sir Edward Seaward's Narrative of his shipwreck, and consequent discovery of certain islands in the Caribbean Sea: with a detail of many extraordinary and highly interesting events in his life, from the year 1733 to 1749, as written in his own diary. Edited by Miss Jane Porter. Three volumes 12 mo. pp. 239. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 1831.

The agreeable simplicity and straight-forward style of telling a story possessed by this writer, will render his work exceedingly popular. It reminds one of Robinson Crusoe in the variety and interest of the incidents. Perhaps we could not explain the impression it made on us better than the intelligent editor has done it in the subjoined extract from her preface:

"The manuscript papers, or rather manuscript books, constituting the diary from which the following narrative is taken, were put into my hands by the representative of their much-respected writer, merely as a curious specimen of old-fashioned times, the perusal of which might amuse me. On reading the manuscripts I found not only amusement, which may be called the least worthy effect of any written production, but a deep and affecting interest;—such as a man might feel while listening, at his own comfortable fireside, to the strange adventures and hairbreadth escapes of some dear and long absent friend, just returned to his kinsfolk and neighbors, after a widely wandering and checkered travel in distant lands.

"Thus impressed, I ventured to recommend the publication of Sir Edward Seaward's diary to its owner. He smiled, and objected, saying, 'he should expect the spirit of the worthy knight would haunt him to his dying day, did he make such an exposition of family history, and of the unpretending abilities, as an author, of the journalist himself, who had evidently penned it for no other eyes than those of his kindred.'

"But this delicacy was afterward persuaded to the desired point, by the judgment of a person whom he held in the highest respect, and by the very arguments which my friend had used as objections; namely, the unpretending simplicity of the relation, the family events described in it, as well as those of an extraordinary or more general nature; also its sound and truly British principles, religious and moral. The style is certainly homely, but not that of an ignorant man; the diary being kept in the common diction of genteel persons in those times, respectably educated, but without aiming at the elegance of a man of letters."

Sir Edward Seaward was born in the year 1710 or 1711, and died in 1774. There is an absolute want of affectation and carelessness of effect in these pages, strongly contrasted with the character of most other narratives. With what a plain brevity he relates his first voyage to Virginia:

"One morning, as my father and I were talking over my future prospects in life, I received a letter from my uncle, in which he stated that he wanted me to go to Virginia in one of his vessels as supercargo. I was delighted with the proposal; to which my dear father made no objection, as he might hope soon to see me again. In a few days I took leave of our friends at the parsonage, and of my own family. At parting, my father gave me his blessing and my mother's Bible; and with these much valued gifts, I left the village of my education and nativity.

"My uncle received me kindly, and took much pains to instruct me in the business which he had appointed me to manage. I was delighted with every thing connected with my preparation for the voyage, and I sailed on the fifth of April, 1733, in the Mary brig, for America, with an assortment of goods.

"We arrived in the Chesapeake bay on the second of June, which was considered a good passage, and on the following day proceeded up the river to Baltimore."

On his return, he describes a visit to his home with a sententiousness and feeling worthy of Osian.

After negotiating a treaty of matrimony with a young girl, the adventurer and his wife set off again from their native village in the following manner:

"On the morrow we took an affectionate leave of our dear friends: our feelings were deep and various; there was little said at parting, but much expressed by that natural language, which the overflowing heart never fails to manifest. My aunt and uncle first stepped into the coach that was to convey us; I then handed in my dear Eliza; she had scarcely taken her seat, when an unexpected volunteer sprung in after her. 'Who are you?' cried my uncle. 'Ah, poor Fidele,' said Eliza, 'I had overlooked you in taking leave of my friends.' She patted him kindly, and was handing him out to the servant, when the dog (a beautiful little spaniel of king Charles's breed) turned back his head, to look once more on his favorite mistress, and whined so piteously, that my uncle, who observed it, exclaimed, 'No, no!' and stretching himself forward, so as to be heard by the group without, 'let the little fellow go with her; he has a warm heart towards her, and a good one too. Dogs never change, though men sometimes do: no allusion to you, Ned.' 'Take him, Eliza,' they all said, and I more emphatically than all the rest. I was affected in witnessing the attachment of this dumb creature, to the one to whom I myself was so devotedly attached."

We have only space for one more extract, describing the shipwreck of the humble little party:

"I now endeavored to console my wife, whose strength of mind and kindness of heart bestowed reciprocal consolations on myself. 'God will preserve us, my honored love,' said she; 'I feel that we are safe, notwithstanding this dreadful hurricane: but,' added she, pressing my hand and moving it to her lips, 'if we should be drowned, we shall die together, and we shall not be separated: we shall meet where we can part no more.' Her feelings now overpowered her, and she fell on my neck and wept. I kissed away the tears from her eyes, saying, 'We will trust in the Almighty.'

"I wanted to go on deck, but was not able to effect it; the companion door would not move, and the sea was dashing over the quarter deck. I, however, got the people there to open one of the side doors a little, and I peeped out. The wind howled horribly, and the sea was all in a foam: the brig was running before the wind, sometimes on one point of the compass, sometimes on another, just as the gale happened to chop round, which it sometimes did, and then the sea broke over the brig while she was veering to the wind. Two of the hands and the yawl had been washed overboard.

We continued to be driven by the storm for eight or ten hours. I cannot tell in what direction, but about two or three o'clock in the morning they called out, 'Breakers, breakers! land! breakers!' I was below with my wife in the cabin. Being no seaman, I could do no good on deck; but, hearing this, I got up the ladder to the companion door. All was again fast down, and they could not open it; in fact, all hands were too much absorbed by the awfulness of their situation. In a few minutes the vessel struck, and we, who were below, were thrown violently on the cabin floor. The poor dog, our faithful Fidele, howled mournfully as he was driven to the further end of the cabin: this, at such a moment, had a powerful effect on us. 'We are indeed lost,' said my wife, as she recovered a little from the fall she had just received. I did not now wait to console her by my words; I renewed my efforts to force the companion door, and get upon deck; but it was perfect darkness where we were, and I could not find any thing to add to my own ineffectual strength, nor could I make any one on deck attend to me; they could not hear me from the noise made by the howling of the wind and the breaking of the sea; yet I sometimes heard them, and could discover that they were cutting away the wreck of the mainmast, which lay over the side—making ready to get the long-boat over the gunwale, to escape, if possible, from the perishing vessel. I now became frantic; I knocked with my hands, and billoped with all my power, but to no purpose. By accident I stumbled over an empty stone bottle at the foot of the ladder, with the bottom of which I struck the companion door so violently that I succeeded in arresting the attention of the captain. He unbolted it, telling me at the same time, 'We are all lost!' but that the men were trying to launch the long-boat, our only chance; for, although it was likely she would swamp in the breakers, it was quite certain the brig would go to pieces in a few minutes; and if Mrs. Seaward and I chose to go, we must be up in a second, for 'look there!' said he; crying out at the same time, 'another shove, lads, and she's all our own!'

The long-boat was launched, and I returned down the ladder with all speed. The brig was lying on her starboard side, the sea breaking over her bow and forechains; but, from the position of a rocky island to windward, she was pretty quiet abast, and to leeward, so that a boat might live under her lee; and I expected the captain would wait for us there a little. The moment I rejoined my dear wife, I urged her instantly to accompany me to the deck, telling her our situation. 'No!' said she, 'I will not stir, and you will not stir; they must all perish; a boat cannot endure this storm. Let us trust in God, Edward,' continued she, 'and if we die, we die together.' 'It is done,' I replied, 'we will not stir.' 'Then tell them so,' cried she hastily; 'and if you can lay your hand on the bread-bag in your way, it may be useful to them, if they survive this hour.' I hastened to ascend, at which moment the brig seemed to right, and I was struck back by a column of water rushing down the companion, followed by the shutting of its doors. The brig had swung off the point of the reef, and the sea then broke over the main chains, the vessel being upright. I now easily succeeded in getting on deck, but no boat was to be seen; yet now and then I thought I heard the voices of the miserable crew at some distance on the brig's quarter; and sometimes I fancied I saw them, when the strong lightning's glare lighted up every thing around for an instant, leaving the immediate darkness greater. The brig soon took the ground again, on a reef within, and heeled over as before, which threw me down the ladder; the companion doors fortunately slamming to after me, as the sea instantly broke over the vessel fore and aft. My ever kind wife hastened to my assistance, but was herself thrown to the other side of the cabin. I was not hurt, so that in a little time I reached the place where she lay, and we crawled up together to windward, where we endeavored to secure ourselves. More than an hour passed away with us thus, in dismal darkness below; but we enjoyed the light of God's presence, offering up prayer to him, in short but emphatical ejaculations, and he heard us: we felt the influence of his peace, and were resigned to his will.

"Our situation was awful; in all human probability, within one short hour we should be engulfed by an overwhelming sea. With arms folded round each other, we sat, endeavoring to keep our position, and so remained till the heaving motion of the vessel gradually subsided, and at length became scarcely perceptible; but she continued to lay over, nearly on her beam ends. I now again thought it right to reach the deck, and as the ladder had been lashed to its situation, it was not displaced, notwithstanding all the shocks the vessel had sustained. On ascending the ladder, I pushed open the lee half of the companion door, when a gleam of joy rushed upon me, on perceiving that the day had dawned, and that the water to leeward was quite smooth. The brig now lying on the innermost part of the reef, I discovered high land ahead and astern, and a fine sandy beach abreast of us, little more than a mile off. I hastened below to my dear wife, into the dark cabin, exclaiming, 'Come to me, my love; come on deck; it is daylight!' Without a word, she made her way to me, and ascended the ladder. On emerging from darkness into light, her feelings overcame her, and she poured forth her heart to God. After a few moments of abstraction, she crept down to the lee gunwale of the quarter deck: 'Where is the boat and our poor companions?' she exclaimed; 'I do not see them.' They were lost."

We confess, in these volumes we have found a kind of fascination for which we often look vainly in more polished, presuming, and popular writers.

The Token: A Christmas and New Year's Present. Edited by S. G. Goodrich. 18 mo. pp. 392. Boston: Gray & Bowen. New-York: C. Peabody & Co. 1832.

We close this volume with the feeling of a judge presiding at the trial of a fair woman, and compelled to pass upon her a sentence for which she reproaches him with a pair of pretty blue eyes. The embellishments do not deserve the praise bestowed upon them in the preface. With the exception of two or three, they are bad copies of pictures already old. There are soft touches in the plate "Will he bite," but the lady's head and the little dog's leg are intolerable. The "Young Artist" is a lack-a-daisical subject, without the slightest interest to any body, but is, in many respects, well finished by the engraver. The "Toilette" is a coarse copy of a very beautiful, but saucy original, and if introduced into the Token at all, should have been executed with much more care. "Apprehension" is another picture not worth the pains bestowed upon it. The "Fresher" is not among the best from the same hand. It wants distinctness. The "Escape" is indifferently good. "Carnival at Potosi," passable, but not particularly fine. "Byron" is not equal to the same subject in the Atlantic Souvenir. We do not admire "The Lute" at all; and the opening of the "Sixth Seal" is beyond the skill of the engraver, and we are not surprised, therefore, to find it rather a failure. There may be marks of a master hand in many of these plates, but they do not appear finished, and the selection is in bad taste. We turn with pleasure to the redeeming features. The "Lesbia," is rather neatly executed; but, with reverence to the preface, it is not by any means equal to the "Equinoctial Storm." This last plate is by Hatch and Smillie. The figures are admirable, and the head of Sir Arthur Wardour exquisite. The extreme finish of the features, and the distinct expression of awe and horror flung into such a miniature face, we may safely prefer before any thing in the book. The "Fairy Isle," by George B. Ellis, is another beautiful subject, and beautifully done—perhaps a little too black. The "Dead Soldier," and "Invisible Serenade," by J. W. Cheney, are pretty; and the "Peasant Boy," by O. Pelton, a graceful and natural figure, and face, and quite creditable to the engraver. The "Presentation" is pretty, but is it intended for a tomb?

We have one observation to make which may go far to give this volume a general circulation, although not on the score of its embellishments. It is, that it contains several contributions of unusual power. There is a class of writers at the west, who, though not widely known, are sending forth very superior compositions to the world. Our brethren of the Atlantic states must look to themselves, or they will be outshone. At the head of these, or at least in a high rank among them, stand Timothy Flint, and the author of the article on our first page. We have excluded two or three columns of editorial and other matter to make room for it, because it is beautiful, and the writer of it should be known and respected. A graceful and agreeable style is made the vehicle for conveying simple but eloquent and natural truths. It is full of moral force and poetry. We think if Dr. Channing should descend from his pedestal to write a story of common life, it would be something of this sort. Among the other names of repute are the author of "A Year in Spain;" Grenville Mellen, an able writer both of poetry and prose; Mrs. Sigourney, who has a charming talent for verses; Willis G. Clarke, who, when he pleases, can strike off a stanza with the best of them; Miss Sedgwick, Mr. Pierpont, and several others, whose simple names stamp the letter-press as valuable and interesting. The binding is costly and elegant, and the vignette (we had nearly forgotten) by Gallaudet, is rich and soft.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1831.

Fugitive Pieces.—For some time past a number of pieces by Mr. Willis, have been floating about in the newspapers without any name, and in an imperfect state. These have been collected, and will occasionally be published in the Mirror, revised and corrected by the author. This arrangement will, of course, be but temporary, and is made in compliance with the request of numerous persons desirous of preserving them in these pages.

Willis's Poems.—The poem delivered before Brown University, by Mr. Willis, is just issued by the Messrs. Harper, in a beautiful printed octavo, with several other pieces by the same writer. They are for sale at this office. Among the collection are the "Dying Alchymist," "Parrhasius," the "Wife's Appeal," the "Healing of the daughter of Jairus," the "Leper," "To a City Pigeon," and "Tired of Play." The publishers deserve great credit for the unusual pains bestowed upon the typography of this volume.

ARE YOU ANGRY, MOTHER!

SUNG BY MISS STEPHENS—POETRY BY G. SOANE—MUSIC BY H. R. BISHOP.

Andantino.

Are you an-gry, mo-ther? mo-ther? No! no no! no no! Should I sad and pee-vish grow? No! no no! no no! When I see our sky so bright, And our fields so warm with light, Mo-ther! oh, I feel as I had wings, And the heart with-in me sings; Then, it may be, I'm too gay, But for-give me, mo-ther, pray.

SECOND VERSE.

Is it my fault, mother, that my heart
Sometimes plays too wild a part?
Oh when I have tried to be
Grave as age could fancy me,
Stepping with a solemn pace,
Looking with a sober face,
Still my heart is wildly gay,
Spite of all I do or say.
Be not angry, &c.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LINES TO THE SOUL.

BY W. P. PALMER.

"Thou soul, that art the eternity of thought!"
MYSTERIOUS power! where is thy Delphic home?
In the dim chambers of the haunted brain?
Or dost thou, like a restless naiad, roam
The deep meanderings of the purple vein?
Ceaselessly coursing in thy still career
Life's crimson river in its mazy round:
Or art thou found
Cradled within the heart's impassioned sphere,
Rocked by its solemn pulses whose quick beat,
Like a weird death-watch at a dying ear,
Is chronicling the moments few and fleet
Thy earthly span that bound?
And what art thou, invisible
And unimagined form,
Wrapped in this dark material shroud,
Like lightning in the muffling cloud
Of midnight's sullen storm?
Thy presence makes me what I am;
Thy being is my own;
And though thou liv'st in every sense,
Thou art to all unknown.

Frail nursling of the dust, and yet
With reason's glory crowned,
Man measures earth's stupendous globe,
And ocean's dark profound:
His search hath solved the mystic tides
In their alternate course,
And sunward traced the wizard winds
Up to their burning source:
Yea, his far ken hath read the skies
With all their starry mysteries
That o'er us nightly burn;
Hath marked the planet's fiery ring,
And fixed the shadowy years that bring
The comet's wild return.
Yet, spirit, vain his curious zeal
Thy lore or laws to find;
Reason, with all her powers rebuked,
Gropes impotent and blind.
Art thou a portion of the clay
That forms thy dark abode,
Or art thou an embodied ray
Flashed from the mind of God?
Hath the grave walls thou canst not break,
To mock the martyr's trust?
Shall the worm waste thee as 'twill waste
Thy fellow of the dust?
No; though awhile to earthliness
Bound by a brittle tie,

Germ of life's immortality,
It is not thine to die!
This truth, so fraught with joyousness,
So thrilling and sublime,
Defied the grasp of hoary seer,
In the far olden time;
Though oft with burning hopes he sought,
Borne on the lightning-wings of thought,
To scale the stygian towers
That held him from thy doubtful fate,
Then died with bosom desolate
As spring without her flowers.
But we, upon whose lampless prison
The resurrection's star hath risen,
To gladden and illumine,
Sure of thy god-like destiny,
Can pierce with bright exulting eye
The grave's primeval gloom.
Then fear not thou, whose being's hope
May match the cherubim's,
Though this dark web of sordid flesh
Awhile its glory dims;
For if on earth's illusive scene
Thou manfully dost tread
To nothingness temptation's wiles
Along thy pathway spread;
True to thy better nature, true
To virtue's stern behests,

And to that warning oracle
Shrined in all human breasts;
Thou'st all to hope and nought to fear
From that which men call fortune here,
Or chance, or fate adverse,
Comes it with death's imperious stress,
Ingratitude, or friendlessness,
Or slander's smothered curse.
Since even in thy loneliest hour
Faith whispers of the glorious dower
That waits thy dread remove—
Cycles of unimagined years
Unknown alike to change or tears,
Mid scenes where all is love.
Therefore bear nobly up, my soul,
Against all power of ill,
And with unblenching fortitude
Thy destiny fulfill:
So when thy freeing hour shall come,
As come it doth to all,
And death for thee shall kindly break
Corruption's ghastly thrall;
Thou, like some captive bird of heaven,
Thy bands of earthly durance riven,
With balcyon wing shall rise,
From all the fiends that haunt thee here—
Sin, sorrow, scorn, and doubt, and fear,
Up to thy paradise!

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

MINUTE PHILOSOPHIES.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

"But something whispers to my heart,
That, as we downward tend,
Lycoris, life requires an art
To which our souls must bend,
A skill to balance and supply."—Wordsworth.

As I was returning a day or two since, some time after the dinner hour, from a prolonged forenoon ramble, I met, at the skirts of the city, a wealthy citizen starting for a drive. The morning had been the divinest one of all October, rich, clear, and balmy, but at noon the east wind had blown up from the bay, and at four o'clock the air would have poisoned the spirits of an alderman. The absurdity of the thing struck me. Those superb greys had stood for six hours of heaven's most glorious sunshine in the stall, and now, for the simple reason that his counting-house was closed, their master was going out, under that leaden sky, and with that odious atmosphere about him, to enjoy nature. I could not help thinking how little he knew how to live; and, as I dropped my curtains and sat down alone over my olives and sherry, the vein of speculation which the occurrence had awakened breathed itself out freely.

The principal sources of everyday happiness are too obvious to need a place in a chapter of after-dinner philosophy. Occupation and a clear conscience, the very truant in the fields will tell you, are craving necessities. But when these are secured, there are lighter matters, which, to the sensitive and educated at least, are to happiness what foliage is to the tree. They are refinements which add to the beauty of life without diminishing its strength, and as they spring only from the better use of our common gifts, they are neither costly nor rare. I have learned secrets under the roof of a poor man which would add to the luxury of the rich. The blessings of a cheerful fancy and a quick eye come from nature, and the trailing of a vine may develop them as well as the curtaining of a king's chamber. It is surprising how much there is in a little simple management to change the color of the mind! We are all subject more than we are aware to slight and unregarded influences, and if my theme seem to the reader unworthy of its place and title, I appeal to his indulgence for a suspended opinion and a trial of its easy rules.

Riding is so stimulating a pleasure, that, to talk of any management in its indulgence, seems superfluous. Yet we are in motion and repose equally liable to the caprices of feeling, and perhaps the gayer the mood the deeper the shade cast on it by untoward circumstances. The time of riding should never be regular. It then becomes a habit, and habits, though sometimes comfortable, never amount to positive pleasure. I would ride when nature prompted—when the shower was past, or the air balmy, or the sky beautiful—when ever and wherever the significant finger of desire pointed. Oh, to leap into the saddle when the west wind blows freshly, and gallop off into its very eye, with an undrawn rein, careless how far or whither; or to surprise your sister over her books, when the sun breaks through after a storm, and drive away under the white clouds, through light and shadow, while the trees are wet and the earth damp and spicy; or in the clear sunny afternoons of autumn, with a pleasant friend on the seat beside you, and the glorious splendor of the foliage flushing in the sunshine, to dream over the thousand airy castles that are stirred by such shifting beauty—these are pleasures indeed, and such as he who rides regularly after his dinner knows as little of as the dray-horse of the exultation of the courier.

There is a great deal in the choice of a companion. If he is an indifferent acquaintance, or an indiscriminate talker, or has a coarse eye for beauty, or is insensible to the delicacies of sensation or thought—if he is sensual, or stupid, or practical constitutionally—he will never do. He must be a man who can detect a rare color in a leaf, or appreciate a rich passage of scenery, or admire a grand outline in a cloud. He must have accurate and fine senses, and a heart, noble at least by nature, and subject still to her direct impulses. He must be a lover of the beautiful in whatever shape it comes, and, above all, he must have read and thought like a scholar, if not like a poet. He will then ride by your side without crossing your humor—if talkative he will talk well, and if silent you are content, for you know that the same grandeur or beauty which has wrought the silence in your own thoughts has given a color to his. Avoid a sickly sentimentalist. A punster is intolerable.

There is much in the manner of driving. I like a capricious rein—now fast through a hollow, and now loiteringly in the edge of a wood, or by the bank of a river. There is a singular delight in quickening your speed in the animation of a climax, and in coming down gently to a walk with a digression of feeling, or a sudden sadness. Who would walk his horse over a turnpike? Who would trot him by the slope to Jamaica Lake, or the green lane thence to Brookline?

Another important item is the management of light. A small room well lighted is much more imposing than a larger one lighted ill. Cross-lights are painful to the eye, and they destroy, besides, the cool and picturesque shadows of the furniture and figures. I would have a room always partially darkened. There is a repose in the twilight dimness of a drawing-room, which affects one with the proper gentleness of the place. Your out-of-door humor is too rude, and the secluded light subdues it fitly as you enter. I like curtains—heavy crimson curtains. There is a magnificence in their large folds which nothing else equals, and the couleur de rose gives every thing a beautiful tint as the light streams through them. Plants tastefully arranged are pretty. Flowers are always beautiful. I would have my room like a painter's—one curtain partly drawn. A double shadow has a nervous look. The effect of a proper disposal of light upon the feelings is by most people surprisingly neglected. I have no doubt, that, as an habitual thing, it materially affects the character. The disposition for study and thought is certainly dependent on it in no slight degree. What is more contemplative than the twilight of a deep alcove in a library? What more awakens thought than the dim interior of an old church, with its massive and shadowy pillars?

There may be fine luxury in furniture. A centre table has a look of comfort, and a suspended stained lamp throws a mellow depth into the features. Descending light is always the finest. I would have two or three sofas, broad and with loose cushions, and chairs of every description. There is a drawing-room I sometimes haunt which gives me always an oriental feeling. The chairs are of different and curious fashions, made to humor every possible weariness. A spice-lamp burns in the corner, and the pictures are colored of a pleasant tone, and the light is deliciously subdued and dreamy. Beauty looks better there than any where else. You might live an age in such a place without a turbulent thought. I do not like to see a room too neat. There is a nakedness in it. A dozen of your fine old authors should lie on the table, and the last print. I rather like the French fashion of a bonbonnière, though that is, perhaps, an extravagance. A coal fire is convenient, and more in keeping with the repose of a drawing-room. Your wood fire has an annoying glare, and needs a troublesome attention. I do not object to it at a country tavern, where the host looks to it.

I have an extravagant friend who, at certain seasons of the year, becomes economical, for the sake of a new sensation. He says the contrast is quite exciting. There is the root of much philosophy in his odd humor. The appetites must be managed, or they lose their fine edge, and it is as true of conversation and reading, as of eating and living luxuriously. The man who eats till his taste palls, destroys his afternoon. It is difficult to break in upon an indulgence that youth and health have safely strengthened into habit. But in this as in most other things, c'est premier pas qui coûte, and there is a keen enjoyment in rising from the table with the morning nerve renewed and vigorous.

There is a management of one's own familiar intercourse which is more neglected, and, at the same time, more important to happiness than every other. It is particularly a pity that this is not oftener understood by newly married people. As far as my own observation goes, I have rarely failed to detect, far too early for my dream, signs of ill-disguised and disappointed weariness. It was not the re-action of excitement, not the return to the quiet ways of home, but a new manner, a forgetful indifference—believing itself concealed, and yet betrayed continually by unconscious and irrepressible symptoms. I believed it resulted always from the same causes—partly that they saw each other too much, and partly that when the form of etiquette was removed, they forgot to retain its invaluable essence—an assiduous and minute disinterestedness. It seems nonsense to lovers, but absence is the secret of respect, and therefore of affection. Love is divine, but its flame is too faint for the household lamp. It must be burned only for incense, and, even then, trimmed skilfully. It is wonderful how a slight neglect, or a glimpse of a weakness, or a chance defect of knowledge, dims its new glory. Lovers, married or single, should have separate pursuits. They should meet to respect each other for new and distinct acquisitions. It is the weakness of human affections that they are founded on pride, and waste with over much familiarity. I would be absent in the day-time from the woman I loved if I knew the secret of the emerald table, and had the knowledge of a seer. What a beautiful passage in a bachelor's dream it is—the coming home at night, waited for and welcomed with a woman's welcome! And then to sit down by the evening lamp, and, with a mind unexhausted by the intercourse of the day, to yield to the fascinating freedom of conversation, and clothe the rising thoughts of affection in fresh and unhacknied language! How richly the treasures of the mind seem—not doled out, counter by counter, as the visible thought coins them, but heaped upon the mutual altar in lavish and unhesitating profusion. And how a fine thought assumes beauty and power—not traced up through all its petty courses, till its dignity is lost by association, but flashing full-grown and suddenly on the sense! The gifts of no one mind are equal to the constant draught of a life-time; and, even if they were, there is no one taste which could always relish them. It is a humiliating thought that immortal mind must be husbanded like material treasure.

There is a remark of Godwin's, which, in rather too strong language, contains a valuable truth. He says, "A judicious and limited voluptuousness is necessary to the cultivation of the mind, to the polishing of the manners, to the refining of the sentiment, and to the development of the understanding; and a woman deficient in this respect may be of use in the government of our families, but cannot add to the enjoyment, nor fix the partiality of a man of taste." Since the days of St. Leon, the word by which the author conveyed his meaning has grown into disrepute; but the remark is still one of keen and observant discrimination. It refers to that susceptibility to delicate attentions, that fine sense of the nameless and exquisite tendernesses of manner and thought, which constitute, in the minds of its possessors, the deepest under-current of life—the felt and treasured, but unseen and inexpressible richness of affection. It is rarely found in the characters of men, but it outweighs, when it is, all grosser qualities—for its very possession implies a generous nature, purity, fine affections, and a heart open to all the sunshine and meaning of the universe. It belongs more to the nature of woman, but, indispensable as it is to her character, it is, oftener than any thing else, wanting. And, without it, what is she? What is love to a being of such dull sense that she hears only its common and audible language, and sees nothing but what it brings to her feet to be eaten, and worn, and looked upon. What is woman, if the impassioned language of the eye, or the deepened fulness of the tone, or the tenderness of a slight attention, are things unnoticed and of no value—one who answers you when you speak, smiles when you tell her she is grave, assents simply to the expression of your enthusiasm, but has no dream beyond—no suspicion that she has not felt and reciprocated your feelings as fully as you could expect or desire. It is a matter too little looked to. Sensitive and ardent men too often marry with a blindfold admiration of mere goodness or loveliness. The abandon of matrimony soon dissipates the gay dream, and they find themselves suddenly unsheltered—linked indissolubly with affections strangely different from their own, and lavishing their only treasure on those who can neither appreciate nor return it. The after-life of such men is a stifling solitude of feeling. Their avenues of enjoyment are their manifold sympathies, and when these are shut up and neglected, the heart is dark, and they have nothing to do, thenceforward, but to forget.

There are many who, possessed of the capacity for the more elevated affections, waste and lose it by a careless, and often unconscious, neglect. It is not a plant to grow untended. The breath of indifference, or a rude touch, may destroy forever its delicate texture. To drop the figure, there is a daily attention to the slight courtesies of life, and an artifice in detecting the passing shadows of feeling, which alone can preserve through life the freshness of passion. The easy surprises of pleasure, an earnest cheerfulness of assent to slight wishes, the habitual respect to opinions, the polite abstinence from personal topics in the company of others, the assiduous and unwavering attention to her comfort at home and abroad, and, above all, the absolute preservation, in private, of those proprieties of conversation and manner which are sacred before the world, are some of the thousand secrets of that rare happiness which age and habit alike fail to impair or diminish.

LITERARY NOTICES.

A Memoir of Sebastian Cabot: with a Review of the History of Maritime Discovery. Illustrated by Documents from the Rolls, now first published. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. One vol. 8vo. 1831.

Much information will be found in this volume, which embraces an interesting period of history, and will find many gratified readers. We are getting rich in books of history and biography, and there is, perhaps, no department of literature which can more deservedly command the attention of the scholar. We present one extract:

"The real character of Henry the seventh seems to have been that of a thrifty, calculating, man of business. Caring little about the niceties of the point of honor, he was inclined to submit to many slights, and some injustice, rather than go to war, which he shunned as the same prudent personage would, in private life, have deprecated a lawsuit, as a remedy involving, necessarily, much trouble and expense, and being, at last, of uncertain issue. He often obtained by negotiation what a more proud and impetuous spirit would have vindicated by the sword. But wherever the obvious interests of the country or of his own coffers were concerned, he was sturdy, persevering, fearless. The influence of his reign on the commercial history of England has never been adequately appreciated, because no one, since the time of Bacon, has taken up the subject in a temper to do him justice. There is nothing in his character to dazzle or excite, and treaties of commerce are a poor substitute for battles to the light reader or brilliant historian."

An Address delivered on the anniversary of the Philolexian Society of Columbia College, May 15, 1831. By John W. Francis, M. D. New-York: G. & C. & H. Carvill. 1831.

This ably written and interesting discourse opens with a solicitation for indulgent criticism "on the efforts of one long estranged by the duties of professional life from the contemplative studies of the scholar." The precaution is superfluous, as, in addition to the intelligent prefatory observations, the pamphlet furnishes the reader with a condensed and valuable biography of one of the most prominent men in the history of this state, and whose strongest and most appropriate eulogy is the account of his actions. Sir Walter Scott somewhere observes, that he could mention "more than one instance in which literature and society have suffered loss, that jurisprudence might be enriched." The same may be said of the medical profession; and we are gratified to perceive the most distinguished members of either turning aside for a brief period from their rigorous duties to display to the world their thoughts upon general subjects, and give us an idea of what they might have been had their hours been devoted to literary pursuits. With these sentiments we have read and admired Doctor Francis's valuable sketch, and beg the attention of the reader to the following brief

BIOGRAPHY OF CHANCELLOR LIVINGSTON.

"Chancellor Livingston was born in the city of New-York, in 1747, and was educated in King's, now Columbia college, where he was graduated in 1764.  He entered upon the study of the law in this city in 1765, under the direction of William Smith, the historian of New-York, at that time an eminent counsellor of law, and subsequently chief justice of Canada. Shortly after having obtained his license in that profession he was appointed recorder of his native city. The trying question of the rights of the British parliament, in which we were unrepresented, to impose exactions on our citizens, then first began to be agitated, and the subject of our memoir as well as his illustrious father were both ejected from their official stations, the latter as one of the justices of the court of oyer and terminer, for adherence to the rights of their countrymen. It was early predicted that these rights could be successfully asserted only by the sword; but, remonstrance after remonstrance, petition after petition was presented to a ministry attentive only to their passions, and heedless of the rights of others. The colonies, separated from one another by a thousand feelings and prejudices, soon exhibited a united resolution to resist these pretensions with manly effort. The official stations of Mr. Livingston and his son did not prevent them from joining with the great body of their countrymen in resisting claims so unjust and oppressive. In the same year the gallant Montgomery, recently connected by marriage to a sister of the chancellor, fell on the plains of Abraham, fighting with the valor of his native, in defence of his adopted country. *****

"The appointment of Chancellor Livingston to the court of France was one of the first acts of the new administration of Jefferson. Napoleon Bonaparte, the youthful conqueror of Italy, was at this time first consul of the French republic. At his court, which rivalled in magnificence and splendor the most august courts of Europe, the chancellor at once conciliated the good feelings of that extraordinary man by the amenity of his manners, and promoted the best interests of his country by persevering and enlightened exertions. During the short-lived peace of Amiens, Paris was visited by the refined and intelligent from every part of the civilized world; and here the chancellor found leisure, amidst the duties of his official station, to cultivate those ornate studies for which that capital furnishes every facility. On the day of a great levee, which assembled at the Tuilleries, says the biographer of Fox, the numerous representatives of nations and strangers from every country, to pay their respects to the first consul of France, now established as the sole head of the government, the American ambassador, Mr. Livingston, plain and simple in manners and dress, represented his republic with propriety and dignity.

"In that important negotiation with the government of France, which resulted in the acquisition of Louisiana, Chancellor Livingston was the prominent and efficient agent. *****

"One other benefit conferred on mankind will, of itself, convey the name of Chancellor Livingston to future ages: his co-operation with Robert Fulton in effecting the successful application of steam navigation, the most important improvement since the invention of printing, and only inferior to it in lasting consequences to mankind. By it the great community of nations is bound together by commercial and social intercourse; the arts of war are made to yield to the profitable pursuits of peace; universal civilization, universal education, and the benign influence of religion conveyed to every land.

"The connexion between Livingston and Fulton, says the late lamented Clinton, 'realized to a great degree the vision of the poet. All former experiments had failed, and the genius of Fulton, aided and fostered by the public spirit and discernment of Livingston, created one of the greatest accommodations for the benefit of mankind. These illustrious men will be considered, through all time, as the benefactors of the world.'

"The leisure hours of Chancellor Livingston were devoted to every variety of science, arts, and literature. The heroic authors of antiquity, Homer and Virgil, Demosthenes and Cicero, were among those which contributed to improve his taste and expand his thought and feeling. His historical researches were various and extensive. All this was not effected without unremitting industry. Every interval of time afforded from the duties and cares of public life was devoted, with scrupulous fidelity, to add to his stores of knowledge. Like the Chancellor D'Aguesseau, in variety of pursuit, he found that relaxation which others seek in pleasure and amusement.

"The style of his oratory was chaste and classical, and of that persuasive kind which the father of poetry ascribes to Nestor. All who were witnesses testify to the mute attention with which he rivetted his auditors. But he chiefly delighted in the pathetic, and often, by his appeals to the sympathies of his hearers, counteracted the most powerful prejudices. His acknowledged integrity and patriotism doubtless added force to all he uttered. Franklin termed him the American Cicero; in him were united all those qualities which, according to that illustrious Roman, are necessary in the perfect orator.

"After a life, every portion of which was devoted to the benefit of his fellow man, he paid the last debt to nature at his seat at Clermont, on the twenty-sixth of February, 1813.

"Thus it appears, from this imperfect tribute, that the late Chancellor Livingston was an active agent in the most momentous events that have influenced the destinies of mankind. Of the congress of 1776, which resolved that these states were free and independent, he was a distinguished member, and belonged to that committee which framed the declaration of our grievances and rights—and which will transmit their names to the latest posterity; of the convention of New-York which formed the constitution of our state—the best devised scheme of polity then known to the world; of a subsequent convention, which ratified the constitution of the United States, devised by the wisdom of Hamilton and Madison. The important actor in a negotiation, which doubled our country in extent, and, I trust, has rendered it forever secure from foreign intrusion; the coadjutor in that noblest of all improvements in mechanics, by which time and space are annihilated—the invention of steam navigation.

"In Mr. Livingston, to the proud character of integrity, honor, and disinterestedness, were added the mild, yet ennobling features of religion. An inquiring believer in its truth, an exemplar of its gentle effects on the character, he daily sought its consolations, and strengthened his pious resolutions in the rich inheritance it promises. He was devoted to the protestant episcopal church, from an enlightened preference of its doctrines and discipline, without hostile feelings to those who trust to other guides in religion than Chillingworth and Hooker.

"At the time of his death he was in the sixty-sixth year of his age. His person was tall and commanding, and of patrician dignity. Gentle and courteous in his manners, pure and upright in his morals. His benefactions to the poor were numerous and unostentatious. In his life without reproach, in death victorious over its terrors."

Another number of this well-conducted miscellany is before us. It is an epitome of the English periodicals, placing the American reader in possession of the choicest collections. We should be gratified to see this work prosper, and have several times before expressed an opinion of its merit, which each succeeding month confirms. The best articles which appear in the Edinburgh Review, Blackwood, the Englishman's Magazine, Foreign Quarterly, and indeed the leading journals of Great Britain, are here furnished at a moderate price, and in a convenient form. We present two extracts from its pages:

"THE GALLERY OF ILLUSTRIOUS LITERARY CHARACTERS.

"MRS. NORTON.

"Fair Mrs. Norton! Beautiful Bhoudist, as Balaam Bulwer baptizes you, whom can we better choose for a beginner of our illustrious literary portraits, when diverging from the inferior sex, our pencil dares to portray the angels of the craft? Passionately enamored, as we avowedly are, of Miss Landon—soul-struck by the wonders of Mrs. Hemans's muse—in no slight degree smitten by Mary Ann Browne—venerating such relics of antiquity as Lady Morgan, or Miss Edgeworth—pitying (which is akin to loving) the misfortunes of Mrs. Heber or Miss—, we yet must take Mrs. Norton, the leader of the female band. She writes long poems—she is a sprig of nobility—and she is the grand-daughter of that right honorable gentleman whose picture is suspended above her head, and whom the ingenuity of our lithographer has contrived to represent rubicund in the nasal feature, even in spite of the want of colors.

"A caricature of this lady appeared in a rival publication, which is commonly called by the name of the New Monthly. There her characteristic features were lost in a nonsensical straining after effect. What has a lady, the head of a household, to do with staring at the stars, or any other wondrous body stuck over head? We display her as the modest matron, making tea in the morning for the comfort and convenience of her husband. He does not appear, because we had no notion of wasting a lithograph upon any male creature this month. But there she is, with delicate finger, preparing to concoct that fluid, which, in Ireland and France, is called 'the,' and which the people of England, in obedience to the villanous mincing of the cockneys, dwindle to the name of T.

"Authoresses are liable to many rubs. Mrs. Norton, it would appear by her picture at breakfast, has escaped some. Happy in all the appliances of wealth and fame, there is nothing to alter the beauties of that symmetrical form. And her look, as depicted in the sketch before us, is enough to show that she has not passed the night in any sublimity matters; but in the contemplation of that divine philosophy and sublime poetry which is best indulged in without intrusion. The consequences are upon her countenance. 'Sweet are the sorrows of Rosalie.' She is evidently composing a poem, which no doubt will be as fluent, as clear, as lucid, and as warm as the liquid distilling from the urn.

"Of a life like hers what can be told? Spent in elegant retirement, the grace of her private circle, or blazing forth the ornament of brilliant society; there is no unfeminine display about her which can supply matter for the anecdote monger. We all know that she is Tom Sheridan's daughter—and that she has wooed successfully the muses from her earliest days, beginning with the Dandies' Ball, and ending [for the present] with the Undying One. If we wished to speak epigrammatically, in the manner of rising young gentlemen in debating societies, we should say that she has married her thoughts to immortal verse, and herself to the honorable Mr. Norton.

"Of her poetry enough has been said in this our magazine, and we hope that she has met that gentle usage at our hands which it becomes us to bestow, and her to receive. We shall be always found ready to attend her whenever she makes another expedition into the realms of prose, as we understand she meditates, or of rhyme, with the due devotion of critical cavaliers. We think that a lady ought to be treated, even by reviewers, with the utmost deference—except she writes politics, which is an enormity equal to wearing breeches. "But we must hasten to an end, conscious that going further would intrude; and, wishing the fair theme of our pen every degree of honor and happiness,

"With all humility we make our bow."

"MRS. SHERWOOD AND RELIGIOUS NOVELISTS.

"Mrs. Sherwood has published oftener than any other female writer who ever lived. Ninety-three publications we know of, varying in size from a tract to the present three-volume novel, and in price from two-pence to twenty-seven shillings. She has issued a perfect shower of tales for all ages, and a complete collection of her works would form a juvenile library. Her popularity has been extensive, but peculiar; many of her productions have reached, and several have passed their tenth edition—some have been translated into very unusual languages; there are few children and young people in the kingdom unacquainted with her writings, and yet her intellectual reputation is considerable. She revolves in an orbit of her own, and is a kind of connecting link between what is technically termed the religious world and the literary world; being evidently unfamiliar with the style of knowledge that circulates in the latter, and declining to recognize many opinions characteristic of the former. She is an avowed champion of fiction, but 'to keep the balance true' invariably makes it the medium of religious instruction. She has frequently done this in a highly judicious and affecting manner, but she has done it best in some of her least ambitious works, which were some of her first. She has a great talent for arranging incidents and describing costume, &c. Into the hearts of children she has great insight; of young people she knows less, and about men and women she knows nothing. Her descriptions of the world are frequently unnatural, and her sketches of character shadowy and unimpressive. Her good people are cardinal virtues with christian and surnames; her bad people are vices with christian and surnames also; and the good and the bad alike make long speeches nearly the same in point of construction, as in Goldsmith's company of players Romeo's coat serves, when turned, for Mercutio. She wants discrimination and variety, and would be improved by a more extensive acquaintance with the books, things, and persons around her. If a landscape be looked at through a blue glass, it will appear blue; and if the hue of the glass be changed to yellow, the landscape is none the nearer appearing natural. Very nearly all the religious novelists, with Mrs. Sherwood at their head, are wanting in truth of portraiture; they put forth opinions, describe situations, dispose events into plots, but they only paint in body color. Their characters are persons, not their persons characters. Their tales are bundles of incidents, bound together by statements of religious sentiment. Even religion itself is seldom treated with adequate dignity, as that mighty agent which, while it works in the heart, works and shows its fruits in perfect accordance with the natural bent of the human being; as capable of mingling with all the powers of the mind, as consisting less in the adoption of a new opinion, than in discerning the amazing scope afforded for the development of a well-known but neglected principle—'Remember thy Creator!' Very many of these religious tales and novels are badly written, even in point of composition; either florid enough to remind one of the French marchioness who fancied prayer acceptable in proportion to the fine words employed, or so bare and meagre, so intellectually 'hunger-bitten,' that one wishes the writer's mind a full meal of English. The higher faculties are rarely brought into action, either in the work of producing or appreciating; thought is passive, and imagination dormant; no new light is shed upon old truths; he who has read eleven of these tales may, if tolerably quick of apprehension, confidently undertake to write the twelfth, nothing being needful but a kaleidoscopic change of incident. Let there be a fair meek woman whose husband is dead; let her fall into a consumption and die, commending her infant to the care of a friend or sister; let the sister or friend be very perfect too, and live in a village; give a long history of every person and thing in the village, frequent episodes concerning dells and dingles near the village, and more than one description of rural festivities held in some of them; have a fair proportion of delightful old women, good children, and stubborn people of middle age; introduce a great many schools, make numerous reflections, let your leading characters have no communication with the world at large, and afford no proof that there exists such a thing as general information; call the orphan infant Emily, let her have dove-like eyes, let her be an angel, let her have a cousin who is an angel also, and let his name be Henry; let them grow up as brother and sister, let them at last find out they are in love, let Henry find out when at college that he is less of an angel than he thought, and let there be unhappiness, catastrophes, and long, very long letters for a hundred pages; let him return to the beautiful village, and his beautiful cousin quite penitent; let the vicar be a combination of the twelve apostles; give the heads of several of his sermons; introduce death-bed scenes, both happy and awful; finally, let Henry take orders, marry, and be the vicar's curate, and with care to make every thing in extremes, everybody very rich or very poor, very good or very bad, very wise or very foolish, very beautiful if good, and very ugly if bad—be assured you have produced a modern religious tale.

"We frankly admit there are several exceptions to this description, but the majority are, in spirit, described by it. Instruction is rarely interwoven with the fabric of the fiction itself, but appended as a fringe, and the young reader cuts it short. In Mrs. Sherwood's 'Lady of the Manor,' seven volumes of tales on confirmation, which a circle of young ladies are represented as assembled to hear, every tale is closed with prayer and discussion, which the young ladies in the book join in, but which the majority of young ladies out of the book will pass over. 'How good it is of the people who write books,' said a little boy to his mother, 'how good it is of them to put moral in large letters, to show you what to skip.' This is a fact; and we suspect that many, not children, are of much the same mind. Unless the delineations of character and circumstance be striking and instructive, no moralizing will make them so. There wants a compromise between the two great parties of writers of fiction, those who systematically introduce religion, and those who systematically avoid it: one should become aware that to introduce it on petty occasions, and to endeavor to ground excitement upon it, is trifling; and the other might learn with advantage that to stop short of introducing it on great occasions is irreverent neglect, a neglect, too, that very often injures the literary value of a work. We should not think very highly of that person's taste who would expunge the conflicts of Andrew Bell from Mr. Galt's 'Lawrie Todd,' or the presbytery scenes from 'Adam Blair,' or Jeannie Deans from the 'Heart of Mid-Lothian,' or 'Rebecca from 'Ivanhoe'; yet christian principle, either in a state of conflict or triumph, is the main-spring of all. Works of fiction, that aspire to a high rank, must not appeal to ephemeral tastes, but enduring principles; they must anchor in the deep places of the heart if they aspire to any thing beyond amusing for 'the season.' Fiction might and perhaps one day will be made a powerful engine in the amelioration as well as entertainment of society, but it will not be by embodying a sermon in every chapter, still less by making worldliness, however disguised and painted, the foundation of the reader's interest. Our literature already possesses some tales and novels that, without professing theology, make high appeals to the noblest of our faculties, to the poetry dwelling in our hearts, that are not satisfied to amuse idleness, or find wit for malice, but are upborne by a grave, pure, earnest enthusiasm, upon which satire takes no hold. Fiction of this order

"Demands the service of a mind and heart,
Though sensitive, yet in the weakest part,
Heroically fashioned."

"May the number be increased!"

"If obliged to state Roxobel is a foolish book, we do not the less recognize Mrs. Sherwood's ability and excellence, and should be sorry to forget the very many instances in which she has done the juvenile state great service. If she had not formerly written so much she would not have written badly now."

The New-England Magazine. No IV. October 1, 1831. By J. T. & E. Buckingham. Boston: Published by Munroe & Francis.

We copy a brief article from the last number of this valuable and interesting publication. It is devoted entirely to original matter, and is destined to attain a high stand among the best magazines of the day.

THE LAST OF THE COCKED HATS.

"We weep at the death of an old friend, and why should we not lament the extinction of a favorite fashion? There is but one reason for tolerating the present shrivelled state of the civic helmets we call hats, and that is the increased security of the sylvan people—the beavers,—whose own furs are as dangerous to them as the poisoned garment was to Hercules.

"O Sam. Rogers, and the Pleasures of Memory! How many sweet and bitter remembrances hang upon the corner of an old cocked hat! What a catenation of murdered joys and mispent happy hours, extends from it, like the long line of kings in Banquo's posterity! That respectable old beaver is a chronicle of the olden time; it is a page in history; it is an anchor in the great sea of time, that drags up drowned antiquity by the locks. It is a monument of the Augustan age of English literature, and of the golden age of morals and politeness. A part of that era Mr. Webster has called the age of Franklin. Out upon that thrifty old curmudgeon, for he represented his country at Paris in a little vile round hat, instead of the broad sky-scraper of his fathers;—and lie upon the pretty French ladies, who wasted so much flattery upon poor Richard in such a hat!

"The head is the principal part of the man, the hat is the main part of the head, and your cocked hat is to the man what the dome is to Saint Peter's, or the capital to the Corinthian column! Alas, for the age of courtesy, which succeeded that of chivalry. Both are passed with the stately politeness of Sir Charles Grandison, and the courtly vivacity of Will Honeycomb!

"The dead but sceptered sovereigns, who still rule
Our spirits from their hats."

"The cocked hat was indeed the symbol of courtesy; but why lament the emblem when the thing no longer exists? The men who flourished under it lived in a favored time. The present is the age of Brummel and of brass, (for though Brummel is deposed, his principles are in force;) it is the brazen age of impudence and ease, the evil days of Paul Clifford, tight fits, and round hats. But, thank fortune, it is also the age of revolutions, and our modes are now at a stage when every change must be advantageous. I am a republican in sentiment and practice, yet I would fain see the time when every citizen should be so far aristocratic as to cover his bleached or raven locks with a three-cornered hat.

"It is now about four hundred years since hats have covered the heads of all civilized men, and for more than half that term the cocked hat has maintained its civil and military ascendancy; nor is that or virtue yet entirely extinct. There are even now in aliquo abdito et longinquo rure, some secluded nooks of New-England, or of the image of New-England, Ohio, (matre pulchra filia pulchrior) where the tri-cornered hats come forth at least one day in seven to excite glorious recollections and vain regrets that the present race of hats and heroes is so much inferior to the past. O sorrow! that I must grieve for the good old schoolmaster, whose hat, not whose life, I have depicted. He died lamented by many, but nullo flebilior than by me. It was from him, whom I was wont to call Uncle Hugh, that I received all the Latin I have, and which I now delight to render back to its source, by illustrating him and his hat. He clung to that beaver, not with obstinacy, but with tenacity. He would give up any 'time-honored' prejudice, but his hat was a part of his being, a moiety of his heart. 'Bury me,' said he, 'where you will, but let me die, like the great Napoleon, in the cocked hat.' Te teneam moriens deficiente manu.

"I esteem it fortunate that I was educated in a family where ancient modes were not extinct. One of my uncles wore, and, thank heaven, still wears, a queue; not the mean appendage that was in vogue anno domini 1806, the last glimmer of capillary effulgence, before the mass of men became crops, but a real, substantial, pump-handle tie, secured by an eel-skin, and which hangs down beneath his shoulder-blades, leaving a brilliant semi-circle of powder. I remember to have seen a trial, wherein the defendant was mulcted in five hundred dollars and costs, for wilfully and maliciously cutting off the plaintiff's queue. The plaintiff, who was a man of substance as well as feeling, gave his testimony like a person who had been outraged in what he held most sacred—'there where he had garnered up his hair. He wept like a child, or rather like a man, for a less cause would draw tears from a crocodile. The attorney wept too, but, as he was paid for it, the jury were not moved by his sorrows. The injured party appeared in a wig with a magnificent tail-piece, but this was a poor substitute,—it was but a changeling, and the child of his affections was gone.

"He had reason to weep and to refuse to be comforted. What was Alcides himself without his club, and what was Sampson without his locks? There is a young Chinese of a pleasing countenance and carriage that attracts much attention in the streets. My heart warmed towards him at first sight, for he has a genuine, unsophisticated queue, that sweeps the ground. It tapers like the streamer of a frigate, and when he walks briskly, it hangs out behind like the tail of a comet. It has been suggested to me, however, that it has been pieced out with silk, as a coachman lengthens his lash with a snapper.

"O mores! where shall a man go in these days to ask for hair-powder? the word as well as the thing is obsolete, and the inquirer, like Rip Van Winkle, would talk of what his hearers had forgotten. As I hope for distinction, by reviewing ancient forms of dress, I believe that there is in this whole city but one pair of shoe-buckles. These are political ones, and are so well known that I need not describe them. The wearer deserves a good epitaph, (may he have it late,) for the brave stand he has made against innovation.

"It rouses my earliest and latest affections, to behold any of these remnants of the ancient days, that remind me of my grandfather's family. Every member of it resisted innovation like a Turk; and they had a chronology of their own. They reckoned time from the remarkable events that marked the fortunes of the family. Thus my own age was computed from the year in which Uncle Hugh lost his great hat in a puff of wind on Long-wharf. Another era was the year in which Jowler was killed on suspicion of worrying sheep. A favorite point of time from which my grandfather measured the succeeding years was when the thief cut open his pocket and attempted his tobacco-box. This was at a commencement in the last century, just as the old gentleman had taken his hands from his pockets to applaud my first and last speech, a discourse upon Absence of Mind. The 'balloon-year' is also often quoted in our annals, and it indicates the time when the whole family, closely packed in the covered wagon, came to the city to see the ascent of a balloon, and went back disappointed. These recollections are to me better than silver or gold, for they recall the forms of those that I shall never see again. When they lived, I neglected to return their kindness, and now, when they are no more, I think of my ingratitude with unavailing regret. But they have all their epitaphs, in which their virtues are not omitted; and over Uncle Hugh is the semblance of a sable three-cornered beaver, and a legend, purporting that he who slumbers below may be well called the Last of the Cocked Hats."

The Life and Death of Lord Edward Fitzgerald By Thomas Moore. 2 vols. 12mo. New-York: J & J. Harper. 1831.

This work is both a biography and a history. It combines much of the interest of romance with the force of truth. We are heartily tired of novels. The world is deluged with them. Our sympathies for people who never existed and accidents which never occurred, are nearly exhausted, and we are gratified to depend upon the reality of what we read in such a book as Mr. Moore lays before us, and have no restraint on the earnest feelings of interest which the progress of his melancholy story gradually elicits. Even as a romance it would be attractive, but as a history it becomes singularly and mournfully fascinating. It is a brief and simple account of one of the gentlest and most domestic of men, full of affections and tastes almost feminine, and surrounded by a family united together by the closest and most graceful ties of love, drawn away from his pleasant hearth, beautiful wife, and fond relatives, and swallowed up in the whirl and vortex of a dark and fatal revolution. The work sheds a light upon the atrocities perpetrated upon that gallant nation of which the names of both Lord Fitzgerald and his biographer are such brilliant ornaments. The greatest part of the recital is given in the form of letters, at first charming from their playful tenderness and simple nature, and afterwards gathering a fearful interest from the gloomy occasions which brought them forth. As a christian, a soldier, a patriot, a son, husband and brother, an author and a man, this unfortunate and noble victim of oppression shone almost equally conspicuous. Counsellor Sampson and Dr. McNevin, now among the most esteemed of our fellow citizens, and young Emmet, a name which sends a thrill through every American bosom, and which is also associated with the recollection of his respected relations who have made our country their home, are all mentioned in the course of these volumes. It would be superfluous to recommend them to a general perusal. We make room for two brief extracts, one an account of his capture, the succeeding one of his death.

"To return to poor Lord Edward:—as soon as the alarm produced by the soldiers had subsided he ventured to leave his retreat, and resume his place in the back drawing-room, where, Mr. Murphy having invited Neilson to join them, they soon after sat down to dinner. The cloth had not been many minutes removed when Neilson, as if suddenly recollecting something, hurried out of the room and left the house; shortly after which Mr. Murphy, seeing that his guest was not inclined to drink any wine, went down stairs. In a few minutes after, however, returning, he found that his lordship had, in the interim, gone up to his bedroom, and, on following him thither, saw him lying, without his coat, upon the bed. There had now elapsed from the time of Neilson's departure not more than ten minutes, and it is asserted that he had, in going out, left the hall-door open.

"Mr. Murphy had just begun to ask his guest whether he would like some tea, when, hearing a trampling on the stairs, he turned round, and saw Major Swan enter the room. Scarcely had this officer time to mention the object of his visit, when Lord Edward jumped up, as Murphy describes him, 'like a tiger,' from the bed; on seeing which Swan fired a small pocket-pistol at him, but without effect; and then, turning round short upon Murphy, from whom he seemed to apprehend an attack, thrust the pistol violently in his face, saying to a soldier, who just then entered, 'Take that fellow away.' Almost at the same instant Lord Edward struck at Swan with a dagger, which, it now appeared, he had in the bed with him; and immediately after Ryan, armed only with a sword-cane, entered the room.

"In the meantime Major Sirr, who had stopped below to place the pickets round the house, hearing the report of Swan's pistol, hurried up to the landing, and from thence saw, within the room, Lord Edward struggling between Swan and Ryan, the latter down on the floor, weltering in his blood, and both clinging to their powerful adversary, who was now dragging them towards the door. Threatened, as he was, with a fate similar to that of his companions, Sirr had no alternative but to fire, and, aiming his pistol deliberately, he lodged the contents in Lord Edward's right arm, near the shoulder. The wound for a moment staggered him; but, as he again rallied, and was pushing towards the door, Major Sirr called up the soldiers; and so desperate were their captive's struggles, that they found it necessary to lay their firelocks across him, before he could be disarmed or bound so as to prevent further mischief.

"It was during one of these instinctive efforts of courage that the opportunity was, as I understand, taken by a wretched drummer to give him a wound in the back of the neck, which, though slight, yet, from its position, contributed not a little to aggravate the uneasiness of his last hours. There are also instances mentioned of rudeness, both in language and conduct, which he had to suffer while in this state from some of the minor tools of government, and which, even of such men, it is painful and difficult to believe. But as it is,

"Curs snap at lions in the toils, whose looks Frighted them being free."

"It being understood that Doctor Adreen, a surgeon of much eminence, was in the neighborhood, messengers were immediately dispatched to fetch him, and his attention was called to the state of the three combatants. The wounds of Major Swan, though numerous, were found not to be severe; but Mr. Ryan was in a situation that gave but little hope of recovery. When, on examining Lord Edward's wound, Adreen pronounced it not to be dangerous, his lordship calmly answered, 'I'm sorry for it.'

"From Thomas-street he was conveyed, in a sedan-chair, open at the top, to the castle, where the papers found upon him—one of them containing the line of advance upon Dublin, from the county of Kildare—were produced and verified. On hearing that he was at the castle, the lord lieutenant sent his private secretary, Mr. Watson, to assure him that orders had been given for every possible attention being shown to him, consistently with the security of his person as a state prisoner.

"By the gentleman who was the bearer of this message I have been favored with the following particulars—as honorable to himself as they cannot but be interesting to others—of the interview which, in consequence, he had with the noble prisoner:

"I found Lord Edward leaning back on a couple of chairs, in the office of the secretary in the war department, his arm extended, and supported by the surgeon, who was dressing his wound. His countenance was pallid, but serene; and when I told him, in a low voice, not to be overheard, my commission from the lord lieutenant, and that I was going to break the intelligence of what had occurred to Lady Edward, asking him, with every assurance of my fidelity and secrecy, whether there was any confidential communication he wished to be made to her ladyship, or whether I could undertake any other personal act of kindness in his service—he answered merely, but collectedly, 'No, no—thank you—nothing, nothing—only break it to her tenderly.' *****

"From Lady Louisa Conolly to William Ogilvie, Esq.

"Dublin, June 4th, 1798.

"MY DEAR MR. OGILVIE—At two o'clock this morning our beloved Edward was at peace; and, as the tender and watchful mercy of God is ever over the afflicted, we have reason to suppose this dissolution took place at the moment that it was fittest it should do so. On Friday night a very great lowness came on, that made those about him consider him much in danger. On Saturday he seemed to have recovered the attack, but on that night was again attacked with spasms, that subsided again yesterday morning; but, in the course of the day, Mrs. Pakenham (from whom I had my constant accounts) thought it best to send an express for me. I came to town, and got leave to go, with my poor dear Henry, to see him.

"Thanks to the great God! our visit was timed to the moment that the wretched situation allowed of. His mind had been agitated for two days, and the feeling was enough gone, not to be overcome by the sight of his brother and me. We had the consolation of seeing and feeling that it was a pleasure to him. I first approached his bed: he looked at me, knew me, kissed me, and said (what will never depart from my ears.) 'It is heaven to me to see you!' and, shortly after, turning to the other side of his bed, he said, 'I can't see you.' I went round, and he soon after kissed my hand, and smiled at me, which I shall never forget, though I saw death in his dear face at the time. I then told him that Henry was come. He said nothing that marked surprise at his being in Ireland, but expressed joy at hearing it, and said, 'Where is he, dear fellow?'

"Henry then took my place, and the two dear brothers frequently embraced each other, to the melting of a heart of stone; and yet God enabled both Henry and myself to remain quite composed. As every one left the room, we told him we only were with him. He said, 'That is very pleasant.' However, he remained silent, and I then brought in the subject of Lady Edward, and told him that I had not left her until I saw her on board; and Henry told him of having met her on the road well. He said, 'And the children too?—She is a charming woman.' and then became silent again. That expression about Lady Edward proved to me his senses were much lulled, and that he did not feel his situation to be what it was; but, thank God! they were enough alive to receive pleasure from seeing his brother and me. Dear Henry, in particular, he looked at continually with an expression of pleasure.

"When we left him, we told him, that as he appeared inclined to sleep, we would wish him a good night, and return in the morning. He said, 'Do, do;' but did not express any uneasiness at our leaving him. We accordingly tore ourselves away, and very shortly after Mr. Garnet (the surgeon that attended him for the two days, upon the departure of Mr. Stone, the officer that had been constantly with him) sent me word that the last convulsions soon came on, and ended at two o'clock, so that we were within two hours and a half before the sad close to a life we prized so dearly. He sometimes said, 'I knew it must come to this, and we must all go;' and then rambled a little about militia, and numbers; but upon my saying to him, 'It agitates you to talk upon these subjects,' he said, 'Well, I won't.'

"I hear that he frequently composed his dear mind with prayer—was vastly devout, and, as late as yesterday evening, got Mr. Garnet, the surgeon, to read in the Bible the death of Christ, the subject picked out by himself, and he seemed much composed by it. In short, my dear Mr. Ogilvie, we have every reason to think that his mind was made up to his situation, and can look to the present happy state with thanks for his release. Such a heart and such a mind may meet his God! The friends that he was entangled with pushed his destruction forward, screening themselves behind his valuable character. God bless you! The ship is just sailing, and Henry puts this into the post at Holyhead. Ever yours, L. C."

A joke which has run through the press about Signor Paganini and pretty Miss Waters, arose in the following manner:—At a dinner at De Bagnis's, whose pupil the young lady is, Paganini was handing her from one room to another, and she, lost in admiration of him, exclaimed "I wish I was your fiddle!" to which the Signor instantly replied, "and I wish I was your beau."

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Pied de-cochon, Sep. 20th, 1831

Sirs—You editors of periodicals and newspapers, are the most meddling, not to say impertinent people in the world. You set up for critics without any taste, and for censors of manners without having any manners yourselves. In short, you meddle with every body's business, and seem to think, because each one of you calls himself we, that you speak with the authority of a whole community. For example, in the number of the Mirror for the thirteenth of August last, you took upon yourself to ridicule and find fault with public dinners to persons who have just got into office, or have been just turned out, I suppose because you don't often get an invitation to them, or because you had an indifferent dinner yourself, and envied the delicacies of viands and wines your imagination conjured up on reading the accounts of those praiseworthy republican orgies in different parts of the country. You say you consider them as contrary to good sense and public decorum. Now, sirs, "mark how a plain tale shall put you down." My purpose is to give you a sketch of my own history, from which you will learn how I became a great man solely by eating, and thus comprehend that public dinners may become both useful and praiseworthy.

It is of no consequence where I was born, or how I was brought up. Let posterity look to these matters, and record them in my posthumous biography. I cannot say that I ever performed any act, or even made any speeches worthy of commemoration during the early part of my life. The truth is, I had all the indolence characteristic of a great genius, and my principal vocation was sitting still and seeing other people work. The industrious blockheads of our village predicted I should never come to any good, because I did not choose to degrade the majesty of genius by becoming "a workey." But they did not comprehend the vast energies concealed under this apparent listlessness, nor suspect for a moment that when I seemed to be thinking of nothing, because I said nothing, my brain was heaving with the billows of a lofty ambition to become distinguished for something or other. In this way I grew up in the fear of work and the hope of being able to live without it.

The village in which I am "located," lies somewhere west of the Alleganies, and is a tremendous little hot bed of politics. Of course I became, in due time, a politician, the last resource of idle, ambitious young gentlemen that disdain serving any other master but the sovereign people, who have more humble servants to command them than half-a-dozen bank clerks can count in a week. One day when the whole village was crowded with the throngs of an election for constable, I got up on a horse-block and made a speech. But as the people unfortunately happened to be all sober, it did not tell. However, from that time I began to be pointed out as a rising young man, and soon had a party rallying round me, consisting of the tavern-keeper, the village cobbler, and two or three straggling gentry, who lounged about the place and lived upon their relations. These men admired me exceedingly, and swore day and night, that I was the greatest orator in the world with the exception of Patrick Henry, John Randolph, and Peter Spriggins. This Peter Spriggins was our member of assembly, and had his party too, among the old ladies and their fat husbands. He was jealous of my rising popularity, and did all he could to keep me from getting higher than the horse-block.

For some time he succeeded in depressing the energies of my genius, and I began to have serious thoughts of emigrating into a new settlement, where there were no great men to interfere with me. I made a tour of exploration for that purpose, but without success. Wherever there was a church and a blacksmith-shop, I found at least one great man, and returned disappointed to my native village. In the course of three or four years, I and my friends tried all the most approved methods of making great men—but all would not do. Peter Spriggins was my evil genius, and, as the old knife-grinder of the village metaphorically observed, "always kept my nose to the grindstone." At length my friend Spiggot, the autocrat of all tavern-keepers, hit upon an expedient, which step by step led me on to the height of immortal glory, and which has been the means of raising thousands of others to the same elevation. I am the more particular in insisting on Spiggot being the great father of the system, because divers other distinguished characters have attempted to usurp his honors, and set up a claim to the invention.

"Let us give him a public dinner," quoth Spiggot, at a meeting of his friends, rubbing his hands, and his eyes glistening like two pewter platters. The very idea of a good dinner was exquisite. They rubbed their hands unanimously, and their eyes sparkled as bright as Spiggot's.

"But where is the money to come from?" said I. "No money, no dinner now-a-days."

My friends ceased to rub their hands, and their eyes faded into the semblance of leaden bullets stuck in an old target.

"You don't want any money," quoth Spiggot.

"We can't go upon tick," said I; "nobody will trust us."

"I will!" replied the autocrat Spiggot, his whole person swelling into an indescribable majesty at this sublime announcement which struck us all dumb.

"You!" we exclaimed, when we came to our speech.

"I," again responded the autocrat, with increasing dignity of deportment.

It was then settled that, whenever a decent pretext presented itself, Spiggot should stand in readiness to prepare a famous dinner, which I was to furnish with toasts suitable, or unsuitable to the occasion, just as it might be. All the distinguished partisans of Peter Sprig-gina, and Peter himself, were to be invited; and all that the disinterested Spiggot stipulated for, was the appointment of receiver of the public monies for the district, whenever I became a great man. All things were settled, and nothing was wanting but some illustrious occasion for commencing the glorious work of eating my way into office, as a mouse doth into a cheese.

But the envious fates, or perhaps the genius of Peter Spriggins seemed determined to postpone, or defeat our project. No opportunity occurred for several months for me to perform any illustrious action, and we began to despair. At length, however, the fates and the genius of my opponent seemed to relent. One day as I was walking in the skirts of the village, I killed an opossum and brought it home in triumph. Spiggot declared that "the hour and the man was come," and we immediately appointed seven committees, each consisting of one member, for we could spare no more, to issue the invitations and prepare the ceremonials, while I went into the woods and cut a stout stick to cudgel my brains for toasts which should not disgrace the occasion. The friends of Peter Spriggins, and the great Peter himself, were invited, and all came on the day appointed, to the number of sixty or seventy; Spiggot was made president, and who had a better right? He was assisted by ten vice-presidents and three recording-secretaries. The dinner was sufficient to immortalize our host, and we had serious thoughts of decreeing him a sauceman of honor. But we had one or two black sheep among us who envied him, and the vote failed in the committee of arrangements.

Peter Spriggins and his friends were stiff, very stiff, at the commencement, and some of our toasts were rather hard of digestion. Peter made wry faces; but down they went at last, I suppose with a mental reservation. But the Spriggins party was evidently ill at ease and disaffected during the first and second courses, which consisted of twelve hams and twelve roasted geese, with apple-sauce, for the first; and sixteen roasted pigs for the second. The pigs and the geese made no impression. The friends of Peter Spriggins and principle stood by him with an inflexible integrity altogether praiseworthy and without parallel. The third course consisted of a barbecued opossum, the very identical one slain by mine own hand. Neither patriotism nor principle could stand against this ocular demonstration of my valor and prowess invincible. One of the staunchest of Spriggins' adherents forthwith came over to our side—"Confusion to all fence-riders who won't go the whole hog," cried he, and the opossum carried the day. The rest all followed their file leader. Spiggot proposed to drink the "hero of the opossum," with three times three, standing; and the sentiment was echoed by the whole company with the exception of Spriggins, and an honest gentleman who was fast asleep at the foot of the table, and whom I marked out for future proscription whenever I got to be a great man. It was in vain that Spriggins gave a counter toast, and made wry faces at the barbecued opossum. Principle triumphed, and from the day of that dinner the career of his glory was at an end. We had a most patriotic time of it; we drank, sang, told stories, talked all at once, choked our enemies with red-hot toasts, and finally all fell asleep and snored lustily. The next day the editor of our village paper, who had been a guest at the dinner, gave a famous account of me, the opossum, and the entertainment, which he truly stated had concluded in "perfect harmony."

A nomination, and an election to the house of assembly, was the consequence of killing the opossum and eating him up; and I have great pleasure in recording that the first step of my public life was one of gratitude, in obtaining for the patriotic Spiggot the appointment I had promised. My next was an act of justice in procuring the dismissal from office of the unprincipled wretch who had either slept or pretended to be asleep while they were toasting me with three times three. Poor Peter Spriggins magnanimously retired from public life, after vainly attempting to work upon the patriotic Spiggot to give him a public "blow out," and trust to his future glories for payment. He afterwards made an eating tour through various parts of the country, from which he, however, returned as lean as Job's turkey, and somewhat out at the elbows.

The career of eating and of honor was now clear before me, and my mouth was open to swallow every thing that came in my way. My trencher feats since my apotheosis at the great festival recorded above, have been prodigious. One public dinner made me a member of a state legislature; twenty a member of congress; and such is the insatiable appetite of my ambition, that if eating of dinners will enable me to do it, I am determined either to reach the summit of power or die of a surfeit. I am fully satisfied that the true method of persuading mankind is not to argue with them, but to set them eating and drinking. It is in this way that I have neutralized the hostility of some of my most bitter enemies, and brought them to be my most ardent partisans. The only man that ever stood out against more than one "jollification," was a splenetic fellow, who being troubled with a dyspepsia, could eat nothing but cold corned beef. He was a hard character to deal with, but I converted him at last by sending him a keg of dyspepsia crackers. He came to my next dinner, ate like a pig, drank like a fish, and became ever after my staunchest supporter.

And yet you, Messrs. Editors, you take upon yourselves to sit in judgment upon great men and great dinners, out of which great men grow just as naturally as the fungus does from the rankness of rotten wood. Now I would ask you, gentlemen, whether you really believe I should ever have risen to be a great man except by eating public dinners? Where would the county get its current supply of great men, except by stall feeding them at public dinners? Why, you might as well expect oxen to be trumpeted forth to the world as fat oxen, without the aid of stuffing, as to expect men to become great, simply by the help of lean study and sallow meditation, which serve no other purpose than to suck the veins dry and make them fit for nothing but philosophers, scholars, and such like half-starved anatomies.

The reflecting people of these United States are well aware, that there is scarcely on record a fat tyrant. They were all lean rogues, who knew nothing practically of good eating, which causes men not only to become great in size, but great in spirit, genius, and good nature withal. Is it not a standing maxim, every where practically carried into effect, that your alderman, yes, even your assistant alderman, must be judged of by the capacity of his periphery, and demonstrate his fitness for digesting the multifarious statutes of great and small cities, by devouring a certain number of corporation dinners? Is not eating the constituent of greatness every where, and among all animals? How does the valiant lion demonstrate his superiority over the pitiful scampers of the forest? By eating them. How does the wolf establish his claim to a higher rank in the scale of creation than the lamb? By eating him. How does one insect make good his right to domineer over any other insect he pleases? By eating him. In short, you near-sighted, narrow-minded editors, what is the distinguishing characteristic of superiority among all these, but the capacity of eating up one another? I shall exemplify my theory by a fable, and then bid you farewell.

Once upon a time the animal creation, generally, young and old, great and small, from four legs to a thousand, becoming tired of being split up into little separate communities, forever squabbling among each other, met together for the purpose of choosing a king, who should reign over them, and administer justice equally to all. The principal candidates for this high honor, were a lion, a bear, a fox, a wolf, and a jackass. Great dissensions were among the assembly, some preferring the strength of the lion; some the capacity of living without food half the year in the bear, which they justly considered an excellent quality in a king; some rather admiring the cunning of the fox, which among the animals of the forest, is dignified with the name of wisdom; and others the wolf, whose savage ferocity they called courage. As for the jackass, who is represented as having been a beast of great merit, the only ground on which his pretensions were urged by a few obscure partisans, were his long ears, and his skill in music.

The dissensions of the different parties at length rose so high, that there was great reason to fear an immediate rupture, when a rat, who had lived long in the cellar of a common councilman, and arrived at great wisdom by contemplating his example, rose and made a squeak of an hour long, purporting that as there was no probability of their all agreeing upon a candidate, some admiring one quality and some another, he would propose to try them by a standard of which all could judge, and in which they might all agree, namely, their capacity for eating. The whole assembly cried "Hear! hear!" and cheered the old rat with such a good will, that if he had said the word, I believe they would have made him king. But he missed the tide of fortune, and it never rose again.

Agreeably to his proposal, a quantity of tough hard thistles were brought and laid in a heap, it being justly presumed that nothing better could be found to try the capacity of the different candidates for the throne. The first that came to the trial was the lion, who made a deuced snuffing, and scratched and grumbled awhile, then kicked up his heels, consigned the whole assembly to perdition, and scampered away to the woods with his nose bleeding. Next came Sir Bruin, who, after trying his hand, sneaked off, growling as if he had a sore head. Reynard and the wolf were equally unsuccessful, the former excusing himself on account of having robbed a hen-roost, and overeating himself that morning; and the latter on the score of a midnight debauch on a flock of sheep. All eyes were now turned on the ass, as the last hope of the state. He advanced with particular grace, devoured the thistles in a trice without making a single wry face, and concluded with a sonorous bray of triumph, which was echoed by all the assembled universe of wild beasts and tame. He was unanimously elected king; voted a civil list of a million of thistles, and complimented with three beautiful Arabian mares for his wives. He reigned long and happily, and made one of the wisest and best of kings on record, never committing any acts of oppression except when he was hungry, or his subjects curtailed his civil list.

After this illustrious precedent, sirs, will you rail any more against the practice of trying our statesmen at the dinner instead of the council table? Farewell—I wish you a good appetite and better taste.

SCENES ON THE MISSISSIPPI,

BY AN OFFICER IN THE U. S. ARMY.

THE EXPEDITION.

THE month of May had nearly closed, when the troops were ordered to be in readiness to move on distant service in the wilderness. It was cheering intelligence, and every heart expanded to its influence. Every countenance wore a smile, and mantled with the glow of secret satisfaction. Feelings of pleasure, which could not be repressed even in the presence of superiors, were vented on all sides, in whispers of mutual congratulation. There is nothing so kindling to a soldier as change, enterprise, and, if I may say it, danger. It may appear unaccountable to some, but let them think deeply, and trace effects to their causes, and they will not be surprised. All men require excitement, and there is none greater than that derived from overcoming peril. The announcement of the orders broke the dull monotony of the garrison, and awakened us to life and animation. The camp immediately became a scene of active industry. All joined in the hurry of preparation. Arms were inspected, clothing examined, and rations issued; all were engaged in making arrangements for their comfort and efficiency. Here might be seen an old campaigner leisurely packing his knapsack, and arranging in order his clothes and his provisions; there, a new recruit, or a young officer, drawing from its scabbard a sword which had slept in peace since it first came from the hands of the artisan; and, contemplating its glittering blade, seemed to exult in the prospect of an approaching opportunity to try its metal; and there again, an assembled group excited by the news that opened to their view their first military movement, discussing the question of the destination and object of the detachment. We hailed the opportunity of taking the field rather as a trip of pleasure, than a hard and dangerous duty; at least prospective difficulties were forgotten in the general excitement and enthusiasm.

In a few days every preparation had been made. At early dawn the troops paraded. The men were ready and in place. They did not assemble in the brilliant uniforms which usually give such splendor to the dress parades in garrison; but in round jackets, trousers, fatigue caps, knapsacks, and all the appliances necessary for active service on a distant campaign. The companies were mustered separately, with their respective officers, and each one filing off in succession and leaving its ground, took a position on the deck of a fine steamer, which was lying at the public landing. The paddles were soon in motion, and the boat started up the Mississippi.

The season was mild and pleasant. The young spring had just kissed the face of nature and awakened her from the long sleep of winter. The hills were clothed in the fresh budding vegetation; and over the fields Flora had scattered her bright gems in wild and rich profusion.

"Beauty deck'd the hill and dale,
And music breathed through every vale."

The Mississippi is a noble stream. It is the great highway of a mighty nation, wherein are passing the voyagers of many lands. The waters rise and fall periodically, but not regularly. It is not the uniform advancing and receding of the tide, as is perceived in the generality of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic; but a prodigious accumulation of waters at certain periods, as the spring and autumn. They then swell into magnificent force and velocity that awaken a sensation of awful sublimity, and then flow off in the latter part of summer and winter. The river sinks again, leaving exposed the banks on both sides thickly matted by the interlaced roots of stately forests and luxuriant vegetation, disclosing here and there in its bed large sand reefs, and moving sluggishly along as if creeping with difficulty over the bottom. In this way, from the alternately accelerated and retarded velocity of the current, the accumulated and then diminished volume of waters, and from the nature of the soil, which is light and soluble, numerous deposits have taken place, and many of them, rising above the ordinary surface of the water, have become covered with small willows, and acquired the appellation of tow reeds. There are also, dotting the face of the river, a great number of large islands, clothed in dense forests of lofty timber which, though sometimes they intercept the view, and seem crowded too much upon each other, are very picturesque, and produce a pleasing variety.

And the landscape!—It was a rich and varied scene, and changing each hour as we advanced! Here for miles the lands on both sides were low and thickly covered with a heavy growth of cotton-wood; there they swelled into undulating waves, and, running back in gentle acclivities, presented an elevated range of beautiful and picturesque highlands; and there, rising into magnificent heights, and jutting forward to the very edge of the river, formed stupendous palisades that frowned in stern grandeur from above, and seemed to mark and define the limits of the neighboring element; and there, again receding in gradual slope, they sunk down and opened into a vast prairie, where the eye roved in uncertainty over the immense and boundless expanse. The whole spectacle was grand and panoramic. There was every moment occurring something of novelty; of beauty, or of magnificence, to kindle new interest, and prompt to pleasing expectation.

And there!—there comes the magnificent Missouri! Furious and impetuous, chafing on his banks, bearing down the proud ornaments of the forest, and sweeping every thing before him in his headlong course, he hurries on to meet and embrace his lovely bride the gentler Mississippi; and now in union joined, they journey on to mingle with the gulf, and sink together in their ocean grave!

It was not long before it was ascertained that the destination of the detachment was Rock Island, to operate against the Sac Indians, who, it was understood, had violated the treaties in which they had ceded to the United States a large body of land lying east of the Mississippi, on and about the mouth of Rock river, and had committed some depredations upon the white settlers in that section of country, which called for redress and the interposition of the authorities of the government. Not a cheek blanched, not a heart quailed at the threatened dangers and ferocities of Indian hostility. A stern smile of conscious ability to redress wrong and vindicate right, sat triumphant upon every face, and every eye was lighted by the deep feeling that burned within the heart.

The sun was hastening down the western steep, and "broadening by degrees just o'er the verge of day," when a long vernal sweep in the river presented in the far distance the first view of Fort Crawford, situated on an elevated rock at the very southern extremity of Rock Island, and rising in all the splendor of battlement and tower, from the very bosom of the waters. There was something exciting in it, for all expected that enterprise was waiting them there, and preparing for them an opportunity for the exercise of their courage, fortitude, and manly virtues. It seemed long, however, in our anxiety, before we arrived. The shades of night had gathered round us and involved every thing in obscurity before we reached the spot designated for the disembarkation of the troops; and the bustle and stir attending this movement in the dark were exciting enough, and not without some amusing incidents. Every thing went forward in good order, and the canvassed habitations, tenanted by many an ardent spirit, were seen to rise on all sides through the gloom; and, invested as they were, in the doubtful light, with an artificial magnitude, seemed as well defined edifices, springing up by the exercise of some magic influence, and not unlike a well ordered city, with its streets and its active community. It was late before this seemingly mysterious creative power had ceased to operate; but gradually things became quiet, and one after another settled down into repose. The low murmur of conversation became hushed, and night assumed her reign. Nothing was heard except the heavy tread of the sentinel, occasionally interrupted, as his attention was attracted by the deep breathings or unexpressed mutterings of some wearied soldier who had already engaged the savage foe in his dreams, and was struggling in the desperate conflict.

The morning broke upon us and revealed a scene of fortress, flood, and field, where assembled hosts were ready for the work of death. The position occupied by the troops of our brigade was a large plain connected with the fort, and lying under the protection of its guns; and there, it was announced we should remain and wait the result of the Indian council.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

WRITING AN ARTICLE.

BY A CONTRIBUTOR.

It is a thing that must be done. Two or three printer's men with families, wait for it at a certain time, and lose perhaps half a day's work for want of it. Then their paper is kept back, and the public—the million, the substantial subscribers, who have paid their money, must be supplied, must be instructed, must be amused; and the matter to amuse them must come out of my brain; for, as the Roman said, "I have promised." The necessity of writing when you do not feel like it is a torture, of which the happy inexperienced can form no conception. The unnatural struggle to produce that which is not wearies the brain. It is the vulture at your vitals, or the other fellow in the fable rolling the rock up the hill. I met a fine exemplification of this the other day in my reading, which exactly expresses my ideas:

"We know nothing of a more restless tendency than one of these fine June days—one that begins with a morning damp and a fresh south wind, and gradually clears away in a thin white mist, till the sun shines through at last, genial and luxurious, but not sultry, and every thing looks clear and bright in the transparent atmosphere. We know of nothing which so seduces the very eye and spirit of a man, and stirs in him that gipsy longing, which, spite of disgrace and punishment, made him a truant in his boyhood. There is an expansive rarity in the air of such a day—a something that lifts up the lungs and plays in the nostril with a delicious sensation of freshness and elasticity. The close room grows sadly dull under it. The half-open blind, with its tempting glimpse of the sky, and branch of idle leaves flickering in the sun, has a strange witchery. The poor pursuits of this drowsy world grow passing insignificant; and the scrawled and blotted manuscripts of an editor's table—pleasant anodyne as they are when the wind is in the east—are, at these seasons, but the "diary of an ennuyé"—the notched calendar of confinement and unrest. The commendatory sentence stands half completed; the fate of the author under review, with his two volumes, is altogether of less importance than five minutes of the life of that tame pigeon that sits on the eaves washing his white breast in the spout; and the public good will, and the cause of literature, and our own precarious livelihood, all fade into dim shadow, and leave us listening dreamily to the creeping of the sweet south upon our vine, or the far-off rattle of the "hourly" with its freight of happy bowlers and gentlemen of suburban idleness. What is it to us when the sun is shining, and the winds bland and balmy, and the moist roads with their fresh smell of earth tempting us away to the hills—what is it, then, to us, whether a poor-devil author has a flaw in his style, or our own leading article a "local habitation and a name?" Are we to thrust down our heart like a reptile into its cage, and close our shutter to the cheerful light, and our ear to all sounds of out-of-door happiness? Are we to smother our uneasy impulses and chain ourself down to a poor dry thought, that has neither light nor music nor any spell in it, save to the poor necessity of occupation? Shall we forget the turn in the green lane where we are wont to loiter in our drive, and the cool claret of our friend at the Hermitage, and the glorious golden summer sunset in which we bowl away to the city—musing and refreshed! Alas—yes! the heart must be thrust back into its cell, and the shutter must be closed, and the green lane and the friend that is happier than we (for he is idle) must be forgotten, and the dry thought must be dragged up like a wilful steer and yoked to its fellow, and the magnificent sunset with all its glorious dreams and forgetful happiness must be seen in the pauses of articles, and with the 'bleared een' of painful attention—and all this in June—prodigal June—when the very worm is all day out in the sun, and the birds scarce stop their singing to eat from the gray light to the dewfall! And for what? Is the quid pro quo no misnomer? Is it well to crucify thus the desire? Spirit of the daily press, answer us! Our enemy triumphs monthly that we have written a book—our sometime trumpeter changes his key for a private difference—our sometime friend—our early and ardent friend—whose genius we have loved, whose book we have praised, whose name is mentioned always in our wine—even this idol of our temple of friendship turns upon us with personal abuse, and calls us hard names, as if we could have the heart with our thousand recollections to retort or provoke them! And then the poet whose bad verses we rejected, and the abusive editor at whose demand of 'black mail,' we sent no new number, and the impertinent 'kindred spirit,' of whose incognito friendship we declined the honor—all these come down upon us in their various hebdomadals, and well nigh persuade us, spite of our old aunt's averment and the subscription list in our very eye, that we are no genius, and that our last number is at hand!"

As for me, I was not so resolute. I rose in my darkened room, and left the idle pen upon the table. My head ached. I could not fix my thoughts. It's a wretched thing to be a scribbler. "I will walk for fifteen minutes," said I to myself. "I will take a few breaths of the fresh air;" and even while I was quieting my conscience by repeating the declaration to return in fifteen minutes, I reached the street, like a prisoner stealing away from his cell, and with the equivocal enjoyment of a man who feels that he is doing wrong. Presently the sunshine and the crowd, and the whirling wheels, and the bright faces, and the nodding feathers blazed altogether before me. I knew I should not be worth a sous for the rest of the day. The extraordinary influence of the air and of the scene would have excited me to pleasure, but the conviction that I was leaving something undone which I should have to do, hung over me like a shadow; nay, haunted me like a ghost. Sometimes, peradventure, I forgot it in a momentary dream, as some one passed whom I admired, or felt interested in. There is nothing like the multifarious objects of a thronged street to take the mind from itself. There came a little girl with a satchel, and reading her lesson, I suppose, as she walked, and she unconsciously drew so close to me, that I might have kissed her by accident; and then I laughed, and the article was forgotten for a moment. Then an old white-headed blind man, led by a little dog and string, felt his way along. I thrill always to look on a blind man. In every circumstance of life it must be an awful dispensation. My mind always recurs to Milton, and his pathetic and splendid invocation to light:

"Thee I revisit safe,
And feel thy sovereign lamp; but thou
Revisit'st not these eyes, that roll in vain
To find thy piercing ray, and find no dawn;
So thick a drop serene hath quenched their orbs,
Or dim suffusion veiled."

In Milton's blindness he had some consolation, all the gratification that an elevated soul could derive, from a consciousness of greatness was his. But the wretched beggar, on whom age, and poverty, and disease have set their mark, amid the glow and rejoicing of this noonday splendor, with youth, and beauty, and manly nobleness, and unrepressed mirth around him, tottering timidly and tremblingly, or utterly friendless among his fellow creatures, and perhaps with no other living thing to love than that little faithful dog—his guide. With what a heart must he contemplate the present and the future! And why may he not have feelings, reader, like thine own; and why may he not have had hopes as high, and affections as deep, and a bold spirit, and a mounting ambition? Why, what sweet mother may have bent over that withered and skeleton face, when the polish of youth was on the forehead, and the cheeks and lips were touched with crimson, and those deathlike untenanted sockets shone with the full beauty of nature's most wonderful creation? I am sure we cannot conceive the effect of blindness upon the victim. Closing our eyes for a time, or even losing their use for weeks or months, will give us but a faint realization of it. There must be a wonderful fading away and indistinctness of many ideas. A vague and new impression of what is passing on without in that vast beautiful external world, from which we are as utterly excluded as if we were not in existence. We cannot number what an infinite variety of delights we are perpetually receiving through the vision, and even when we are asleep, the images sealed on the mind in waking hours are there yet, lingering and busy, floating and changing, and blending together in fantastic groups. So forcibly are they stamped upon the brain that when we close our eyes we by no means shut out the objects around us as any one will instantly perceive by the experiment. But by and by the mind of the unfortunate, whose impressions are not renewed, must become a blank. It would be curious to understand the nature of a blind man's dreams, especially one who had been many years, or always in that situation. He cannot behold the shapes and colors of objects. No faces will visit him—he will not be roaming through woods as we do, but still in his dream he will be wandering darkly on, and hearing the great world go on about him. By the way, the sight of this miserable man reminded me of an interesting incident, which, when I was a boy, affected me strongly. My guardian was fond of company, and seldom a month passed without finding some agreeable sojourner at our house, and this taste of his was so exceedingly in unison with the disposition of his excellent wife, that between them both I saw more noble and elegant men and delightful women there than I met abroad. Home was always the very pleasantest place in the world for all of us. Among our visitors was once a young creature, a favorite with every body. The old lady was perfectly fascinated with her, and could not therefore blame her husband for sometimes expressing his own admiration. She was only sixteen. My guardian was fifty, and he was in truth famously fond of pinching her full Hebe cheeks, and I recollect one afternoon he presented her with such a hearty smack on her lips, that I came to the conclusion that he knew what was what as well as most people. She was beautiful. Indeed, I used to look on her as a curiosity, and in faith she was a pretty little wonder. I was fourteen, and she could see over my head. I should as soon have thought of making love to the evening star, besides (an awkward discovery to love at first sight) she was already engaged to be married. I perceived it in a short time without the aid of a conjurer. Mr. Frank Berkley did not come fixed up so finely for nothing. Leave boys alone. They are devils for finding out such things. Well, I was glad of it. Frank was a noble fellow. Nature and fortune both smiled on him. Many a ball, many a pair of skates, many a ride on horseback, and other kindnesses I had owed to him. I was glad of his happiness and of hers, for she was happy—irrepressibly and perpetually so. There was no cessation to her spirits. She could not sit still five minutes at a time to save one of her perfect set of teeth. She never walked. She danced and darted every where like a bird. I once dared her to look serious with me for a minute, by the watch. I was just old enough to enter into the full beauty of her face as she pretended to compose her features, pressed her lips together with forced gravity, and lifted those superb blue eyes directly to mine. She stood it for three seconds like a statue, when the mouth and eyes betrayed the lurking joy, and we laughed together for nothing under heaven but because we were the two happiest creatures it shone on.

One week from that day she was struck blind. A sudden disease, unskillfully managed by the physicians, fell into her eyes, and quenched their light forever. She bore the awful calamity with patience; and the wonderful gentleness and firm beauty of character which it disclosed, touched every bosom with the tenderest sympathy and compassion. Yet no one ever after saw the slightest trace of that exuberant spirit which had before made her the charm of the house. She would smile sometimes, but it was a smile that used to bring tears into my eyes. Her vigorous health, too, had departed; but her beauty, if possible, was yet more striking. She abandoned every thing like ornament. Her rich soft hair was parted meekly upon her forehead, and her garments were marked by the chastest simplicity; but her endearing helplessness, the low tones of her plaintive voice, the subdued sadness of her pale sweet face, and the sight of those once radiant and laughing eyes, now forever closed and dark, affected me with deeper feelings of commiseration, respect, and love than I ever experienced for any other. She firmly refused the addresses of Frank Berkley, and retired to the house of her parents, some distance in the country. Frank turned out a dissipated, worthless fellow, partly from his inherent wildness, but principally, it was allowed by all, from keen anguish and disappointment in this unhappy girl. Although no murmurs ever escaped her lips, and indeed superficial observers deemed her quite reconciled to her lot, softened as it was by every thing that affection and affluence could invent or purchase, her health gradually failed. She grew thin and silent. Even the flowers which her sisters used to bring her were received with apathy and neglected. She went no more to the window in the summer mornings, to breathe the scented air. She turned away from the book, which some beloved and loving voice was ever ready to read to her; and even music, of which she had been passionately fond, seemed to fall on her ear as if she were indeed a marble statue, which in appearance she so closely resembled. One evening, contrary to her usual wont, she suffered her young sister, a bright, light-hearted, amiable girl, and just such a creature as she herself had been, to read aloud a pathetic story, I think by Grenville Mellen, of the death of a naval officer in the Mediterranean of the yellow fever, and the consequent misery of his wife here. It was a story evidently from a heart familiar with every noble and tender feeling. The affectionate young girl looked up in her sister's face as she came near the conclusion, and was surprised to find tears bursting from her eyes. She had never seen her so affected, and she heard her exclaim, with a tremulous voice, "My heart is broken, dear Julia; you will never read to me again." A few days afterwards a sad procession wound over the field to the little country churchyard, and paid the last ceremonies to one of the gentlest and loveliest of human beings.

MYTHOLOGY.

THE MONTH OF NOVEMBER IN NEW-YORK.

BY S. WOODWORTH.

THE reader need scarcely be told that the name of this month, (like that of September and October) expresses its number, counting from March. The Saxons called it windy month, and, we doubt not, with good reason. It is the last month of autumn, and the eleventh of the modern year.

November has been distinguished by many memorable events, a few of which are entitled to be recorded in this article. On the first day of this month, in the year 1755, the city of Lisbon was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake, in which ten thousand human beings perished! On the same day, (ten years afterwards) the stamp act went into operation in America, which was the proximate cause of a political earthquake, whose effects have been felt in almost every section of the globe. Washington's farewell general orders to the American armies, were issued on the second, 1783. St. Clair's defeat, by the Indians, occurred on the fourth, 1791. The destructive earthquake in Quito, South America, also happened on the fourth, 1797. The soil of that province underwent such a dreadful agitation, that, notwithstanding the extreme feebleness of the population, nearly forty thousand natives perished; being either buried beneath the ruins of their own houses, swallowed up by the new-made chasms in the earth, or drowned in the lakes suddenly formed by the commotion.

The battle of Tippecanoe, on the banks of the Wabash, between the American army, under General Harrison, and the Shawnee Indians, under their prophet and the celebrated Tecumseh, was fought on the morning of the seventh, 1811. During the revolutionary war the infamous Colonel John Butler, with a large force of Indians, Tories and British regulars, massacred a great number of helpless women and children at Cherry Valley, on the eleventh, 1778. In the late war, the battle of Williamsburgh, at Chrysler's Field, Upper Canada, occurred on the eleventh, 1813.

A general massacre of the Danes, throughout England, took place on the thirteenth, 1002, by order of king Ethelred. The festival of St. Brice, which fell on a Sunday, the day on which the Danes usually bathed themselves, was selected for this bloody purpose. Neither age nor sex was spared, and among the victims was Gunilda, sister of Sweyn, king of Denmark, who had embraced christianity, and was married to earl Palling. Her husband and children were butchered before her eyes! Sweyn, however, had his revenge; for, in the following year, he invaded England with a numerous army, and spread devastation over the country with fire and sword.

The conflagration of Moscow burst out on the fourteenth of November, 1812. On the sixteenth, 1773, the celebrated tea-party took place in Boston, when three hundred and forty-two chests, containing several thousand weight of the finest tea, were broken open, and their contents thrown into the river. No opposition was made, though surrounded by the king's ships. All was silence and dismay.

The battle of Arcole, between the French and Austrians, commenced on the sixteenth, 1796. The battle of Koutovo, between the French, under Davoust, and the Russians, under Miloradovitch, occurred on the seventeenth, 1812, when the French were defeated with horrid slaughter. Two days afterwards, on the same ground, Marshal Ney's army suffered a similar defeat; and, on the twenty-seventh, the whole French army, under Bonaparte, were totally defeated, at the passage of the Berezina, at the bridge of Vesseloto. No pen can describe the scene of horror and confusion that followed! The French loss was more than ten thousand killed, drowned, frozen, &c., besides thirteen thousand who were taken prisoners by the Russians.

On the eighteenth, 1777, "Philip's Manor," in this state, was burnt by the British and Tories, by order of Governor Tyron, with circumstances of great barbarity! On the twenty-fifth, 1783, the British army finally evacuated New-York, their government having acknowledged our independence by treaty.

The first day of this month, (well known in this city as quarter-day), is celebrated in the catholic church as the "Feast of All-Saints," being the festival of those saints to whose individual honor on account of their number, particular days could not conveniently be allotted. The second is called "All Soul's Day," a festival which is still preserved in the almanac and episcopal church calendar. It was formerly observed by prayers for the dead, "in remembrance of whom," (says the author of "Festivals, Games, and Amusements.") "persons, dressed in black, went round the different towns, ringing a loud and dismal-toned bell at the corner of each street, every Sunday evening, during the month; and calling upon the inhabitants to remember the deceased who were suffering the expiatory flame of purgatory, and to join in prayers for the repose of their souls." The eleventh is called Martinmas, in honor of the "Great St. Martin, the glory of Gaul," who lived in a rock at Tours, and fed upon nothing but roots, a diet which the observers of his festival have by no means thought proper to imitate. St. Martin was a native of Sabaria, in Pannonia, who, from a soldier, became a convert to christianity at Amiens, and in the year 374 was made bishop of Tours. He founded the monastery of Marmontier, and is regarded as the apostle of Gaul. The twenty-third is called St. Clement's day, in honor of Romanus Clement, a father of the church, the companion of St. Paul, and the bishop of Rome.

On the twenty-second, the sun enters the sign Sagittarius,

"The glittering archer in the zodiac,
The armed centaur Chiron"—
"He that taught stout Peleus' son the way
How with delight upon the harp to play."

One of the centaurs by the name of Chiron, was famous for his knowledge of music, medicine, and shooting. He instructed mankind in the use of plants and medicinal herbs, and taught the polite arts to the greatest heroes of the age in which he lived, such as Achilles, the son of Peleus, Æsculapius, Hercules, &c. The battle of the Centaurs, with a people called the Lapithæ, is famous in mythological history. Ovid has elegantly described it, and the same subject has employed the pens of Hesiod, Valerius Flaccus, &c. The origin of the contest was a quarrel which took place at the marriage festival of Hippodamia with Pirithous, where these monsters being excited by a cup too much, behaved rudely to the ladies, for which they were promptly and properly chastised on the spot, by the gallant Hercules, Theseus, and the rest of the wedding guests, who compelled them to retreat on a gallop. They fled to Arcadia, where they settled; but in a subsequent contest with them, Hercules accidentally wounded his old preceptor, Chiron, in the knee, with a poisoned arrow. The hero flew to the assistance of his tutor; but as the wound was incurable, and caused him the most excruciating pain, Chiron begged Jupiter to deprive him of immortality. The petition was granted, and he was placed by the god among the constellations, under the name of Sagittarius.

November in New-York is distinguished by quarter-day falling on the first, and a military anniversary on the twenty-fifth, the latter being observed in remembrance of the evacuation of the city by the British troops, in 1783. For many years after this event, the day was celebrated with an enthusiasm little inferior to that exhibited on the fourth of July; "but the patriotic spirit in which it originated, (says a late appendix) has gradually evaporated; until, at length, the return of this anniversary is met with comparative indifference." It is now distinguished by nothing but a "morning salute," by a few gray-headed heroes of the revolution, "the hardy gleanings of many a desperate fight," called the veteran corps; and a military parade in the forenoon.

The last day of this month, the thirtieth, is celebrated by the Scots in New-York, in honor of St. Andrew, the patron saint of Scotland, who is supposed to have preached the gospel in Scythia. He is said to have suffered martyrdom on a cross of the figure of the letter X, which is called St. Andrew's cross.

This month is also distinguished by that annual visitation of soft, mild, mellow weather, usually denominated "Indian Summer;" which, like the placid evening of a well-spent life, affords a favorable opportunity for making preparation to meet the cold and darkness of the period which "shuts the scene." The Park and Battery are covered with the perishing honors of their rifled trees; the groves and forests are "parti-colored;" for it is now

"The evening twilight of the faded year,
When objects all in mellow tints appear;
When feather'd songsters cease their tuneful notes,
And liveried groves appear with yellow tints."

This season is well described in a work now preparing for the press, entitled "The American Farmer's Indian Summer—a poem," by James B. Sheys. The following are the fifth and sixth stanzas:

"And now reveal'd amid the perfect day,
High-towering oaks their changeable purple spread;
Broad-branching elms, in fading yellow, gay,
And graceful maples, with their glossy red,
The beech, the lover's record, rears its head,
(Mid nature's falling pride,) in green array'd;
While, fondly o'er the consecrated dead,
The first to blossom and the last to fade,
The solemn willow droops in many a chain-like braid.

"Such varied glories of the autumn woods,
No other land beneath the sun may boast;
Their tinted leaves bright showering o'er the floods,
Checking the waves, in whirling eddies lost,
And when the fierce north-west, with chilling frost
Sweeps their sward honours down the mountain side,
How like some shoreless sea, sublimely tost,
Their forests vast, in billowy forms divide,
While, on each heaving surge, the blasts, wild-shrieking, ride."

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

MRS. AUSTIN, for her benefit at the Park theatre, presented a delightful musical entertainment, consisting of portions of Artaxerxes, the Tempest, and Cinderella. Of the latter we have already said sufficient. Her Mandane, in the former, was extremely effective, and drew from a fashionable house the most lively signs of gratification. The favorite quartetto, "Mild as the moonbeams," was loudly encored, and the song the "Soldier tired of war's alarms," a most difficult piece, was executed with an ease, correctness, and power, only equalled by the repetition, which was instantly called for. The fire and force of her "Monster away," surprised us, characterized, as she is, more by uniform softness and skill than sudden impulses. We are beginning to discover of this lady, that she too often attempts less than she is capable of accomplishing, and tasks her powers to the uttermost only on particular occasions. The thronged audience on this, her benefit night, evidently excited her to an unusual effort, which she has not equalled, we think, at any former period. We may also remark of her that her voice, instead of failing, as is generally the case with vocalists after protracted exertion, gathers strength, flexibility, and sweetness; and on this evening, notwithstanding repeated encores, her singing was clearer and easier as she drew towards the conclusion. Mr. Jones (Arbaces) sang "Water parted from the sea" with admirable taste. This gentleman appears to more advantage in proportion as he has much and laborious work to perform. Under an unassuming and modest style, he possesses invaluable resources of voice, taste, and science, which are probably more highly appreciated by artists because frequently eclipsed by the brilliant displays of others less gifted. We must not omit to compliment Mrs. Sharpe upon her execution of the music of Artaxerxes. It was chastely and firmly given, and afforded a very creditable example of her ability in a department of the drama quite distinct from that in which she has built up her principal reputation. A rather tedious new farce, called "Old Regimentals," was followed by an act of the Tempest—that splendid creation of mind and fancy which, as it is now arranged, presents one of the most refined and delicate of all theatrical exhibitions—the wonderful imagination and splendid language of Shakspeare, set off with delicious music by vocalists of such power as Mrs. Austin and Mr. Jones. We can scarcely conceive any thing more ethereal and calculated to thrill through the senses than that part of the first act when Ariel enters invisible, playing and singing, Ferdinand following to strains of ravishing melody. We are agreeably lost in attempts to imagine what would be our own sensations, thus apparently the sole survivor of an awful shipwreck, cast ashore on this fairy isle, and led about by floating strains,

"Sounds and sweet airs that give delight and hurt not."

Hear the wondering exclamation of Ferdinand:

"Where should this music be? 'Tis the air, or the earth?
It sounds no more, and sure it waits upon
Some god of the island. Sitting on the bank,
Weeping again the king, my father's wreck,
This music crept by me upon the waters;
Allaying both their fury and my passion,

With its sweet air: thence I have followed it,
Or it hath drawn me rather! But 'tis gone.
No, it begins again."

And then Ariel's exquisite song:

"Full fathoms five, thy father lies,
Of his bones are coral made;
Those are pearls that were his eyes;
Nothing of him that doth fade,
But doth suffer a sea change,
Into something rich and strange."

Mrs. Austin's Ariel was a brilliant master-piece. She never appeared to more advantage, and her acting was finished, impassioned, and beautiful. She is rapidly improving in this particular. "Follow through the sea," was in her best style. Indeed, the lovers of music present will acknowledge the entertainment to have been of a very rare character. "She never told her love," (music from Haydn) by Mr. Jones, was irresistibly sweet and tender. The audience were rather surprised at the unexpected effect which Mr. Thorne gave to Caliban. It was a strikingly original and bold delineation of the character, and one which ought to advance this gentleman greatly in the general estimation. He who has the talent to play either Falstaff or Caliban, has something to be proud of. Miss Hughes has since appeared in Cinderella, in which she "gathered golden opinions" during her last visit to this city. What a fine treat it would be to hear this charming young vocalist with Mrs. Austin. The manager owes this arrangement to the liberality with which opera has been encouraged. Mr. Charles Kean has commenced an engagement. We have not at present room to speak of this chaste and impressive actor's performances as they deserve, but shall do so in our next, when we shall take occasion to mention Mr. Bailey's new tragedy of Waldemar.

The American theatre has been several times filled by the attraction of Miss Clifton's Imogene and Mr. Hamblin's Bertram. This young lady requires a course of gentle and friendly criticism to become a worthy representative of the arduous characters which she is undertaking. Nature has done much for her. Application must do more. Her extreme youth, her commanding person—her finely expressive cast of countenance, are circumstances which instantly prepossess every beholder in her favor. We do not feel ourselves at this moment sufficiently familiar with her late efforts to permit of our speaking with much confidence of the probability of her future success, although our convictions lean that way. We shall hereafter examine her claims to attention with more care. We, however, hope that the general notice she has attracted may not prove misplaced, but rather spur her on to those severe and unremitting studies which alone can ensure permanent fame.

The French company favored the public with numerous operas highly attractive, and, in common with many others, we regret the shortness of their visit.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1831.

Editor's study.—The heavens have opened their flood-gates this morning. The wind rushes by, shaking the windows in their casements, and hurling the big splashing drops against the glass with the fierceness of a human passion. What a deluge! above, one opaque uniform gloom, and in the streets, the swollen streams tumbling along the gutters like mountain brooks, and the hacks with their smoking horses urged rapidly on by the drenched drivers, and the melancholy wet men stepping along among the puddles, and the dripping cloaks, coats, and umbrellas, and the immense omnibuses moving by like houses, and not a woman to be seen except yonder strapping representative of the feminine gender, striding straight through the crowd like a rhinoceros, one arm grasping a huge bundle, the other gathering together her apparel from the inundated pavement, evidently the victim of some sad necessity, or she would not be there. Late last night the sky was all spread over with stars, and the moon had arisen above the houses upon a track of calm transparent blue, and a superb cloud lay by it, and as it gradually changed, crossed it like bars, till the pale orb seemed a sad face gazing through the grate of a prison, and there was a high steeple beneath tipped with the yellow light, and we stood with a friend by a lifted window and admired it. And here's a change, forsooth! That heavy sound of the wind that sweeps by like an ocean surge, beating over the deck of a ship, always reminds us of the sea and those exposed now to its fury. We beheld the ocean once in a hurricane. You need not start away so, my fair reader, we are not going to describe it, although we can even now see those white crested moving mountains approaching from above as if the world were all liquid, and we can feel the light thing in which we were pent up, rising with the motion of a balloon to their impulse, then sinking with the sweep of a bird, then darting upward again, and we clinging to the slant deck. What should we then have given to be sitting thus calmly in a pleasant room with an even pulse, a cheerful mind, and a quire of this smooth blue letter paper waiting quietly on our table to receive our little common-place familiarities with thee, dear reader. Indeed, when we think of earthquakes, cholera morbus, the arm-chair of a dentist, and a ship at sea crowded with passengers in a tempest, we do screw ourselves down into a resignation—a sort of philosophy—nay, even a cheerful pleasure in the editing of this our humble hebdomadal. So do we extend towards thee a hand of right good fellowship, and go on with our task smilingly; notwithstanding that our printer has just left us with the look of a man who did not mean to be imposed upon, declaring that our space in this department for the present week was not too scanty to admit of our most lengthy lucubrations.

It is a disadvantage of editing a weekly, that all the daily gentry have the first of the news, which, before we gain a chance to animadvert upon it, gets to be too stale even to mention. Most of our readers, therefore, will have perceived the measures recently adopted by the New University for the erection of a suitable edifice in Broadway. We are told, also, that the New-York Sacred Music Society intend to build a hall for their exhibitions, and that these structures will be reared in a style of elegance which will be ornamental to the city.

A strong curiosity, we find, has been excited here respecting the "fire king." Some time ago a report ran through the city that some of his experiments had proved fatal. It is astonishing what a particularity is sometimes given to stories without the slightest foundation in truth. A grave friend imparted to us a circumstantial account of this gentleman's last words and actions—how his preparations had been injured in his voyage—how he told his secret to his physician—how it was worth forty thousand dollars, and that the learned M. D. intended immediately to set off for London to sell it to some of the philosophical societies, and, notwithstanding all this, Monsieur Chabert steps out, a visible contradiction, and goes on eating fire as if nothing had happened. His exhibitions are said to be really wonderful—a hint from him might be valuable to the inhabitants of warm climates. We understand there is also a ventriloquist here of great repute. This faculty, a gentleman of standing in Europe insists, is the common possession of all human beings, and he adds that he could communicate a secret by which each individual could easily practise it with perfect effect. He, however, refuses to reveal the art, for which, in our opinion, he merits the thanks of all discreet, quiet folks. What! make ventriloquists of the million—of your men of wit—of wags—of boys!—forbid it fortune! We should not sleep nor eat. Kittens would mew in our coat pockets, and fire be cried under our beds. We should spend our lives opening drawers, trunks, closets and the like, for birds, rats, calves, and little babies. Innocent gentlemen in the street, who never dreamed of uttering a word, would be knocked down for calling those next them scoundrels. If our friend saluted us with "good morning," we should look behind us, or out in the hall, or on the eaves of the house to see where the voice came from; and if at a table of strangers a person from the other end asked us to cut him a wing of the fowl, we should turn to our friend in the opposite direction and tell him, "none of his jokes!" We trust Mr. Chabert and Mr. Nichols, and all others possessed of these wonderful discoveries, will make the most of them, and not let them out to render the world worse than they are.

A knock at the door—enter boy with a package and exit. Now, should these be decent verses, they will save us trouble. A right fair hand, and sealed with that dainty wax, like the bed of a forest stream with golden sands in the bottom—impressed with a lyre and the words "I reply whenever I am touched." Seals are beautiful things. The best one we ever saw was a plain "God bless you." Let us see what has touched this unknown. Poetry! Moonlight musings!—nothing like an original subject. It's half the battle. The motto too is chosen from ourselves. That's cunning, and an old trick of youthful correspondents. If our heart were not positive marble to flattery, the consequence to the reader would be dire. A crude essay, or a page of common-place verses is sure to be prefaced with "valuable miscellany," or "ably conducted journal." We sometimes put whole heaps of "constant readers" and "old subscribers" into the fire. Here are the lines.

MOONLIGHT MUSINGS.

"And he has lingered at night beneath the moon, and brooded over his destiny."—N. Y. Mirror.

The crowded stars are out upon the sky
With tremulous lustre, and the large, late moon,
Her waning orb above the city walls
Lifts with calm sadness, like a broken heart
That struggles dimly on. The noiseless clouds
Are slowly floating down the azure tide,
Stretching their uncouth and gigantic forms,
Like ocean monsters sleeping in the deep.
Hark! what a pause in nature! Every sound
That lately shook the swarmed streets is quelled.
Business and pleasure, misery and pride,
Have ceased their voices: even avarice sleeps.
The money-dealer's window is locked up,
And the high bank its massive gates hath closed;
The noisy market and the wrangling court,
The sculptured temple with its marble aisle,
And the worn benches of the murmuring school—
It is an interval of peace to all,
And not an echo breaks, and not a form
Moves in the wondrous quiet, and it seems
As if the universal throng of men
Had done their tasks for ever; and the game
Of human life were ended; and the earth
Were left again to roll in silence on,
Forgetting that upon its bosom once
An insect dwelt, who called himself its lord.
How beautifully yonder tapering spire
Rises above the mass of crowded roofs!
How many men with high ambitious souls
Peer thus above their fellows? See! a light
Beams faintly through yon curtain's snowy fold,
And fancy wakes and paints the scene within.
Bent o'er his page perchance the student sits;
Or the pale wife awaits her tyrant's step,
Weeping beside her child; or, it may be,
Some dying maiden on her watcher there
Turns her sick eyes, puts the disorder'd hair
From her damp forehead, and with patience drinks

The loathsome draught, and inly longs to die.
And time will hurry onward, and the pains
Will leave her aching bones, and death will come
And freeze her lips, and close her heavy eyes,
And strike his marble coldness to her heart.
The melancholy moon will walk the sky,
As it does now, and the poor habitant
Of yonder chamber will be borne away
Among the sleepers, and the tears will fall
From the survivors, as affectionate thoughts
Crowd on their souls to view the vacant place
Left in the household circle, and to kiss
The sweet curl stolen from the beloved head
Dark in the dust for ever. What a time
To muse upon the past, to count the tones
Of dear remembered voices; to recall
The lovely absent from their pilgrimage,
And bring the dead from out their quiet graves,
And hold communion with them. I could tell
Stories of death most dismal, for the tomb
Holds kin and friends of mine within its breast,
More than the broad sky shines on. Even now
I linger o'er the memory of one—
A sweet young boy, I knew and loved at school.
He was of wondrous beauty. I was glad
To gaze upon his large and shining eyes,
And hear his pleasant voice, and mark the glow
Crimson his cheeks, and the unbidden tear
Spring to his lashes at a tale of woe.
His lips were fashioned with a girlish beauty,
And made one think of kisses instantly.
Bright August came, that breaks the schoolboy's bond,
Until the moon her course around the earth
Accomplishes again. His parents rode
In a bright chariot for their favorite boy;
There was a sister older than himself,
And with a face like his, but bluer eyes.
More touching with their sudden lifted gaze
And voice more softly passionate, and low,
That made me thrill to listen; and he had
Two gentle elder brothers, and I watched
The parents and the children when they met.
Happy and beautiful, and marked the group
Of radiant faces, with o'erflowing eyes.
Then when they all departed I stole forth
To a ravine deep in the quiet wood,
And wept and wished my lonely heart would break,
For I was poor. I had no sheltered home.
No voices hailed me. I was strange to all.
My blessed mother in her recent grave
Lay yet ununmouldered as she was in life.
And mid the abysses of the ocean floor
My father's bones were lying; and at school
A friend had placed me out of charity;
And no one loved me but this angel boy.
The rolling month went on, and scarce I spoke,
For all my playmates at their free sweet homes
Were chasing joy; my very master, too,
Was forth among the woods, and with his gun
Killed the poor birds. A lonely thing was I.
But I had found an old neglected book,
Full of strange stories, so the month passed on.
Then my tumultuous heart was full of joy,
That I could read no more the quiet page,
But watched for Edward; and his brothers came Alone and sad, arrayed in sable suits,
And looked with faces pale, and moistened eyes,
Silently on me. When at length I strove,
And asked for Edward, I could see their hearts,
Poor boys, were shaken; and their quivering lips,
Though voiceless, answered me—for he was dead.

We do not think these lines so bad; but we wish our correspondents would turn their attention more to prose. The habit of attempting poetry is useful only to the writer, because it shows him how difficult it is to produce anything new and readable in that way, and, therefore, affords him a kind of standard by which he may measure the immense superiority of those "choice and master spirits" who have succeeded. If they can strike out an undiscovered track in the realms of thought and feeling, or travel those already known with any wonderful grace of demeanor, it may be well to publish; but we fear, especially in our narrow streets, obstructed with hogsheds of molasses and bales of cotton, it will be found at the best a fruitless trade. We have often wished we could follow a fine verse through all its wide journeyings—go with it into the store of the merchant—behind the counter of the tradesman—into the lawyer's office—the doctor's study—to the parlor of the belle, or the quiet and pleasantest of all scenes—the peaceful domestic circle, where the husband reads it over by the cheerful hearth, while the wife listens and is happy—it would be curious then to note down all the contrasted thoughts and exclamations with which it would be received according to the difference of character, taste, or humor. We half suspect the best among the men of rhymes would be startled and shocked at the rude realities which the cherished and delicate offspring of his brain would too often be compelled to encounter. We believe it was Byron who said he never looked at the lining of a trunk without trembling. It seems a pity that all are not poets. We stride over years of the ordinary preliminaries to friendship when brought suddenly in contact with one whose face brightens up at the mention of Shakspeare or Burns. A man who has read those two writers understandingly and feelingly, we ever meet with a more cordial grasp of the hand. There are others ignorant of them, towards whom we are equally attracted; but we know they have the material of admiration in them, and we continually perceive how they would revel in their beauties but that the business of the world has called them away, and made the page of the fine essayist and the true poet but a sealed fountain to them.

We present to our readers a neat and finished specimen of composition in the following ballad by Scott, the music by an amateur who stands closely connected with whatever improvement has been made in that science on this side the Atlantic for the last three years. We have only to call attention to every successful opera at the Park theatre produced within that period, concluding with Cinderella. We did look for Masaniello from the same skilful hands, but the changes of administration which take place in all great governments, whether of states or theatres, alter materially the aspect of affairs.

COUNTY GUY.

AS SUNG BY MRS. SALMON, MRS. AUSTIN, AND MADAME CORNEGO—WORDS BY WALTER SCOTT—MUSIC BY F. H. F. BERKELEY.

Revised by the author, for the New-York Mirror, from the third London edition, and dedicated to the amateurs in this city.

Andante gracioso.

Ah! Coun - ty Guy, the hour is nigh, The sun has left the lea. The o - range flow'r per-fumes the bow'r, The breeze, the breeze is on the sea.

The lark, his lay, who trill'd all day, Sits hush'd, sits hush'd, his part - ner nigh. Breeze, bird, and flow'r, they know the hour But where, but where is Coun - ty Guy?

2d—The village maid steals through the shade,
Her shepherd's suit to hear

To beauty shy, at lattice high,
Sings, sings high-born Cavalier,

The star of love, all stars above,
Now reigns, now reigns o'er earth and sky,

And high and low the influence know,
But where, but where is County Guy?

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LINES TO A LADY.

BY JAMES HACK.

OFTEN when my ardent gaze
Revels upon beauty's blaze,
When before my burning eye
Float the raven tresses by,
Rolling on the forehead fair,
Darkening the marble there;
And beneath the silken arches
Love in laughing triumph marches;
Or awhile he seemeth hid
Underneath the snowy lid—

Snowy lid that loves to fall,
Melting on the humid ball—
When mine eyes encounter eyes
Lovely as love's paradise,
While their orbs—his diadems—
Swim in darkness, like the gems
Trembling on the wing of night,
Borrowing a lovelier light
From the deep yet soften'd shade
That upon their blaze is laid—
When upon my ardent glance
Smiles a seraph countenance,
Where all charms are flourishing
Lovers dream and poets sing;
Checks where such envermell glows
As the sun on heaven bestows,

When he bows his head to rest
On the blushing even's breast;
Lips as if enamour'd clinging
To each other's kiss, and tinging
Such ambrosial breath as creepeth
O'er the strings which seraph sweepeth—
When one form such charms adorn,
That there needs but to be worn
Wings as glorious to appear
One of heaven's own blessed sphere—
Then I turn my head aside,
An arising tear to hide.
Lady, dost thou ask me why
Tears should then bedew my eye?
'Tis to think that from its sight
Soon shall pass the vision bright,

Soon the one so dear to see
Shall forget all thoughts of me!
Yet the hope I fain would know,
That it shall not now be so;
That thy friendship yet may spread
Flowers before the path I tread,
Till the grave's corrupting pall
Separates mine eye from all
That it now to gaze on joyeth;
And when death this form destroyeth,
Thou wilt yet the blessing give
In thy memory to live.

POPULAR TALES.

THE FIRST AND SECOND HUSBAND.

CHRISTINE BOISSARD was the daughter of a schoolmaster at Thoulouse. At the early age of fifteen she was married to Bertrand de Rols, himself only one year older than his bride. They had been companions from their infancy, and the innocent attachment of childhood had ripened with their years into feelings which, at the important ages of fifteen and sixteen, were easily mistaken for love.

Christine was very beautiful; it was that kind of beauty which Bacon says is the best—"that which a picture cannot express." It dwelt upon her countenance, it enshrined her person, and seemed to be a perpetual emanation from herself, rather than any union of exquisite proportions either in form or features. The beholder saw she was beautiful, but could not discover in what it consisted. There were those who had a fairer brow than Christine, whose tresses were more luxuriant, in whose eye dwelt the soul's meaning more eloquently, round whose mouth played a more gracious expression of softness, and in whose air there was more of elegance; but in all Thoulouse there could not be found one to vie with her in that loveliness which, touching the heart at the first glance, makes silent worshippers.

The mind of Christine was worthy of such a temple. It had received no soil from the world, and seemed incapable of receiving any. Its stainless purity, like that of the diamond, was inherent. She could not be said to shun evil so much as to be shunned by it. The exceeding simplicity of her character, the frankness and sincerity of her nature, were such, that as she had no thoughts which needed disguise, so were there none that did not lie as open to all the world as to herself.

Similitude may be the basis of friendship, it is not that of love. Christine loved Bertrand de Rols when they went to the altar, and after; and Bertrand loved her—but they did not resemble each other. Bertrand was quick, fiery, impetuous—easily excited, and requiring excitement to break the irksome monotony of domestic life. He was of a moody temper, too; fond of lonely musings, in which it was his delight to summon up fancied scenes of wild enterprise, where there was free scope for a stirring spirit to signalize itself. During the first years of his marriage, these outbursts of a restless nature were few and feeble. The novelty of his situation, the fulness of his happiness as the husband of Christine, and the consciousness of youth and inexperience, were all so many checks upon them; but as he trod the verge of manhood, as the freshness of his felicity wore off and he required something more than even Christine to fill up the measure of his desires, they came thick upon him, flinging distaste upon the serene joys of home, and arraying in gorgeous splendor the visions of his heated imagination.

Christine saw the change, saw he was unhappy, but only wondered he could be so, when she herself was so happy. She would have striven to restore him to his former state, could she have discovered any thing now wanting which he had heretofore possessed—any thing depending upon herself that could open a new source of delight to him; but how was this possible? She had bestowed her whole store of love from the first; she had made him absolute master of her heart, her affections, her every thought, her every wish. Wholly and entirely had she cast her treasures at his feet, and vainly, therefore, did she seek for one that could be added. She was a very beggar in all, except prayers to heaven, and those she breathed in many an hour of unseen sorrow.

"What an inglorious animal is man," said Bertrand to Christine, as they were one evening walking in their little garden, "when his round of life is told in three words—eating, drinking, sleeping! When yesterday was but a type of to-day, and to-day but the mould of to-morrow! I would have each hour the parent of some change; each day a history; each week a thing to wonder at, till the succeeding one cast it into shade by greater miracles. It were nobler, methinks, to fling but a stone the farthest of any twenty that tried, than not to have so much ambition as would bring one within the circle of competitors!"

"Why do these fancies possess you, my dear Bertrand?" replied Christine. "Can you be happier than you have been?"

"Oh, no! not happier than I have been, my beloved; but—"

"Happier than you are," added Christine, filling up the pause, and sighing as she spoke.

"There is a future, Christine, whose voice is troubling my spirit with dreams that would respond aye to that. Nay, do not weep!"

"Should I not weep," interrupted the gentle Christine, "to know you are unhappy—when in that knowledge lies a sad truth which kills my own happiness? I am not what I was to thee, Bertrand, else wouldst thou be what thou wert—what I am still—without a wish unsatisfied."

"Look at yon marble vase, Christine. It takes but little to fill it to overflowing. Will that same little fill the city's reservoir? The stream of time rolls through one man's life like a gentle river confined within its banks; but through another's, like a heady torrent, widening its channel, and demanding larger space for its increasing waters. Now, if you dam up that torrent's course, or if it encounter some natural impediment that stays its progress, how it chafes and swells, till at last, overbearing all obstacles, it rushes fiercely on amid the havoc of its own wrath."

"Ah me!" exclaimed Christine, who read and trembled at the meaning of this simile.

"Come, come, love," continued Bertrand, kissing her tenderly, "be not sorrowful. I own I long to fling behind me this tame existence, this homely, sluggish idleness, and hunger for the busy world that lies beyond our slothful fire-side; but think not I can find a joy there unless I share it with thee, Christine. It is thou must give its value to my happiness, gather it where I may. The monarch of this little empire—my home! I would, as wisest monarchs do, pour into the lap of my own kingdom the treasures of all others."

It was not long after this conversation that Christine was doomed to know its full import. A slight quarrel arose between Bertrand and his father, who galled him with ill-judged taunts upon languishing away his days, instead of bestirring himself to augment his slender fortune. Bertrand heard these taunts in silence, but they gave his mind (already on the spring, as it were) the single impulse it required to make the leap. The feeling which had long tormented him was, in reality, nothing more than the impatient desire for adventures—the wish to roam from place to place, without any fixed plan or deliberate choice. Had he at that moment been standing upon the sea-shore, where vessels were preparing to sail for India, America, the South Sea, and the Frozen Ocean, he would have been content to determine which of them should bear him away by the falling of a stick east or west, north or south, according as it lay.

Quitting his father's house, he lingered upon the brow of a small eminence that overlooked the valley in which was his own peaceful dwelling. He was irresolute—not whether he would go he knew not whither and cared not—but whether he should unman himself by a farewell of Christine and his daughter Henriette. Their images rose before him; the wild grief of the one, the sympathetic sorrow of the other, and what he felt in imagination was his monitor to shun the reality. He stretched his arms towards the valley—his eyes swam in tears. "Christine!" he exclaimed, "my beloved Christine! Does no unwonted tremor steal over thy shuddering frame to warn thee of thy fate? Art thou joyfully expecting thy Bertrand's return? Is my little Henriette asking for her father? With streaming eyes, and an almost bursting heart, he is bidding an adieu which thou dost neither hear nor dread, to follow the destiny that has so long striven to tear him from thee!" He turned away, gained the city, hurried along the streets of Thoulouse, and passing through its western gate, followed the first path that struck out of the main road.

The shock was indeed terrible to Christine; the more so because she remained in utter doubt of the extent of her calamity. At first she believed a few hours might put an end to it. When that hope vanished, she trusted to each day for comfort; and when days were past and no comfort came, then each week, perhaps, might be the last of her sufferings. But as days, and weeks, and months rolled on, and still there came no tidings of her husband—none from himself—none from any living soul by whom he had been seen, since her own eyes looked upon him, (save the unsatisfying report of his father, whom in her heart she upbraided for his departure,) she sunk into hopeless dejection. She could not doubt he was dead, and her fancy haunted her with all imaginable pictures of dismal and appalling deaths, till she would start from these gloomy reveries with a fearful shriek, as if she suddenly saw him gashed with wounds dealt by some assassin's hand.

Thus did Christine pass seven long years, in all which time she continued as profoundly ignorant of the fate of Bertrand as at the moment of his going. She rejected with scorn the consolation sometimes offered, that he might still be alive and would one day return. Whatever were the motives which impelled him to leave her, she could not endure to think it possible he could abandon her to such a miserable uncertainty, when a single word by letter, or by some trusty friend, would have been sufficient to relieve her from it.

"No," she would exclaim, in reply to this barren comfort—"no, no, he has perished! And if any thing of this world can give sorrow to those who are no longer of it, my poor Bertrand beholds with anguish my affliction. This conviction is so strong, that I seem to expect his spirit will appear and bid me cease to mourn for him with that torturing hope, which, in spite of myself, mingles with my tears. It is far less terrible to know we must be wretched, than to know we are, with a mystery shrouding our cause of grief, through which, ever and anon, stream faint rays of deluding hope."

Seven years, as we have said, had thus passed away, when one summer's morning Christine, who was sitting early at her little garden gate with Henriette, believed such a visitation was about to take place. A man, dressed in a soldier's garb, approached unseen, and stood before her. She looked, her color fled, her heart palpitated, her limbs trembled.

"Christine!" he exclaimed, "do you not know me? or can you not forgive me?"

Her eyes closed, and a faint scream died away upon her lips. She would have fallen to the ground, had not the stranger sprung forward, and caught her in his arms.

The scene was incomprehensible to the young Henriette, whose tears flowed fast, as she bent over her mother, calling upon her to speak.

Christine recovered. Fixing her eyes earnestly upon the stranger, she gazed in silence for several minutes.

"Have I then," she at length exclaimed, "so long wept a living husband's death? or is this a cheat put upon me by my distempered fancy?"

"My Christine!" murmured the stranger, "my beloved Christine! I am, in sooth, thy own Bertrand!"

She uttered one convulsive cry of joy, cast herself in his arms, and buried her face in his bosom, weeping and sobbing. Henriette also hung upon him with all the fervor of filial love. She was so young when her father left them, that it was no wonder she was unable to recognize him now.

The first rush of excited feeling a little subsided, and Christine again fixed her ardent gaze upon Bertrand, as if she would still satisfy herself she was not yielding to a delusion.

"You are somewhat changed," said she, "during this cruel absence!" then bursting into a flood of tears, at the recollection of her sufferings, "Oh heavens!" she continued, "what have I not endured for thee, Bertrand? But I can forget it all—all—all! now that you are restored to me. You shall not hear me once complain of the many solitary hours I have wasted in anguish since you left me. I will but say, I thought and mourned you dead; and that belief, grievous as it was, shielded you from reproaches which I do fear I could not else have stifled, as often as I grew half frantic with impatient longings to hear from you. Oh Bertrand! one single, blessed word, to say you lived, would have spared me misery I cannot describe! But I blot out the past! I am too happy a creature now, to wish to remember what a very wretched one I have been. Yes, thou art much changed!" looking earnestly at him.

"I shall have a long tale to tell thee, Christine, of the hardships which have wrought this change! But there will be hours for such discourse more fitting than the present, and then my Christine will sadly own I have played the truant in a thorny path. Ay, love! it may be too hard a task to forgive your Bertrand, but you will not say you alone have been unhappy."

Bertrand's father was dead. Three of his sisters, however, were still living at Thoulouse, who shared with Christine her delight at his return. The father of Christine alone refused to see him, so deeply did he resent the wrong done his daughter. His former friends gathered round him; and, though he did not repulse their advances, there was often a strange reserve in his manner, as if they were imperfectly remembered, or that he scarcely wished to renew their acquaintance. Christine would sometimes gently chide him for this, but he soothed her by declaring he was desirous of no other company than hers and Henriette's, and that he wished for no companions that might estrange him from his home.

Three years thus glided on, and Christine, faithful to her word never once clouded their serenity by the slightest unkind allusion to the past. Yet, and she knew not why, there was a something that prevented her from feeling as she once did towards Bertrand. In vain she struggled with this repugnance; in vain she condemned it; in vain she reasoned with herself and strove to command back the unbounded love and devotion of the first years of their marriage. She was conscious they had abated; but it was her consolation to know, (as she believed she did,) that Bertrand was not conscious of it.

One day, when he was out, her father came. It was the first time he had crossed the threshold of her door since his return. She welcomed him joyfully, though, from his manner, she saw his visit was for no pleasing object. But what was her consternation, her horror, when she learned wherefore he had come? when she learned it was to wither her incredulous mind with this frightful annunciation—that Bertrand was an impostor, and not her husband!

At first she would fain have treated it as a bitter jest; but, alas! she had hideous forebodings of a fatal truth that lurked behind. There had been moments since the return of Bertrand, when strangely horrible misgivings had possessed her own soul, misgivings which she dared not for her life heed, the after-thoughts were so terrible. She sought refuge rather in the belief that she herself was altered; or that seven years of wandering and severe trials had wrought inexplicable changes in her husband; or that so long an interval had obliterated in both feelings, affections, and habits which could not now be revived. In short, what could she not believe sooner than the monstrous fable of her father?

The old man, however, was clear and positive in his statement, much as it grieved him to afflict his child. He had his evidence, too, which, at the earnest entreaty, nay, the almost frantic command of Christine, he produced. This was the Sieur d'Anglade, a man who had known Bertrand in Spain, when he was serving there with the French army, and where he went by his proper name, that of Arnaud du Tilh. The Sieur d'Anglade was well acquainted also with the father of Arnaud du Tilh, and his whole family, who lived at Caen, in Normandy. This, if true, was the circumstance that most staggered the miserable Christine; for till it was mentioned, she hoped it might turn out, though Bertrand had never told her so, that he had assumed the name of Arnaud du Tilh during his absence, the better to prevent all discovery of himself.

It was proposed by M. Boissard, and assented to by Christine, that the Sieur d'Anglade should remain till Bertrand returned, and they would then be able to judge, from their meeting, of the truth of his statement.

"Not at all, Madame," said the Sieur d'Anglade. "Arnaud du Tilh is master of himself, and has studied too well the part he has to play. I have been in Thoulouse above a month; I have met du Tilh several times in the streets; I have spoken to him, but his dissimulation was admirable. Were he indeed Bertrand de Rols, he could not have received my salutations with a more perfect absence of all recognition. He is an excellent actor, Madame!"

While they were discoursing, Bertrand entered. He evinced some surprise at seeing Christine's father; none at the presence of the Sieur d'Anglade. The latter advanced towards him, his hand extended, which he took with the unembarrassed air of a person who is receiving a stranger under his own roof.

"Well met, Arnaud du Tilh!" exclaimed the Sieur d'Anglade.

"I give you welcome, sir!" replied Bertrand calmly, "but there is some mistake. I do not know your name—it is evident you do not know mine."

"And yet we knew each other well at Barcelona: and long before that I was an intimate friend of your family at Caen, where I have spent many a pleasant hour with your father, Urban du Tilh."

Bertrand smiled as he turned towards his wife, and said, "Christine, you know my father here in Thoulouse."

"You are an impostor!" exclaimed M. de Boissard, "and you shall answer for this before the criminal judge."

"I know, sir," rejoined Bertrand, "you have never pardoned my long desertion of your daughter; but let not your wrath dishonor itself by making injustice the instrument of its satisfaction."

"Look at me!" said the Sieur d'Anglade sternly.

"I do," replied Bertrand, fixing his eyes upon him with a calm expression of countenance.

"Can you do so," continued the Sieur d'Anglade, "and persist that you do not know me?"

"As truly, and therefore as fearlessly," replied Bertrand, "as I would say no to the man who accused me of parricide."

"Were you at Barcelona during the autumn and winter of 1654, now five years since?"

"I was not," answered Bertrand firmly, and as he spoke his eyes met those of Christine. "He is wrong, love," he continued; "I read your thoughts. I have told you I served at Barcelona, but it was in the summer of 1652."

"Were you not born at Caen, in Normandy? and is not your father's name Urban du Tilh?" demanded the Sieur d'Anglade.

"I was born in the city of Thoulouse, and my father's name was Auguste de Rols," answered Bertrand; "I am known here of my friends, and here my three sisters still live, who welcomed, with tears of joy, the brother they had sorrowed for as lost. My wife too—"

"Bertrand!" exclaimed Christine wildly, "heed well what you say! Before this hour—I cannot tell wherefore—I have been tormented with dark suspicions. They came unbidden—I dashed them from me—I loathed myself for them, because they branded me with innocent guilt! But now, Bertrand—now, it seems as if a thick veil were dropping off, and before my uncovered sight there stood a dismal yawning gulf. Oh heavens! grant this may prove delirious phantasy, and not the other!"

"Sir," said Bertrand, in an agitated voice, and turning round to the Sieur d'Anglade, "a choleric man, with half this provocation, would strike you dead upon the spot! By what right come you here to disturb my quiet home with the sick dreams of your bewildered mind? I have borne to be catechized by you, as I would have borne to be asked of any crime of which I knew myself guiltless; but since my answers satisfy you not, since you have succeeded in poisoning the mind of that gentle creature, and since this honorable person, her father, has been cajoled by you so far as to talk largely of my answering for myself before the criminal judge, it is time I should meet you with another spirit. Begone!"

The Sieur d'Anglade, not a jot daunted by this indignant reprimand, prepared to depart with M. Boissard, when Christine, rising from the seat where she had been leaning on the bosom of Henriette, in a state of indescribable distress, addressed Bertrand:—

"I go with my father!" said she; "and with me, my daughter. Bertrand! there is a mystery I cannot fathom—and beneath its baleful influence the current of every affection of my heart seems to turn from you. Heaven forgive me, if what I do is wrong! And if thou art wronged, may it be so ordered that it shall appear manifest to my eyes, vouchsafing also that with my knowledge of the truth may come again those feelings which now are chilled into fears that drive me almost mad!"

She buried her face in the gray hairs of her father, as he bent over her, and pressed her to his bosom.

"This does, indeed, amaze me," exclaimed Bertrand; "but," added he, sarcastically, as he glanced at M. Boissard, "I begin to understand matters. A sentence of the criminal court, if bold-faced fraud should prosper, would be a quick conveyance of the estate at Artigues. I shall baffle you, however, by the aid of heaven and a righteous cause."

"It concerns not me, Arnaud du Tilh," said the Sieur d'Anglade, offering his arm to Henriette, who was in tears; "neither have I sought this; but wherein I can be useful to my good friend M. Boissard, and to his abused daughter, therein will I, according to my power."

They then left the house, and Bertrand remained in it alone, for the servant refused to stay.

The rumor of this discovery spread in a few hours through the whole city of Thoulouse; and it no sooner became rife, than many who knew Bertrand, and had never doubted his identity, began to grow suddenly dubious, remembering sundry remarkably circumstances, which they now said had excited their suspicions from the first; though, as it was no business of theirs, they held their tongues. Others wondered how Christine could have been deceived; while some made merry with the tale, concluding that Bertrand must have bewitched her with love-charms, or else, that she cunningly practised a seeming imposition on herself, to solace her widowhood, fearing to marry again, till she were assured of her husband's death.

The next day Bertrand was apprehended upon a warrant of the criminal court, and carried to prison. The ground of his arrest was a bill of complaint preferred before the criminal judge, by M. Boissard, in his daughter's name, setting forth that he had "falsely, rashly, and traitorously imposed upon Christine de Rols in assuming the name, and passing himself upon her as Bertrand de Rols;" and praying, in conclusion, that "he might be condemned to make satisfaction to the king for the breach of his laws, to demand pardon, of heaven, the king, and Christine, with his head bare, and his feet naked, with a lighted torch in his hand; and that he should be further adjudged to pay the said Christine de Rols two thousand livres for the injuries he had done her."

To the astonishment of all parties, Bertrand, in his answer to this "bill of complaint," made no confession of the offences alleged against him, but boldly asserted he was the person he had represented himself to be. He declared the whole affair was a wicked conspiracy contrived by the father of Christine, with the aid of the Sieur d'Anglade, for the purpose of obtaining speedier possession of certain property which would fall to him at his (Bertrand's) death, and that they had prevailed upon his wife, Christine de Rols, who was a person of weak understanding, to join with them. He entered into an account of the reasons which had induced him to leave his home; set forth the various adventures he had gone through; stated how, at the end of seven years, he was seized with an ardent desire to return to his wife and child, and doing so, with what joy he had been received by Christine and his relations, notwithstanding the alterations which time, great fatigue, and the cutting off his hair, had caused. At the close he prayed that "his wife might be confronted with him, because he could not possibly believe she would persist in denying the truth; that his calumniators, according to the laws of equity, might be condemned to suffer the punishments they called for upon him; that Christine should be taken out of the hands of his enemies, and be restrained from dissipating his effects; and finally, that he should be declared innocent of all the crimes laid to his charge."

The criminal judge cited Bertrand to appear before him, and subjected him to a rigorous private examination. He questioned him as to various matters which had happened in Thoulouse when he must have been a boy; the place of his birth, his father, mother, sisters, and other relations; his marriage with Christine; the persons who performed the ceremony, &c. To all these interrogatories Bertrand answered clearly and distinctly; and, as if not satisfied to have done thus much, he voluntarily spoke of his daughter Henriette, of the day she was born, of his own departure, of the persons he met on the road, of the towns he passed through on his way to Spain, and of numerous persons whom he knew in that country.

The next step was to obtain from Christine, her father, and others whom Bertrand had named, their answers to the same points. There was, substantially, a perfect correspondence between them; the discrepancies being of so insignificant a character that they could not be said to invalidate the truth of what Bertrand had asserted.

Thirteen witnesses were next examined, who declared upon oath, that the accused was Bertrand de Rols; that they had known him from his infancy, and that they were well acquainted with his person, manners, and tone of voice. On the other hand, an equal, if not greater number, declared he was not Bertrand de Rols; while the Sieur d'Anglade positively swore his name was Arnaud du Tilh, that he was born at Caen in Normandy, and that his family still resided there. A third class of witnesses were ready to swear, that if he were not Bertrand de Rols, there was such a wonderful resemblance between him and the true Bertrand, that it would be impossible to say which was which, were they standing side by side; thus seeming to confirm an observation of Lope de Vega, that nature, sometimes weary of designing new faces, copies, now and then, with admirable exactness, from those she has already produced.

The last attempt to solve this curious mystery, after the court had occupied several weeks with receiving evidence and hearing eloquent and ingenious counsel on both sides, was an order by the criminal judge to have two reports laid before him; the one as to the resemblance or non-resemblance of Henriette to the accused; the other, as to her likeness, or otherwise, to the sisters of Bertrand de Rols. These reports were accordingly made, and by the first, it appeared that Henriette did not resemble the accused at all; by the second, that she was very like her father's sisters.

At length the court named a day for pronouncing its sentence. It was in the following words:

"That Arnaud du Tilh is guilty and convicted of being an impostor; for which crime he is condemned to lose his head; and further, that his body be afterwards divided into four quarters."

Every one cried out upon this sentence—every one asked, "What grounds has the judge for pronouncing it—unless, indeed, he has had the benefit of some divine inspiration to reveal the truth in a matter beset with doubts to all except himself?"

Bertrand complained vehemently of its injustice; and, without loss of time, appealed from the criminal court to the parliament of Thoulouse. This extraordinary cause having now excited intense interest, the appeal and the probable judgment of the parliament were the only subjects talked of throughout the city.

That august assembly, as soon as the necessary documents were properly before them, determined to make their inquisition not only with all due solemnity, but in a manner which should present the case in a new form, and with the best chances for unravelling its mystery.

In the first place, they ordered Christine and her father and the Sieur d'Anglade to be confronted with the accused in open court; but singly, one after the other. In these confrontations Bertrand maintained the same unperturbed countenance, the same air of confidence, and answered every question with the same calm promptitude that he had evinced throughout his former examinations. But M. de Boissard, and especially the timid, shrinking Christine, whether from being abashed by the awful dignity of the tribunal, or from terror, lest the dreadful sentence of the inferior court should be confirmed, betrayed so much confusion and hesitation in their replies, that a strong feeling was created at the very outset, in favor of the prisoner. It was not sufficient, however, to have before them the accusers and the accused merely. They directed that evidence should be heard as to the principal facts in dispute, but with this limitation, that none but new witnesses should be examined.

Several weeks were consumed in these inquiries, carried on, as they were, with the most minute attention to every circumstance that could by possibility tend to establish the necessary facts on either side. But instead of doing so, they seemed to involve it in tenfold confusion.

When the judicial investigation terminated, the president went through an elaborate recapitulation of the depositions of the witnesses. The evidence stood thus:

Five and forty witnesses affirmed positively that the accused was not Bertrand de Rols; and among them was a shoemaker of Thoulouse, who deposed, that he had made shoes for the true Bertrand de Rols, whose foot reached to the twelfth mark upon his rule, whereas the prisoner's foot reached no farther than the ninth mark. In addition to the testimony of the Sieur d'Anglade, as to his name being Arnaud du Tilh, an uncle of the accused was brought forward, who recognized and owned him for his nephew. One witness swore that the real Bertrand de Rols was an expert wrestler, while the accused knew nothing of wrestling. Two persons swore that a soldier of the regiment of Rochefort, passing through Thoulouse, was surprised at hearing the prisoner call himself Bertrand de Rols, he not only knowing his true name to be Arnaud du Tilh, but, what was more extraordinary, declaring that the real Bertrand de Rols was actually living in Flanders, with a wooden leg, having lost one of his legs during the wars in that country. Great exertions were made to find out this soldier, whose direct testimony would have been so important, but in vain.

On the other hand, there was nearly an equal number of witnesses who swore that the accused was the true Bertrand de Rols, and among them his three sisters, and the husbands of two of them! Persons also, who had been present at the marriage of Bertrand and Christine, deposed in favor of the accused; and the greater part of the witnesses were unanimous in affirming, that the true Bertrand de Rols had two flesh marks under his left eyebrow, that his right eye was bloodshot, the nail of the first finger on the left hand crooked, and that he had three warts on his right hand. Every one of these was found to be on the person of the accused! It was considered a strong circumstance, likewise, in his favor, that though his wife now joined with her father in demanding justice upon him as an impostor, not only had she at first welcomed him as her husband, but had continued to live with him as such for three years, while many of the chief inhabitants of the city had eagerly given honorable testimony as to her moral character and other amiable qualities. This remarkable circumstance in favor of the accused, could not, therefore, be got rid of by any insinuations of improper motives operating a feigned deception, if deception there were, upon Christine.

Such being the singular aspect of this extraordinary case, after the parliament of Thoulouse had spent nearly two months in investigating it, the general opinion was that the judgment of the inferior court would be reversed. The parliament, however, (determined to give the subject the full benefit of mature and dispassionate deliberation,) deferred for fourteen days pronouncing its sentence.

Before the time expired, there was a rumor that the real Bertrand de Rols had arrived in Thoulouse. This report reached the ears of Christine. She devoutly prayed it might be true. She wished to see her husband once more, to receive his pardon, and then, if it were heaven's will she should continue to live, to pass the remainder of her days in a convent, expiating by hourly orisons and frequent penance her involuntary crime.

The fact was, emissaries had been secretly dispatched by the president of the parliament into Flanders, with instructions to use every possible means for discovering whether, as the soldier had declared, Bertrand du Rols was serving with the army there. They were successful in finding a person of that name, and with a wooden leg; and he declared himself to be the individual they wanted. He affirmed, moreover, that he was well acquainted with Arnaud du Tilh, and had heard of the process carrying on before the parliament of Thoulouse; but, believing his wife had played him false, in pretending she was the dupe of an impostor, he had resolved to let the matter end as it might, with a determination never to return to his native place. It was with great reluctance, consequently, he consented to accompany the officers back, (or rather yielded to the coercion they were prepared to use if he resisted,) a circumstance which tended to create the suspicion that perhaps he would turn out to be the impostor.

When he arrived at Thoulouse he underwent many private examinations upon all the matters to which the other had spoken. His answers were exactly the same; but he mentioned two or three rather particular circumstances, with respect to which no questions had been put to the accused, who was therefore immediately examined upon those new points, when it appeared he was perfectly acquainted with them. As to the personal resemblance, it was so wonderful, that the president himself could not refrain from exclaiming, "Methinks I must forgive my own wife's taking another, if she could show me such a likeness of myself for her apology!"

Hitherto they had not been confronted; but when the reputed Arnaud du Tilh was informed of the arrival of Bertrand, he not only boldly denounced him as the impostor, but declared he would consent to be hanged if he did not prove him such.

It was now ordered by the parliament that the two men should be attired exactly alike; and, on a day appointed, be placed side by side in open court, when all the witnesses who had been examined together should be brought in, one after the other, and point out which was the true Bertrand.

The day came. The court was crowded. Never had any occurrence in Thoulouse excited such an absorbing interest. Elevated on a platform, hung round with black, sat the true Bertrand and the counterfeit; but which was the true, and which was the counterfeit, it seemed hardly possible to determine. All eyes were fixed upon them; while a confused murmur of voices, and the words—"That is he!"—"No, that is Bertrand!"—"I tell you that is Arnaud du Tilh—the other is Bertrand de Rols," were heard in half-whispers from a hundred different tongues.

Silence was proclaimed. The witnesses, one by one, were introduced, a long white staff being placed in their hands, with which they were ordered to touch the person whom they recognized as Bertrand de Rols, but without speaking. The clerk took down the number of each; and when the whole had gone through the ceremony, it appeared that forty-four witnesses declared Arnaud du Tilh to be Bertrand de Rols, while fifty-one pronounced upon the identity of the other. The three sisters of Bertrand were next introduced. The eldest of them, the moment she cast her eyes upon the two men, rushed towards the platform, and threw her arms round the neck of him she had not seen for ten years.

"Behold!" said she, turning round to the president, "THIS is my brother! I acknowledge the error into which that wretch (pointing to Arnaud du Tilh) has betrayed me by a multitude of artifices."

Bertrand returned her embraces, mingling his tears with hers. The other two sisters recognized their brother in the same manner, and bestowed upon him the same marks of affection. A buzz of astonishment, mingled with exclamations of delight and rage, pervaded the court; but silence was commanded, for there was yet another evidence to be produced. It was Christine herself!

She is led trembling to the platform by her venerable father, and the tender devoted Henriette. Her head and face are shrouded in the thick folds of a black veil. At first every look is directed towards him whom every heart has already pronounced to be her husband. He is much moved; but on his countenance there dwells a stern and wrathful expression. Then the general gaze is turned upon Christine, whose long-drawn sighs and heavy sobs are audible. She has reached the platform—she ascends it. Henriette whispers something in her ear. She lifts her veil—she raises slowly her eyes, and fixes them for a moment upon him she thought her husband, who shrinks from their scrutiny. There is a pause. He who is her husband has caught a glimpse of her pallid features, and his agitation is extreme. Her eyes met his—a convulsive shudder runs through her veins—as if smote by death, she sinks lifeless at his feet, exclaiming, in a tone of piercing anguish, "Heaven! heaven! I AM guilty!"

"Bertrand de Rols! Bertrand de Rols!" burst forth on all sides, with cries of "justice! justice!" The emotions of the spectators were wound up to the highest pitch, and many vented loud execrations upon the impostor, whose countenance was as a mask to the terrible pangs which now fastened on his soul.

When silence was restored, the president ordered Arnaud du Tilh to be removed into the little iron cell in which criminals were placed to receive sentence. With a firm step, and an undaunted air, he descended from the platform, still asserting his innocence. Christine, meanwhile, was carried out of court, followed by her husband and several friends, who crowded round him to offer congratulations, which he received very coldly.

The president, after a solemn admonition, and dwelling with eloquent emphasis upon the irrefragable testimony of nature, afforded by the joyous feelings of the sisters, and the remorse of the innocent, though self-accused Christine, pronounced the following sentence upon the prisoner:

"That he, Arnaud du Tilh, should make amende honorable in the market-place of Thoulouse, with his head and feet bare, a halter round his neck, and holding in his hands a lighted torch; that he should there demand pardon of heaven, the king, and the justice of the nation; also, of Bertrand de Rols, and Christine his wife; which being done, the said Arnaud du Tilh should be delivered into the hands of the public executioner, who, after making him pass through the streets and other public places of the city of Thoulouse, with a rope about his neck, should conduct him before the house of the said Bertrand de Rols, where, on a gallows set up for the purpose, he should be hanged and strangled, and afterwards his body to be burned."

This sentence was executed to the letter on the following day. But before the wretched criminal was led out to undergo it, he made a full confession of his guilt, declaring that his thoughts were first directed to the crime for which he was about to suffer from having been mistaken for Bertrand de Rols by some of Bertrand's most intimate friends, while he was in camp in Picardy. From them he learned many circumstances concerning his father, wife, sisters, and other relations of Bertrand, together with various things which had happened to him before he left Thoulouse. Having also a sort of brotherly acquaintance with Bertrand himself, the moment he conceived the design of representing him, he had used that acquaintance to obtain from him, at various times, a multitude of particulars, which enabled him, with the aid of a quick invention and profound artifices, to practise so successfully the fraud he had.

Christine did not long survive. Innocent though she knew herself to be of all that could really constitute the guilt of her unhappy condition, she could not purify her thoughts; she could not cleanse her memory; while she shrunk with loathing from the idea that there might be some who, in the grossness of their own conceptions, would refuse to believe she had not wantonly favored the deception. Bertrand himself, indeed, was one of these; for when her father, without the knowledge of Christine—(she only wished to be forgiven by her husband)—touched once upon the extenuating circumstances of the case, the bitter mockery with which he repelled the old man's kindly-meant endeavors, convinced him there was a persuasion ranking in his mind which nothing could assuage. "Spare your words," said he. "Intimate friends, nearest relations, father and mother even, may be deceived; my sisters, my friends have been; but a wife—tush! a wife can be deceived only as a man may swear he does not see the blazing sun at noon, when he shuts his eyes because he will not see it!"

Entreaties were equally vain to prevail upon Bertrand to continue at Thoulouse. Either he was still enamored of the roaming and adventurous life which first tempted him to leave it, or his mind was incurably diseased by what had occurred; for, after making a legal settlement of his little property upon Henriette, he disappeared one morning without taking leave of her, his wife, or sisters; and in less than six months from that time, Christine, the victim of a self-accusing spirit, went to her grave unblamed of any tongue save her husband's!

[A writer who taxed his invention to imagine such a case as the above, would run no small hazard of having Horace flung in his teeth:

"Quodcumque ostendis mihi sic, incredulus odi."

But we are as innocent as our friend Dogberry in having used any art, except in the characters, situations, sentiments, and catastrophe. The main incidents, of a man being so personated, the trial of the impostor, the conflicting testimony of the witnesses, the sentence of the criminal court, the appeal to the parliament of Thoulouse, and the execution of the criminal, actually occurred in the sixteenth century. They are to be found among Les Causes Célèbres.] New Monthly Magazine.

THE FINE ARTS.

MADAME BRICHTA'S CONCERT.

THE concert commenced with the overture from "La Gazza Ladra," of Rossini. It is a spirited composition, almost throughout allegro, and may be rendered brilliant even by a small orchestra. It was pretty well performed, though, in the maestoso marziale the instruments were out of time. Next followed a duet from "Elisa e Claudio," of Mercadante, sung by Messrs. Fehrman and Angrisani. It contains much graceful melody; but the voices of the two gentlemen harmonized so little, that much of the effect was lost. Madame Brichta succeeded them with the cavatina "Lungi del caro ben," of Paccini. The nature of her voice does not permit her to select for herself songs of much compass. Contra alto voices are seldom very clear, and often false in the higher chords; but, by close application and great practice, she has acquired the talent of overcoming difficulties with correctness and facility. The approbation of the audience was abundant testimony that they were highly pleased with her performance. Mr. Segura followed with a concerto on the violin by Lafon. He possesses execution and neatness, but needs still more grace and taste in adagio and andante passages. Madame Brichta appeared again, and sung the famous "Air à la Tyrolienne," "Carino senti un poco come batte questo core," with variations by Hummel. When Signorina Garcia first brought this piece before the public, (in London) she gained universal applause, and so will every singer who knows how to practise these variations, and to deliver them with taste. They afforded Madame Brichta an excellent opportunity to display her musical abilities; it was her chef d'œuvre, which exhibited strength of tone, elegance, and judgment. Mr. Fehrman sung again the cavatina, "Il mio piano è preparato," from "La Gazza Ladra." It is well calculated for his voice, and may become a favorite here. Madame Brichta performed a Thema, with variations, by Czerni, on the piano-forte. Though they were not intended to display the powers of a performer, they nevertheless discovered that she joins with good execution much certainty and precision; there is considerable boldness and freshness in her play; it needs, however, more taste and shade. Mr. Taylor succeeded this piece with a fantasia on the flute, by Tolou. It is to be regretted that his modesty and bashfulness should so much embarrass him as to injure his performance. There is no necessity for this. If Mr. Taylor but practises, he will play with even the facility of Mr. Cuddy; though the latter is peculiarly graceful and expressive. There remains yet much to admire in the performance of Mr. Taylor, especially his staccato.

The second part commenced with the overture to "William Tell," the best of Rossini's instrumental compositions, in which he appears to have kept Weber, Spohr, and Beethoven constantly in view. The horn and violoncello solos are highly interesting; but in the allegro he falls again into his ordinary carelessness. On the present occasion the orchestra was too feeble to do it justice; the violoncello parts, by Mr. Hutet, were, however, remarkably well performed. Madame Brichta and Mr. Fehrman followed with a duet of Orlandi, which was somewhat deformed by want of precision and accuracy in the accompaniment. Signor Angrisani succeeded them with an aria from Otello, but he has not sufficient compass of voice to render high tenor airs interesting. "Ah! si per voi già sento," a marziale vivace, needs a powerful voice, in which the falsetto does not appear to advantage. Madame Brichta favored us once more with Morlacchi's beautiful romance, "Notte tremenda," pathetic, touching, and expressive, with a perfect intonation. The audience manifested their delight by repeated peals of applause. Signor Martinez played Riego's March on the guitar. He possesses good execution, though not equal to Mr. Schmidt, nor to Huerta; this performance, however, pleased, and after being loudly encored, he played a subject with several beautiful variations. A grand march of Segura formed the finale.

THE GRAND ORATORIO OF THE MESSIAH.

This performance by the New-York Sacred Music Society will take place next Thursday, at St. Paul's church. It may be questioned whether any other city in the Union can boast of an institution capable of producing an oratorio with more propriety, strength, and effect than will be displayed in the Messiah, about to be presented to the public. An admission to several of the rehearsals enables us to speak confidently of the delightful banquet in preparation for the lovers of sacred music, and to assert that this branch of the art bids fair to be improved in an eminent degree. The society, from its own resources, furnishes the choral department, the leader of the band, and the principal strength of the orchestra. The score, with Mozart's accompaniments, and the copies for instrumental and vocal performers will be printed separately; and the best artists are employed to render the work complete. The vocal performers include the first talent in the country, engaged expressly for the occasion. Mrs. Austin leads the soprano, Mr. Jones the tenor, Madame Brichta the contra alto, and Mr. Kyle the bass.

The production of the oratorio of the Messiah, complete in all its branches, has long been a desideratum in this city, which, from its wealth, its location, and its constant communication with Europe, possesses ample opportunities of encouraging the fine arts. It is not only a beautiful adaptation of the scriptures to music, but in itself forms an interesting work on divinity. No individual ever selected words for a subject with more effect than the learned divine who assisted Handel. The Messiah consists solely of quotations from holy writ, prophetic of the advent of Christ, and descriptive of his mission and sufferings, and it embodies the strongest mass of evidence which can be collected. Dr. Jackson, the tutor of the late king of England, and dean of Christ Church College, Oxford, once stated that his musical pupils generally passed their examination for graduation in divinity with more éclat than others, and he attributed it to the fact that the history of the Redeemer was continually and eloquently laid before them in the works of Handel.

The fully awakened feeling upon musical subjects which pervades the city will, we think, ensure a crowded auditory for the encouragement of this young society, in their laudable undertaking to perform Handel's entire Messiah for the first time in the United States.

MR. BURR'S MAPS.

One number of a series of maps has been published in this city. It is a favorable specimen of a work much wanted. All young scholars should have it on their table. It is intended to furnish maps of every country in the world; a design of such obvious utility as to scarcely require any recommendation.

VIEWS IN NEW-YORK.

The engravings to accompany the third number of this publication, are quite superior to those of its predecessors. The artist has displayed great taste and skill—much more than we thought him capable of. There is delicate and beautiful work in the plate of the city-hotel. We must so far overstep the modesty of nature as to assure the public that these plates, as some celebrated essayist once observed of virtue, "are really excellent, and ought to be encouraged."

GREENOUGH'S CHANTING CHERUBS.

This beautiful marble group is now exhibiting at the American Academy of Fine Arts, in Chambers-street.

REVERIES OF A STUDENT.

It is to be regretted that men do not look more into the conformation of themselves and the surrounding universe. How many curious and sublime themes of wonder and adoration are continually neglected by crowds, who bend all their faculties to the accomplishment of some local and insignificant purpose. You shall find a young man devoting his time to a money-making trade or profession, yielding his whole attention to some paltry political excitement, or undermining his health and peace by irregular and enervating enjoyments, and yet totally ignorant of the manner of his own organization; and a lively miss dying for the next new novel, completely out of humor that her dress has not come home, or wearied to death on a rainy day for the want of something to do, yet never suspecting that she does not draw a breath, or move a limb, or once lift the lids from those pretty discontented eyes, without affording to an intelligent and awakened mind material for months of meditation. Thus many of our belles are nothing except when talking of the fashions! and our beaux, however flippant and facetious about ribbons, theatres, and other common topics, are silent when the conversation takes any higher turn. A worthy of this kind, although often vastly favored in fashionable circles, should he meet one who has enlarged her mind by reading and reflection, may be talked out of countenance immediately. I have seen a clever girl strike consternation through a whole company of young coxcombs, by mentioning a point of history, or asking a simple question in astronomy or natural philosophy; and was last evening greatly rejoiced by the friendly interference of another in giving this temporary lock-jaw to an impertinent fop, who had for some time monopolized the attention of the company, and carried off all the smiles of the females.

Will you permit me, gentlemen, the liberty of observing, that you are in some measure guilty of promoting the light and unmeaning character which prevails too generally? Might not your pages be more frequently filled with subjects calculated to lead the minds of your readers out of the common track? The account, in your last Mirror, of the blind girl, threw me into a train of serious reflection upon the structure of the eye, with descriptions of which I have frequently amused myself when at leisure. The influence of vision on the character and intellect has also been among the subjects of my speculations. I know of no more amusing works than those on natural philosophy and history. Some author observes, the examination of the eye is a cure for atheism. Indeed every thing in nature, if properly understood, leads the mind to a perception of the Almighty contriver; yet, perhaps, there is no object more striking and beautiful than the one above mentioned, by the study of which to demonstrate his existence, power, tenderness, and wisdom.

In speaking of the eye, philosophers have compared it to a telescope; except that, in it, the mechanism can only be traced to a certain point, when it becomes confounded with the immaterial part of the human system; whereas, in the other, every part is traced throughout and understood. Mr. Paley, in his excellent work, entitled "Natural Theology," mentions an anecdote, which renders the resemblance yet more apparent. For a long time objects viewed through dioptric telescopes appeared tinged with various hues around the edges, as if viewed through a prism. The cause of this was understood to be the separation of the pencils of light into different colors, in passing through glass lenses. An optician at length thought of examining in what way this difficulty was obviated in the construction of the eye, and perceived that the evil was there cured by combining together lenses composed of substances which possessed different refracting powers, and from that time the defect has been corrected in telescopes, by the use of glasses made from different materials. Among the most exquisite evidences of skill displayed by this organ are its adaptation to different degrees of light, the diversity of distance at which it can view objects, and the manner in which nature has secured its safety and preservation. The reader need scarcely be told that the pupil in the centre of the iris is the aperture through which the rays of light pass, forming the image on the retina at the bottom, and that the picture is here reflected as on the table of a camera obscura, and thence conveyed by means infinitely beyond human investigation to the brain. We cannot too much admire the power possessed by the pupil of contracting and dilating, according to the strength of the light. The interesting writer above alluded to has so well written a passage upon the subject, that I shall be excused for quoting it here.

"The eyes of fishes also, compared with those of terrestrial animals, exhibit certain distinctions of structure, adapted to their state and element. We have already observed upon the figure of the crystalline compensating by its roundness the density of the medium through which their light passes. To which we have to add, that the eyes of fish, in their natural and indolent state, appear to be adjusted to near objects, in this respect differing from the human eye, as well as those of quadrupeds and birds. The ordinary shape of the fish's eye being in a much higher degree convex than that of land animals, a corresponding difference attends its muscular conformation, viz. that it is throughout calculated for flattening the eye.

"The iris also in the eyes of fish does not admit of contraction. This is a great difference, of which the probable reason is, that the diminished light in water is never too strong for the retina.

"In the eel, which has to work its head through sand and gravel, the roughest and harshest substances, there is placed before the eye, and at some distance from it, a transparent, horny, convex case, or covering, which, without obstructing the sight, defends the organ. To such an animal could any thing be more wanted, or more useful?

"Thus, in comparing together the eyes of different kinds of animals, we see, in their resemblances and distinction, one general plan laid down, and that plan varied with the varying exigencies to which it is to be applied.

"There is one property, however, common, I believe to all eyes, at least to all which have been examined, namely, that the optic nerve enters the bottom of the eye, not in the centre or middle, but a little on one side; not in the point where the axis of the eye meets the retina, but between that point and the nose. The difference which this makes is, that no part of an object is unperceived by both eyes at the same time.

"In considering vision as achieved by the means of an image formed at the bottom of the eye, we can never reflect without wonder upon the smallness, yet correctness of the picture, the subtlety of the touch, the fineness of the lines. A landscape of five or six square leagues is brought into a space of half an inch diameter; yet the multitude of objects which it contains are all preserved; are all discriminated in their magnitudes, positions, figures, colors. The prospect from Hampstead-hill is compressed into the compass of a sixpence, yet circumstantially represented. A stage-coach, travelling at its ordinary speed for half an hour, passes, in the eye, only over one-twelfth of an inch, yet is this change of place in the image distinctly perceived throughout its whole progress; for it is only by means of that perception that the motion of the coach itself is made sensible to the eye. If any thing can abate our admiration of the smallness of the visual tablet compared with the extent of vision, it is a reflection, which the view of nature leads us, every hour, to make, viz. that, in the hands of the Creator, great and little are nothing."

The mere mechanical structure of the eye, however, appears not the greatest wonder. After the image is formed on the retina, in what way does it reach the brain, and become an idea? How does it dwell afterwards in the memory? How does an object at a distance so communicate with the soul, and through it so act upon the body, as to produce smiles or tears, make the heart beat, the frame tremble, and perhaps the springs of life break, and the spirit separate from its tenement? How does it express what is passing within, flash with rage, glare with horror, or soften into tenderness and love?

It is wonderfully curious thus to trace the material perfection of the organ, till it loses itself in the spiritual part of our system, acts, as with a magical instinct separate from the rules of matter, and communicates so mysteriously with the soul. At one time behold the eye, by the aid of a microscope, piercing into the most secret machinery of nature. It there has a perception of creatures, which, however small, display organization and faculties to lead the fancy on to an infinity of unutterably minute creations. From the contemplation of these behold it turn to, seize, and carry to the mind any gigantic image, a high mountain, the ocean, or the like. How its operations are expanded! How it stretches itself to the grandeur and importance of its task; and how, by its aid, the soul is acted on, enlarged, and elevated, and filled with a throng of grand and inspiring ideas. Perhaps I cannot close this article more appropriately than by calling the reader's memory to the following fine lines from the fourth canto of Childe Harold. They apply to the church of St. Peter at Rome, and are applicable to my subject from the philosophical accuracy with which they depict the gradual awakening of the imagination, when appealed to through the eye by any stupendous object.

"But lo! the dome—the vast and wondrous dome,
To which Diana's marvel was a cell—
Christ's mighty shrine above his martyr's tomb!
I have beheld the Ephesian's miracle—
Its columns strew the wilderness, and dwell
The hyena and the jackal in their shade;
I have beheld Sophia's bright roofs swell
Their glittering mass if the sun, and have surveyed
His sanctuary the while the usurping Moslem prayed;

"But thou, of temples old, or altars new,
Standest alone—with nothing like to thee—
Worthiest of God, the holy and the true.
Since Zion's desolation, when that He
Forsook his former city, what could be,
Of earthly structures in his honor piled,
Of a sublimer aspect? Majesty,
Power, glory, strength, and beauty, all are aided
In this eternal ark of worship undefiled.

"Enter: its grandeur overwhelms thee not;
And why? it is not lessened; but thy mind,
Expanded by the genius of the spot,
Has grown colossal, and can only find
A fit abode wherein appear enshrined
Thy hopes of immortality; and thou
Shalt one day, if found worthy, so defined,
See thy God face to face, as thou dost now
His holy of holies, nor be blasted by his brow.

"Thou movest—but increasing with the advance,
Like climbing some great Alp, which still doth rise,
Deceived by its gigantic elegance;
Vastness which grows—but grows to harmonize—
All musical in its immensities:
Rich marbles—richer painting—shrines where flame
The lamps of gold—and haughty dome which vies
In air with earth's chief structures, though their frame
Sits on the firm-set ground—and this the clouds must claim.

"Thou seest not all; but piecemeal thou must break,
To separate contemplation, the great whole;
And as the ocean many bays will make,
That ask the eye—so here condense thy soul
To more immediate objects, and control
Thy thoughts until thy mind hath got by heart
Its eloquent proportions, and unroll
In mighty graduations, part by part,
The glory which at once upon thee did not dart.

"Not by its fault—but thine: our outward sense
Is but of gradual grasp—and as it is
That what we have of feeling most intense
Outstrips our faint expression, even so this Outshining and overwhelming edifice
Fools our fond gaze, and, greatest of the great,
Defies at first our nature's littleness,

Till, growing with its growth, we thus dilate
Our spirits to the size of that they contemplate.

"Then pause, and be enlightened; there is more
In such a survey than the satiating gaze
Of wonder pleased, or awe which would adore
The worship of the place, or the mere praise
Of art and its great masters, who could raise
What former time, nor skill, nor thought could plan;
The fountain of sublimity displays
Its depth, and thence may draw the mind of man
Its golden sands, and learn what great conceptions can."—SMOLLY.

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

NOTES UPON A RAMBLE.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

FIFTEEN or twenty miles above the junction of the St. Lawrence with the Ottawa, the steamer, in which we had made a part of our passage, came to a landing at a small mongrel village on the south shore. Between here and the Ottawa lay the rapids of the Split Rock, the most dangerous upon the river. We had been told, however, by some acquaintances who had passed us at Prescott, that the excitement of running them in a batteau was worth the hazard, and by the time the coaches were ready for the ladies, who were to take the road down upon the bank, we had hired a flat-bottomed boat of the country, with a dozen stout Canadians, and embarked. For the first mile or two we ran side by side with the company on shore, and kept up a very animating communication by shouting and signals; but we soon shot ahead at the rate of fifteen miles in the hour, and became too much engrossed with our own adventure to find time to regret the parting. The water was very low, and the rocks, of course, much more prominent and dangerous than usual. For myself, I soon became dizzy with the motion. The waves broke over us constantly; and spite of the most voluble French oaths of our boatmen, and their utmost exertions, we were whirled about by every sweep of the current, with a suddenness and rapidity which took away our breath. An egg-shell in a brook running down a hill-side would make much such a passage. It was not with an ordinary degree of satisfaction that I set my foot once more upon solid land. We arrived at the point where the two rivers meet, a half-hour sooner than our land travellers, wet to the skin, and glad to use the interval we had gained to recover our self-possession. The next boat lay on the Ottawa side, and we embarked at sunset upon this most beautiful of rivers, repeating the fine stanzas of Moore, with an enthusiasm which could scarce have been exceeded upon the same spot by the poet's own. An hour or two after, the moon rose magnificently, and, with a delightful party who had joined us, we spent hour after hour upon deck, waltzing, and singing, and promenading—the gayest and happiest, I cannot but think, of all whom that night's moon shone upon. For myself, I look upon it as one of those few and rare moments in my life which I could have wished eternal. I do not believe I am capable of a more full and even pulse of happiness than beat that night under the bright moon to the measure of a rude waltz sung by our Canadian sailors. I have danced to the finest instrumental music, and in the blaze of a hundred lamps with a duller heart.

I had lain in my berth an hour, unable to sleep after so much excitement, when a universal cry from the ladies' cabin roused the whole boat's company from their beds. We were upon deck in an instant, ladies and all; our indistinct apprehensions and loud voices contrasting strangely with the beautiful quiet of midnight upon the breezeless and moon-lit river. It was difficult to come at the story with fifty narrators all telling it at once, but we made out, after a while, that one of the ladies, lying awake, saw a man enter the cabin on tiptoe and extinguish the candle. The moon shone in strongly, and she observed him, after listening a moment, approach one of the berths in which a watch ticked very loudly, and immediately heard a scream. In feeling for the watch, he had laid his hand accidentally on the owner's face. A general outcry followed, and in the confusion the fellow escaped. The cabin was searched, the ladies' fears quieted, and we once more parted for the night. The last person to enter the gentlemen's cabin was a powerful, irascible Scotchman, the husband of the lady who had been so unceremoniously disturbed. He came in boiling with passion, and depositing a horse-pistol upon the table, prepared to retire. In the confusion of his faculties, however, his idea of the cabin had got reversed, and going to a berth directly opposite his own, he, of course, found it occupied. It immediately struck him that the occupant must be the thief, who had taken advantage of his absence to secrete himself in the vacant place. He cocked his pistol instantly, dragged the man, half asleep, from his berth, and presenting it at his head, commanded him to confess the robbery. It was rather an appalling demand, but the culprit declared his innocence very positively, and one of the gentlemen setting the enraged Scotchman right about the localities of the cabin, he made an apology, and we once more betook ourselves to our dreams.

At La Chine, nine miles above Montreal, we took the land again, and at ten o'clock entered the suburbs of the Canadian capital. It can scarcely be conceived what a strange air and aspect they present to the eye of a New Englander. The lower population is mainly French, and the style of architecture, the dress of the people, and the furniture of the rooms, (which had large windows, without sashes or blinds, into which we looked easily as we passed) were totally different from our own. The houses were all alike, built with one story, close upon the street, the whole interior exposed to the passers by, and the women and children sitting upon the steps in front, chattering with true French volubility, and dressed with more attention to show than decency. The men were fine, picturesque-looking fellows, in caps and red sashes, dark haired, and with clear olive complexions. It seemed impossible that by merely crossing a river one could find such a perfectly different population.

We obtained lodgings at the new Masonic-hall, a splendid hotel, overlooking the St. Lawrence from the rear piazzas, and at that time extremely well kept. I commend the rooms upon the river side to all travelling lovers of the comfortable picturesque. It is not an every-day pleasure to sit upon the ottoman in one's own window, and see one of the most magnificent rivers in the world rolling in the moon-light beneath. We spent a gay week in Montreal. The parades upon the Champ de Mars were, like those of all British troops, very splendid, and aside from the military evolutions, the fine music drew together the fashion and beauty of the city, and it was, for an hour or two of each day, a most delightful lounge. The drive round the mountain was another pleasant incident; the views as you descend towards Montreal being extremely fine; and between these, and boatings upon the river, and visits to the nunneries, we had little time unemployed, and less unamused. I was awakened one morning by the matin bells of a convent near by at sunrise. I arose immediately, and went out with the intention of seeing the night mist roll up from the river—always one of the most beautiful sights, to me, in nature. In passing through a narrow street, I observed an open gate, which disclosed the prettily cultivated yard of a back chapel. Girls and children of all ages were entering to their morning devotions, and spite of their surprised looks, I went in with them and entered the open oratory. With the exception of the priest, I was the only male there; and I stood unobserved by him behind one of the pillars, till the kneeling part of the service was over. Some thirty or forty nuns were kneeling round the room, whose faces I did not see till they arose, and then but for a moment. I had merely time to glance round, and observe that they were all advanced somewhat in years, and not very temptingly beautiful, when the priest stepped forward and requested me politely to retire. I apologized for my mistake, but was not displeased to have seen, even as an intruder, the interior of a forbidden sanctuary. As I went out I stopped a moment to speak to a nun in a long black stole, who was ringing the matin bell in a small recess at the side of the entrance, but though the color came very prettily over her cheek and forehead, she would make me no answer; and plucking a branch of sweetbriar from the wall of the chapel, as a memorial of the adventure, I passed on.

The morning was a glorious one. I reached the side of the river just as the mist was hovering, with the merely perceptible motion of a west wind, upon the line of the opposite shore. It lay in long wavy wreaths, in whose thin skirts Ossian's most delicate spirit might have been "folded," swaying into curves as it rose, with the wonderful gracefulness peculiar to such slight bodies. The boats were just beginning to move out from the shores upon their daily occupations, the voices of the sailors from the different craft lying in the river were distinctly audible, and the regular sweep of the oars plying upon a long raft far off upon the other side, came over the smooth water with a measured harmony, not a little "tunable to the ear." I thought, as I never have failed to think, when chance has driven me out at daybreak, that lying a-bed at so sweet an hour was a sin against nature. It is well that, like the fruits of the earth, her beauties are so prodigal, that waste still leaves plenty. But it is worth the while, even of those who see only the setting sun's loveliness, and prefer being "minions of the moon" to leaving their pillows early, to get up once in a while with the day, and see "what a glory nature can put on."

We embarked that day in a splendid steamer for Quebec. The river widens so much below Montreal, and the shores are so low and uniform that there was little amusement in the passage beyond the taffarel of the deck. By making five meals a day, however, reading a little, and eating a great deal, we contrived not to be weary of each other and the world till a decent bed-time. A late sleep the next morning brought us to Quebec, at the only rational breakfast hour—ten o'clock. The approach to this nobly fortified city is imposing in the extreme. Whereas Silliman's Journal, however, and travellers innumerable have described all its wonders, and exhausted all the apostrophes a gentleman cares to use, I shall pass over my sensations at the approach, begging the reader to take for granted all the enthusiasm proper on such an occasion.

The first thing which caught my eye on nearing the pier was a Highlander, in full national military costume. He was an immense fellow, (as indeed all the men of this Scotch regiment were,) and his fierce dress, high cheek bones, and enormous cap, gave his appearance the physical superiority of a giant. His jacket, kilt, and mantle were of plaid, the kilt reaching not quite to the knee, and leaving his legs bare down to the plaided stocking, which a little more than covered his ankle. The ladies were a little shocked at his appearance, and for myself I wondered if the Indian's principle of "face all over," would keep a bare leg warm during a Canadian winter. I never saw a more warlike figure, and the next day, upon parade, the contrast between this wild dress, and the tame neatness of the English regiments, was very striking. I would have pitted those fifty Highlanders against five hundred of their close-coated neighbors. The colonel of the Scotch regiment was one of the old legendary line of Douglas's—a huge man, seven feet in height, and well proportioned. He quite realized one's ideal of Roderick Dhu. An additional interest was attached to the corps he commanded, from its having been conspicuous at the battle of Waterloo. Nearly all the soldiers composing it wore the order of merit won upon that field.

I could not help observing, by the way, (talking of soldiers,) how singularly a garrison town appears to an unwarlike Yankee. The familiarity of soldiers with the citizens, the mingling, without notice, of red coats and frieze coats, the domestic uses the common soldiers are put to, hewing wood and drawing water—it was all queer and amusing to us. In a shop four feet by two, stocked with gingerbread and knitting-needles, would be seen sitting a six-foot grenadier, chatting with the old lady or her daughter. I saw one fellow sitting on a tailor's shop-board, and kicking his heels against the counter, in the most familiar converse with Master Snip. Indeed, the tailor had the air of a better man. Another, a corporal by his chevron, held a man's horse and took a shilling for it. Are these men, then, stuff for heroes? The question was as natural as to breathe.

The hotels in Quebec—I tell it on the compulsion of veracity—are famous for two small evils—fleas and famine. One aggravates the other. Violent exercise in self-defence, during the night, produces appetite, and thin commons make the skin loose and sensitive. (So they starve real before it is killed for the market.) The water here is bad; it is impregnated with lime, and strangers are often detained for weeks by the debility it causes. A gentleman who is properly bred escapes, of course—never drinking that element.

The first thing one does in any place is to deliver his letters, and the next thing in Quebec is to visit the government-house. An English gentleman, to whom we came introduced, procured for us a huge seal, the necessary passport at the gate, and we entered, under its protection, the residence of Lord (I think that is his title) Dalhousie, the governor of the Canadas. The housekeeper led the way, showing us, with an air of expected astonishment, "my lord's library," and "my lady's China closet," and "my young master's portrait," and "my young lady mistress's boudoir," as if we were a parcel of raw islanders who had never seen a looking-glass. The rooms were simply furnished, but the only imposing thing about them was their number—a hundred drawing-rooms in New-York and Boston far out-shining them in splendor and effect. It is somewhat farcical to see how even the better bred people of Quebec expect Yankees to be astonished with pier mirrors and damask curtains. I formed a favorable idea of Lord Dalhousie, from seeing over the writing-desk of his private library, a fine engraving of Washington. It was the only picture in the room. The only thing I envied him was the morocco chair Mrs. Margery assured us he sat in—a beautifully constructed dormeuse—I think the easiest I ever saw. I made a drawing of it, and thank his lordship for the greatest bodily comfort I enjoy, sitting at this present in one built upon the model.

We passed from the governor's residence to the fortifications. There can be no doubt, I should think, in any one's mind after visiting them, that they are perfectly impregnable. There seems to be, indeed, a most unnecessary labor and expense wasted on them. A hundred men of stout hearts would maintain a place half as well fortified against the world. Starving or smoking them out would be the only process I should dream of as an assailant.

We were so fortunate as to hear, during the day, that a young lady was to take the veil the next morning at daybreak. We went in a violent rain to the chapel of the Ursuline convent accordingly at five o'clock, and secured places near the altar. We had been there a few minutes, when the black curtain hung before the grating which separated the nun's chapel from the public one was withdrawn, and a young girl of sixteen appeared, dressed with great elegance. It is the custom, we were told, to wear even an excess of finery on such occasions; probably to make the abandonment of the world more striking. I looked very narrowly at the face of the novice as she approached. Her eyes were certainly magnificent—large, soft, liquid eyes, formed, if I know anything of symptoms, for the expression of the most passionate feelings. Her mouth and chin, however, were weakly marked and irresolute, and she would easily have been selected from a crowd for one of that numerous class of females who, with a great deal of material for character, are too passive ever to develop it, except by the force of fortunate circumstances. She was evidently a well-bred girl, but with so rosy a cheek as she wore, it was impossible to get up any sympathy for her in the sentiment line. I cannot conceive that a creature in such riant health should have any motive beyond bread and butter for entering a nunnery. I would have wagered the superb moccasins I bought at the Sorel, that she cuts the sisterhood at the end of her novitiate. Still, the ceremony was solemn. After the prayers were read by the holy father, and a chant sung by the thirty or forty black nuns on the other side of the lattice, (not a voice uncracked among them—I never heard such a villanous discord) two of them came forward and stripped her of her finery, bonnet, ribbons, and laces, leaving her simply attired in a white dress, with her black hair put plainly away from her forehead. She would have made a lovely picture. They then put a wax candle in one hand, and a book in the other, and commenced another chant, in which she sung the solos with a voice that might have done honor to "c'est l'amour." There was a lurking devil in it, or I was deceived. Her soft tones were in fine contrast with the split pipes of the venerable sisters, and in the last verse or two she sung with a spirit that could never have sprung from a heavy heart. It destroyed the romance of the thing quite. After the chant, to my surprise, she fell suddenly on her face, and a nun stepped forward and threw a black cloth over her. Not understanding the ceremony at all, I thought she had fainted, but some one at my elbow said it was done to signify that she was buried to the world. She was presently uncovered, and they proceeded to dress her in the Ursuline habit—an exceedingly unbecoming one to any but a pretty woman. The nuns then came forward one by one and kissed her; the lady abbess set up a chant, and as they slowly paced out of the chapel, the curtain dropped, and the ceremony was over. "She is the bride of heaven," said I. "I should prefer an earthly bridegroom," responded the gayest lady of the party; and we went home to breakfast.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Specimens of the Novelists and Romancers, with Critical and Biographical Notices of the Authors. By Richard Griffin. First American from the second Edinburgh edition. Two vols. 12mo. New-York: J. Langdon 1831.

THE superabundance of novelists for which the present age is responsible will, we fear, form but too good an apology for epitomizing and selecting. Many a piquant and amusing author will shrink from two or three volumes into a few pages of one, and may esteem himself extremely fortunate if posterity ever gets even a glimpse of him, thus rescued by the intermediation of a work of specimens. In this compilation the general reader will discover much to amuse him. The critical notices are well written, however we may dissent from some of their opinions. Extracts from thirty authors are given, among whom are Godwin, Lockhart, Mackenzie, Boccaccio, Maturin, Sage, Scott, Voltaire, and Galt. A few richly humorous passages are offered from Irving's "New-York," which the critic very frankly pronounces "so completely a performance, sui generis, that no production, either of the American or any other press, of past or of present times, can for a moment be put in competition with it." Here is a sprightly extract from Theodore Hook:

"Danvers was in an exceedingly good humor, and having himself been mightily pleased with the compliments which had been paid to his talents after dinner at his grace's, felt a sort of complacent disposition to dispense compliments in his turn, for, if his wife had been flattered at the marchioness's by the civilities and attentions of one half of the cabinet, the other half had been sedulously employed in winning the affections of her happy husband at the duke's. It was amusing to me, speculating as I do on the manners and ways of this world, to mark the various little by-paths which these noble and learned men took to assail the vanity and procure the esteem of this once neglected genius. Danvers, when simply Thomas Burton, Esq., member of the honorable society of the Inner Temple, had written, of course, 'merely for his amusement, and published at the earnest desire of his partial friends, extremely against his own inclination,' a collection of 'Poetical Trifles,' a 'Sonnet to half a rose-leaf,' 'Lines to Maria's Canary-bird,' 'Albert and Adeline,' 'Elgy on the loss of a dear cousin,' 'Ode on Shooter's-bill,' 'The Parson and the Lawyer,' a comic tale, sundry epigrams, a song adapted to a Babylonish melody, and introduced by Miss Stephens into Guy Mannering, 'The death-bed of Peter the Great,' 'Lines to Liberty,' and an 'Ode to the Spring,' which were printed at his own proper charge, on wove paper, displaying in the title-page a wood-cut vignette of a shepherd boy playing a pipe under a tree, with the hinder parts of two fat sheep in a corner, by way of background; over whose heads, or at least over the place where, by its relative position to their tails, their heads ought to have been, stood a little pert parish-church spire, like an extinguisher in the distance, and for motto, '—Tenet insanabile miltus Scribendi cacotheca.'—Jus.

"Of these 'poetical trifles,' as may easily be imagined, nobody heard at the time, except indeed an obscure reviewer, who, anxious at once to make a fame for himself, and break a butterfly on the wheel, ripped them up in his own unread 'periodical,' and the whole sale of the work amounted to perhaps fifty. Danvers was particularly sore about the neglect of his poetical genius—the nipping in the bud which he had experienced—and always felt that he was capable of great things in the literary world; this (whether he had betrayed himself, or whether some of his friends had betrayed him, I know not) one of the 'very great' men certainly knew, and the masterly manner in which his lordship, after an elaborate discussion on the beauties of Scott, Byron, and Campbell, dropped down gently and unsuspectingly upon the 'Poetical Trifles' of Mr. Thomas Burton, far excelled anything I ever beheld in the art of making the amiable. Nothing, in short, could exceed the skill of the angler, except the avidity of the victim—his lordship had committed to memory two or three lines of one of the effusions, and when he repeated them with a kind of sing-song twang, expressive of a rapturous approbation, the victory was complete, and, long before the party broke up, Danvers had consented to oppose the whig candidate in his own county, at the then rapidly approaching election."**

"Once in parliament, Danvers began to dream of honors and distinctions; he was conscious of his powers, he began to feel his importance, and if he could but have a son, his aim would be the peerage—to ennoble the blood of the Burtons in his person, to grace his Mary's brows with the golden circlet and baronial pearls—it was quite charming. For more than three weeks he was puzzling himself what title he should choose if the minister felt inclined to offer him a choice. The session opened, and Danvers was a regular attendant at the house, night after night, constantly sitting up till dawn of day to vote; while poor Mary, worried and vexed at the complete destruction of all her little comforts, began to feel symptoms of indisposition, to which she had hitherto been a stranger. She grew thin and low-spirited—so did Danvers; he was worrying himself all day about her, and all night about politics; she was worrying herself all night about him, and all day about her children. Danvers, having screwed his courage to the sticking-place, at length made a speech in parliament; it was short but pithy, and great credit was due to him for the matter and the manner of its delivery. He anticipated seeing the next morning in the reports of debates his name and harangue, interspersed with 'Hear, hear,' and 'Cheers from the treasury benches,' 'Laughter,' &c. and came down more eager for fame than breakfast. Three morning papers were on the table; he first took up the Times, and having just cast his eye over three columns of a speech by Brougham, and equally long reply by a much wiser man, his attention was arrested by these words:—'An honorable member, whose name we could not catch, made a few observations, which were totally inaudible in the gallery.' In a transport of rage he threw down the Times, exclaiming against its political spite in thus slurring over an able speech, because it came from the right side of the house, and snatching up the Chronicle, gratified himself by perusing these lines:—'Mr. Tanvers coincided in opinion with the last speaker.'

"Margaret was placed in a rank of society neither high nor low, and it was precisely that most congenial with her humble and unambitious disposition. Far higher, indeed, it was than what she could ever have dreamed of a very few years ago, when there were rarely more shillings in the house than could purchase provisions to the week's end. But still it was low enough to keep her chiefly among the peasantry, and to make their houses the chief scenes of the festal familiarities of her heart. Her extreme beauty, her perfect blameless manners, and her occupation, so great a blessing to the little parish, made her an object of no common interest to the few resident gentry all the way down the country as far as Cora-Linn; and as few important events even in the private history of any family, altogether escape the partial knowledge of persons no way concerned, there was a memoir, various as the minds of those who heard it, of the real cause of her departure from the house of Mrs. Wedderburne. There was something of romance, therefore, about the circumstances of her life to curious minds, with whom novelty or strangeness had such strong charms; and now that she was a lady, even of landed property, the very haughtiest member of old rural races, distinguished by their fixed and immovable obscurity for many respectable generations, began to hear something extremely genteel in the words 'Margaret Lyndsay,' and perhaps would have reconciled themselves to the misfortune of her becoming the wife of some one of the younger unendowed Clydesdale cadets. But Margaret had seen the perfect elegance of cultivated life in the family of the Wedderburnes, and had there repaid the kindness of her benefactress by duties unremittingly discharged to her own Hamet and Frances. Now, she was independent; and had no wish to sit at tables where she might have been pardonably enough looked on as a sort of curiosity or wonder, namely, a genteel girl out of a poor home, a lady risen from low life, the orphan daughter of a mechanic, really not far from being on a par with the hoydenish misses of a squire's family, with red velvet gowns from the town, and red velvet arms to put into them from the country. So Margaret rather shunned than courted splendid hospitality; but always with gratitude and humility acknowledged every kindness and courtesy that she received from persons in a higher rank, and above all, was delighted to see in her own parlor at Nether-place, those benevolent ladies who took an interest in the education of the children of the peasantry, and who, therefore, looked upon her as a benefactress to the whole parish.

"Before many months had elapsed since her uncle's death, Margaret had her wooers, although the two first on the list were not such as to represent the passion of love as any thing very tragic. Duncan Gray, portioner in Muirhouse, a young man of good morals, and not very bad manners, and supposed to be worth not far off a hundred pounds per annum, was the swain who took time by the forelock, and first hinted the modest request of Margaret's heart and hand. Some persons make wonderfully little account of such a request, and hold themselves entitled, after two or three times receiving a piece of short-bread, and a glass of elder-flower wine, to ask the lady who has given him such refreshment in marriage. The strife of transition seems long and violent; and in Duncan's case it was no sooner taken, than he saw in Miss Lyndsay's involuntary smile that he had made himself—rather ridiculous. At the same time, there was some little excuse for Mr. Duncan Gray of Muirhouse. He had a soul for music framed; and rejecting other every-day instruments of stop or string, he selected the great Highland bagpipe. On it he poured forth, not from his breast, but from beneath his arm, the loudest, longest sighs, con amore and affettuoso. All the while he thus gave vent to the 'windy suspirations of fixed breath,' he was in the practice, at tea parties, of keeping his blown-up cheeks and staring eyes straight upon the countenance of Margaret Lyndsay, and in the enthusiasm of the hour, he beheld her yielding to the voice of passion. He had mounted new ribbons on the drone of his pipes, red as the rosy visage that puffed below; and pity the delusion of the fond youth if he felt himself and his chanter to be irresistible. But Duncan Gray was a stout young swain, who lived in a high latitude, and had an excellent appetite; so, when he found that Miss Lyndsay preferred a single life, he had recourse to corned beef and greens, and it was not generally thought over the parish that he lost a single pound of flesh on his refusal. That refusal, in whatever words conveyed, and no doubt it was in Margaret's gentlest manner, for it is said that no lady is absolutely angry with the very absurdest offer, was, it appeared decisive. Mr. Gray henceforth played less outrageously on the bagpipe at parties where Margaret was present, and put his hand to his hat on her appearance with rather a hurried and abrupt demonstration; but otherwise he was very much the same man as before, and began to pay frequent visits to Thomas Carstairs of the Haugh, whose daughter Rachel was, though no beauty, by no means contemptible either in talk, tidiness, or tocher.

"The next on the list was one more likely, according to public opinion, to have been a thriving wooer—the Reverend Æneas M'Taggart of Drumluke. He was considered by himself and some others, to be the best preacher in the synod; and since Daniel Craig's death, had contrived to hold forth more than once in the kirk of Casterton. He was very oratorically disposed, and had got the gold medal at Glasgow College for the best specimen of elocution. This medal he generally carried in his pocket, and he had favored Miss Lyndsay with a sight of it once in the manse, and once when they were alone, eating gooseberries in the garden of Nether-place. The only thing very peculiar in his pronunciation was a burr, which might, on first hearing, have subjected him to the imputation of being a Northumbrian; but then there was an indescribably ascending tone in his speech, running up eagerly to the top of a sentence, like a person in a hurry to the head of a staircase, that clenched him at once as a native of Paisley, born of parents from about Tynedrum, in Breadalbane. Mr. M'Taggart was a moral preacher, and he had one sermon upon sympathy, which he had delivered before the commissioner, wherein were touches equal, or indeed superior to anything in Logan—and no wonder, for they were in a great measure attributable to Adam Smith. This celebrated sermon did the pious Æneas pour forth, with mixed motives, to the congregation of Casterton, and ever and anon he laid his hand upon his heart, and looked to a pier near the window beneath the loft on the left hand side of the pulpit.

"A few days after this judicious and instructive exhibition, Mr. M'Taggart, with both medal and sermon in his pocket, rode up to the door of Nether-place, like a man bent on bold and high enterprise. Myie was half afraid to lead his steed to the stable, for he was an exceedingly formidable looking animal, greatly above the usual stature of horses in that part of the country, as indeed well he might, for, during several years, he had carried an enormous black, high Cupid Congo, kettle-drummer to that since highly distinguished regiment, the Scots Greys. However, he was not so fierce as he looked; but, prophetic of provender, allowed Myie to lead him away like a lamb into a stable which he could not enter till he had 'stooped his anointed head.' Meanwhile, the Reverend Æneas M'Taggart was proceeding to business.

"The young divine took his place, after a little elegant badinage, on the parlor hearth-rug, with his back to the fire, and his coat-flaps opening behind, and gathered up each below an elbow—the attitude which of all others make a person appear most like a gentleman. 'Pray, ma'am, have you ever read Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments?' 'No, sir, I never have; indeed, from what I have seen said of it in other volumes, I fear it may be above the comprehension of a poor weak woman.' 'Not if properly explained by a superior mind—Miss Lyndsay. The great leading doctrine of this theory is, that our moral judgment follows, or is founded on our sympathetic affections or emotions. But then it requires to be particularly attended to, that, according to Dr. Adam Smith, we do not sympathize directly with the emotions of the agent, but indirectly with what we suppose would be the feelings which we ourselves should entertain if placed in his situation. Do you comprehend, ma'am?' 'It would be presumption in me, Mr. M'Taggart, to say that I do perfectly comprehend it; but I do a little, and it seems to be pretty much like what you illustrated so eloquently in your discourse last Sabbath.' 'Yes, ma'am, it is the germ which I unfold under the stronger light of more advanced philosophy. You will observe, Miss Lyndsay, that often a man is placed in a situation where he feels nothing for himself, but where the judicious observer, notwithstanding, feels for him—perhaps pity, or even disgust—and with that he expanded himself before the chimney. Margaret requested him to have the goodness to take the poker and stir up the fire. 'Certainly, ma'am, certainly, that is an office which they say a man should not take upon himself under seven years acquaintance; but I hope Miss Lyndsay does not look upon me as a stranger.' Therewith he smashed exultingly the large lump of coal, and continued, 'then, ma'am, as to the sense of propriety,—but here Myie opened the door, and came in with a flutter. 'My conscience, Mr. M'Taggart, that beast o' yours is eating the crib—it'll take James Adams a forenoon-job with his plane to smooth off the splinters—he's a devil of a horse, and likes shavings better than last year's hay.' This was an awkward interruption to the 'young man eloquent,' who was within a few paragraphs of putting the question. But Myie withdrew, and Mr. M'Taggart forthwith declared his heart. Before Margaret could reply, he strenuously urged his suit. 'The heritors are bound to build me a new manse, and the teinds are far from being exhausted. I have raised a process of augmentation, and expect seven additional chalders. Ilay Campbell is the friend of the clergy. The stipend is £137 17s. 6d. in money, and likewise from the widow's fund you will be entitled, on my decease, to £30 per annum, be it less or more—so that'—Margaret was overwhelmed with such brilliant prospects, and could not utter a word. 'Give me, ma'am, a categorical answer—be composed—be quiet—I respect the natural modesty of the sex—but as for Nether-place, it shall be settled as you and our common friend, Mr. Oswald, shall fix upon our children.'

"A categorical answer was the only word which Margaret did not very clearly understand; but she instantly felt that perhaps it might be the little expressive word—'No'; and accordingly she hazarded that monosyllable. Mr. M'Taggart, the man of the medal, was confounded and irritated—he could not believe his ears, long as they were, and insisted upon an immediate explanation. In a few minutes things were brought to a proper bearing; and it was felt that the sermon on sympathy had not produced the expected effect. It is grievous to think that Æneas was barely civil on his departure, and flung his leg over old Cromwell with such vehemence as almost to derange the balance of power, and very nearly to bring the pride of the presbytery to the gravel. However, he regained his equilibrium, and

"With his left heel inaudibly aside, Provoked the caper that he seemed to chide," till he disappeared out of the avenue from the wondering eyes of Myie, who kept exclaiming, 'Safe us—he's like a rough rider!—Leuk now, the beast's funking like mad, and then up again w' his forelegs like a perfect unicorn.'

Demoethenes. Translated by Thomas Leland, D.D. 2 vols. 18mo. pp. 262, 272. New-York: J. & J. Harper. 1831.

This is an appropriate and well printed addition to the Classical Family Library, forming its fourth number, containing a brief biography of the celebrated Athenian, and also a preface by which the general reader is enlightened upon the subjects of the orations. These volumes are done up with neatness, and we need not add, should be in the hands of every youth in preference to most other offerings of the press.

A Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy. By John Herschel, Esq. A.M. &c. 1 vol. 12mo. p. 275. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea.

This treatise is of a character which should recommend it to universal perusal. It is divided into three parts, in each of which a separate branch of the subject is examined. Several extracts have already appeared in our pages.

Geographia Classica: or the application of Ancient Geography to the Classics. By John Frost. 1 vol. 8mo. p. 262. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. 1831.

An excellent auxiliary to students, especially readers of history. It is the second American, from the ninth London edition. A series of interrogations is annexed at the end of the volume.

Remarks on the Life and Writings of Daniel Webster. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea. 1831.

A portion of this pamphlet has been published in the eighteenth number of the Philadelphia Quarterly Review. It offers a deal of interesting matter, and will doubtless be much read.

Jacqueline of Holland: a Historical Tale. By Thomas Colley Gratian, author of "The Heiress of Bruges," &c. 2 vols. 12mo. pp. 209, 216. New-York: J. & J. Harper. 1831.

We have not been able to peruse the last work of this popular writer, and only mention it in order to remind his many admirers that it is now awaiting their leisure.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

A NEW, original, successful tragedy, and one attractive to large numbers of our fellow-citizens, is quite an event in our little theatrical diary. Mr. Bailey has not been hitherto known as a writer. He has grown up utterly in the shade, and leaps out now with the suddenness of Minerva springing from the brain of Jove. It is said that a general consternation ran through Pearl-street, Peck-slip, and other parts of our metropolis consecrated to the genius of commerce, when this poet in disguise was detected upon the premises. The brokers and importers of dry goods put their hands to their chins, and looked bothered. The auctioneers and jobbers took breath a moment from their squabbles about piece sales and package sales, and rolled up their eyes with manifestations of wonder; and the young merchant-clerks paid their dollar to Mr. Blake in rapid succession, and with signs of doubt and curiosity in their faces. One honest Pearl-streeter, who was business, "marrow, bones, and all," and who it appears had frequently met our author on a common level, without ever so much as suspecting him of any such atrocious propensities, stepped back six yards, when we mentioned the name of the writer, and slapping down the palm of his hand upon his knee, declared, with more candor than politeness, that he did not believe a word of it. Notwithstanding his incredulity, the play went on to its overflowing audience, and heavy peals of applause testified that Mr. Bailey had nothing to fear, unless, perhaps, the fate of one of the great Athenian writers, who was smothered in the theatre under mantles flung on him by his admirers in the way of caresses.

The public have already pronounced judgment upon the tragedy, which was, indeed, completely successful; and, if dependence may be placed upon the prompt and continued plaudits of a large and intelligent company, the general admiration of the daily press, and several testimonials from eminent literary individuals, it possesses merits of no common order. To detail the plot might interfere with the pleasure of such as hereafter attend the representation, but we cannot avoid offering a few extracts, which scarcely require any comment. We may, however, first observe, that the author must not as yet rest on his laurels. Tragedy-writing is a business demanding a severe apprenticeship, and in this attempt he has fallen into several trivial errors, which, as it is a first piece, it would be scarcely fair to dwell on. Here and there we note a probability a little violated, a situation not altogether new, or a period which has a tinge of similarity to something we have read elsewhere. We are frank in pointing out these trifles, as they are merely the result of inadvertency, and perhaps an over anxiety to supply the piece with dramatic incident. The language is chaste yet melodious and declamatory. Much industry and taste appear in the construction of the machinery of the plot, and there are points to which Mr. Keen imparted a striking effect. He read the following beautifully. It refers to his daughter Hersilia:

"There is need
That I acquaint her with my late intent
To raise her fortune and advance my own,
And if, as the late news I've heard portends,
Which this my honest soldier here confirms,
She cling with fondness to this Claudius,
I'll tear the rooted passion from her breast,
Though it should crack her heart-strings; for this thing
Which boys call love, but which experience
Grafted on wisdom in the deeper school,
Where human nature doth unfold her page
To true philosophy, deems but a toy,
Is a mere bubble, which, thrown in the run
Of wild romance, delights the child awhile,
Then bursts to airy nothing; but the mind
That looks on life with cool ambition's eye,
And acts with dignity which soars beyond
Such idle fantasies, makes that the tool
By which it plays upon the weak, and moulds
The unwary to its purpose."

The following soliloquy, by Rufus, was much applauded:

"Fie, fie upon the fashion of the times.
That clothes in splendor and decks out to view,
In all the trappings of triumphant war,
The pampered minion of applauding crowds—
'Tis not the fields a man has nobly won,
Nor the proud name by fearful hazards gained
In acts of self-devotion and high enterprise—
These weigh not with the throng a jot; a feather,
Thrown by a skilful hand would turn the scale
Of popular opinion. Why, I've known
Some mountebank, some shrewd and arrant knave,
Draw crowds of fools in his admiring train,
While real greatness passed unheeded by."

The annexed description of a chariot race is in the author's best style:

"Panting with eager hopes and proud desires,
With beating heart the youthful daring band
Start to the race, and fiercely seize the reins.
Onward they rush—ten thousand voices hail
The alternate victor as he speeds along;
Ten thousand glances mark the chariot's flight,
And as they gaze, as many thousand souls
Swell in their bosoms—
Then comes the glorious moment when the goal
Is almost reached; they goad the foremost steeds,
Lashing with all their might upon their flanks—
The flying chariot kindles in the course,
And swifter than the wind is borne along;
And now the victor, like a flash of light,
Bursts on the view, and hails the loud acclaim.
While lengthening shouts of triumph rend the air.
One moment proud as this, my churlish friend,
Is worth the glories of a whole campaign."

Great force was given to the speech of Waldimar in the fifth act, before Theodosius:

"When the last acts of my eventful life
Are told unto my country, let it not Be blotted out from record, how urged on
By taunts that goad, and angry threats that swell
The bosom of insulted honor—
To bursting, and how roused to savage hate
By the dire mad'ning sight of those I honored,
And whom my bosom clung to, writhing, mangled,
And with their gory locks that clotted hung

Around their ghastly brow, and with those eyes
That death and agony made eloquent,
Shrieking, "revenge—revenge!" Let it be told
Thus urged, thus roused to fury, I stood forth
Their proud avenger—prouder of that name
Than if I had trod down the stubborn necks
Of the dark Scythians."

Our readers will excuse us for quoting the spirited soliloquy of Claudius waiting for Hersilia:

"I see her not, and yet it is the hour
We were to meet; or has my anxious heart,
Borne on love's wings, deceived me in the count
Of time, which lags with heavy pace behind?
It must be so—for she is wont to steal
With eager haste to attend her Claudius.
How formed for contemplation and soft dreams
Is this fair garden in its loneliness!
Where not a sigh does gentle nature breathe,
And where the moon in silent majesty
Looks down from her high throne above the clouds,
And, emblem of a power and love divine,
Beams peace and light and harmony around.
But hark! the splash of the resounding oar,
And in the distance the soft echoing horn,
That sounds along the waters, and the cry
Of wakeful sentinels, fall on the ear
And sweetly break the stillness of the hour."

Whatever may be the difference of opinion respecting the rank of this tragedy, among similar native productions, all unite in awarding great praise to the author for the elegance of the language, the dramatic management of several parts of the dialogue, and the really strong effect of the story upon the audience. Mr. Bailey may justly congratulate himself upon the result of this experiment. He has covered himself with laurels, which all who know him personally will be glad to see placed on his brow.

The prologue, by Mr. Sands, displayed unusual nerve and poetic beauty. A few noble lines may be appropriately quoted:

"All is not gained at once. The Genoese
Who first explored our now familiar seas,
'Gainst every barrier, firm in his intent,
Found but the isles and not the continent.
A hundred stars shed their prophetic rays
Ere Shakespeare's sun obscured them with its blaze."

The arch and spirited manner in which Mrs. Sharpe recited the epilogue, procured her much applause.

With Mr. Kean's acting we were agreeably disappointed. High as this ambitious young performer previously stood in our estimation, we did not conceive him capable of carrying through an original play so triumphantly. His attitudes were classical and picturesque, his readings impressive and beautiful, and both his conception and execution of the character correct and spirited. We are persuaded that his acting will be more admired the more closely it is examined. Sit in the stage-box and watch his face and his attitudes, the nearer the better, and you will feel yourself under the influence of a skilful actor. He played Richard the other evening with marked success; and the sensation which he has produced during this engagement is stronger and more general than he ever created before.

Miss Clifton, at the American theatre, has recovered from her indisposition, and is again attracting full houses. The affairs of this establishment seem going on very prosperously. Mr. and Mrs. Keppell of the Haymarket, Mr. and Mrs. Hadaway from the City theatre, London, and Mr. Spencer from the Adelphi, have arrived from London in the Cambria, having been engaged by Mrs. Hamblin as part of the regular stock company.

GREEN-ROOM INTELLIGENCE.

In the course of the present month, we understand that Mrs. Austin and Mr. Jones will make their appearance in the opera of Cinderella at Philadelphia. We congratulate our musical friends in that city on the production of this charming opera; and we do not doubt that with attention, and the talent which is attached to the theatre under Mr. Maywood's direction, they will enjoy a treat of the most refined description. We think we cannot say too much of this enchanting production, supported as we are by the fact that it not only is a reigning favorite in London, and has been played sixty nights in this city, but that it has been translated into German for the opera-house at Berlin. The talents of the prima donna are known and appreciated in our sister city. Mr. Jones, we believe, has never appeared there; but we feel assured that he will make that impression on the public which science and fine natural powers are sure to command.

We understand that the Holiday-street theatre in Baltimore, under the direction of Mr. Walton, is conducted with spirit; and that the inhabitants have now a manager who will, in the course of the season afford ample gratification to the taste for music which is known to pervade the fashionable circles.

The Richmond Hill theatre, corner of Varick and Charlton streets, will open on Monday evening next, under the management of Mr. Russell.

Mr. Forest's Gladiator has been pre-eminently successful in Philadelphia.

Inquiries are making from all quarters, "Where is Miss Clara Fisher?" Amid the multiplicity of attractions to which novelty imparts a fictitious value, the brilliant declamations of this rare young actress must still command the admiration ever awarded to truth and nature.

Mr. and Mrs. Anderson are performing at the Tremont theatre, Boston. A friend who was present informs us, that several obstreperous gentlemen, said to have journeyed from New-York on purpose to create a disturbance, were handed unceremoniously out of the theatre. We trust the report of their being from this city is not true. Whatever the obnoxious vocalist may have said, such a course of revenge would be cruel, and indeed brutal persecution. The singing of Mr. Anderson was greatly admired, and it was generally supposed that, but for the unlucky circumstances attending his arrival here, he would have been a prominent favorite.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

Editor's study.—There is a charming little boy who comes in and out of our room just when he pleases, tumbles over the new damp octavos, peeps into the papers, examines the engravings, and makes fun of our editorial articles with a very pretty impudence and familiarity. He is a sweet-tempered, sunshiny, affectionate creature. We could write off a column with him hanging on our knee, when the whisper of another would fling us into a fever. We are so accustomed to his boyish, winning ways, that we love to have him near us. The sight of him fills us with cheerful thoughts, and affects us as pleasantly as a stream of afternoon sunshine on the wall, or the rustling of the low wind among the leaves in summer, or anything that chimes in with our feelings, and enlivens the mind with agreeable associations. In this little fellow are the germs of a great character. He sometimes melts with the tenderness of a true poet, and, again, betrays the fire and rage which, properly cherished and disciplined, might make him a hero. His very faults are those of a noble soul, unable yet to manage its own energies. By a proper course of education, to develop his good qualities and temper his impetuosity, he might be trained up to a career of splendid virtue and honor. He came into our room the other evening just as twilight had induced us to close our book. Instead of his usual delightful countenance, and rapid, eager step, his face was pale and disturbed, and his little feet were lifted slowly. We took his hand, and drawing him gently towards our lap, asked what was the matter; but his eyes immediately filled with tears, his tender heart heaved and throbbed, and hiding his face in our bosom, he wept bitterly. He had been whipped at school because he did not know his dictionary lesson. We asked him a few questions from the book, and found that he was not only utterly ignorant respecting the task, but that he had not even been taught, except in the most absurd and mechanical way. He informed us that the master had ordered him to learn two pages of words, with their spelling, definitions, parts of speech, number, &c. He could tell the meaning set down in the book for "communication," for instance, and that it is a noun, and in the singular number; but when required to explain what he meant by the term "noun," or to name any other word also a noun, or what he meant by its being in the singular number, or to give the plural number, he said those were questions which his master never asked. He only saw that the boys could say off by heart what was written in the book, and never paused to ascertain whether they understood the spirit of a single sentence. We fear that too many of our academies are conducted in the same slovenly manner. Young lads may commit to memory whole chapters of grammar and arithmetic, and yet know literally nothing about them. Indeed, they are actually injured by unsuccessful attempts to learn, as they often mistake words for knowledge—an ignorant mind, conscious of its ignorance, will probably improve, but one believing itself sufficiently cultivated, will remit all future exertions. If the truth could be known, many teachers themselves deserve the censure and penalties they bestow on their pupils. We had been turning this subject over in our own mind for some time, resolved to handle it for the benefit of our young friends, the school-boys, but, for the present shall substitute the following just reflections by Steele, which we trust it will not seem impertinent in us to recommend to the attentive perusal of such as find themselves intrusted with the charge of children. A more delicate task could not be imposed upon them. We believe the period will arrive when the profession of instructing the young will be one of the most lucrative and respectable as it certainly is one of the most important which can employ the talents of the learned and the virtuous. Now it lies unluckily under a kind of disrepute. No one places it up as the ultimate object of his ambition. It is too often made subservient to every other business—a kind of stepping-stone to other professions. If the time which bad and careless teachers are the means of causing bewildered, oppressed, and helpless children to waste, could be computed, it would be found that several years in the lives of millions of the inhabitants of these states, might have been almost as well passed in sleep. We are tempted to put on paper several reflections of our own, but the extracts given below are so true and forcible that they express our opinion much more eloquently than we could ourselves.

"I have very often with much sorrow bewailed the misfortune of children, when I consider the ignorance and undiscerning of the generality of schoolmasters. The boasted liberty we talk of is but a mean reward for the long servitude, the many heart-aches and terrors to which our childhood is exposed in going through a grammar-school. Many of these stupid tyrants exercise their cruelty without any manner of distinction of the capacities of children, or the intention of parents in their behalf. There are many excellent tempers which are worthy to be nourished and cultivated with all possible diligence and care, that were never designed to be acquainted with Aristotle, Tully, or Virgil; and there are as many who have capacities for understanding every word those great persons have writ, and yet were not born to have any relish of their writings. For want of this common and obvious discerning in those who have the care of youth, we have so many hundred unaccountable creatures every age whipped up into great scholars, that are for ever near a right understanding, and will never arrive at it. These are the scandal of letters, and these are generally the men who are to teach others. The sense of shame and honor is enough to keep the world itself in order without corporal punishment, much more to train the minds of uncorrupted and innocent children. It happens, I doubt not, more than once in a year, that a lad is chastised for a blockhead, when it is a good apprehension that makes him incapable of knowing what his teacher means. A brisk imagination very often may suggest an error, which a lad could not have fallen into, if he had been as heavy in conjecturing as his master in explaining. But there is no mercy even towards a wrong interpretation of his meaning, the sufferings of the scholar's body are to rectify the mistakes of his mind.

"I am confident that no boy, who will not be allured to letters without blows, will ever be brought to any thing with them. A great or good mind must necessarily be the worse for such indignities; and it is a sad change to lose of its virtue for the improvement of its knowledge. No one who has gone through what they call a great school but must remember to have seen children of excellent and ingenious natures (as has afterwards appeared in their manhood;) I say no man has passed through this way of education but must have seen an ingenious creature expiring with shame, with pale looks, beseeching sorrow, and silent tears, throw up its honest eyes, and kneel on its tender knees to an inexorable blockhead, to be forgiven the false quantity of a word in making a Latin verse. The child is punished, and the next day he commits a like crime, and so a third with the same consequence. I would fain ask any reasonable man, whether this lad, in the simplicity of his native innocence, full of shame, and capable of any impression from that grace of soul, was not fitter for any purpose in this life, than after that spark of virtue is extinguished in him, though he is able to write twenty verses in an evening?"

"It is, methinks, a very melancholy consideration that a little negligence can spoil us, but great industry is necessary to improve us; the most excellent natures are soon depreciated, but evil tempers are long before they are exalted into good habits. To help this by punishments, is the same thing as killing a man to cure him of a distemper; when he comes to suffer punishment in that one circumstance, he is brought below the existence of a rational creature, and is in the state of a brute that moves only by the admonition of stripes. But since this custom of educating by the lash is suffered by the gentry of Great Britain, I would suggest only that honest heavy lads may be dismissed from slavery sooner than they are at present, and not whipped on to their fourteenth or fifteenth year, whether they expect any progress from them or not. Let the child's capacity be forthwith examined, and he sent to some mechanic way of life, without respect to his birth, if nature designed him for nothing higher: let him go before he has innocently suffered, and is debased into a dereliction of mind for being what it is no guilt to be, a plain man. I would not here be supposed to have said, that our learned men of either robe who have been whipped at school, are not still men of noble and liberal minds; but I am sure they had been much more so than they are had they never suffered that infamy."

"Many a white and tender hand, which the fond mother had passionately kissed a thousand and a thousand times, have I seen whipped until it was covered with blood; perhaps for smiling, or for going a yard and a half out of a gate, or for writing an o for an a, or an a for an o. These were our great faults! Many a brave and noble spirit has been there broken; others have run from thence and were never heard of afterwards. It is a worthy attempt to undertake the cause of distressed youth; and it is a noble piece of knight-errantry to enter the list against so many armed pedagogues. It is pity but we had a set of men, polite in their behavior and method of teaching, who should be put into a condition of being above flattering or fearing the parents of those they instruct. We might then possibly see learning become a pleasure, and children delighting themselves in that which they now abhor for coming upon such hard terms to them. What would be still a greater happiness arising from the care of such instructors, would be, that we should have no more pedants, nor any bred to learning who had not genius for it."

We have been plunging to-day into divers drawers and desks for a piece of original poetry. We have untied numerous packages, neatly bound up with white tape; we have brought back to the glimpses of the moon the ravings of more disturbed imaginations than we can conveniently count, on all subjects, of all sizes, on all sorts of paper, and written in every possible variety of penmanship. There, now, is a rapid running hand. See the sweep of the F's and the T's. Look at the magnificent curl to that S, and the bold, strong dash at the end of the line. That came somewhere out of Pearl-street, we'll wager a year's subscription. It has the counter air. We receive bills sometimes, Mr. A. B. to C. D. debtor, with that identical flourish of the M. Here is a thin blue paper, with the superb rustle of a new bank-note, sealed with wax, and written in a delicate female hand. What timid eyes have shone over this page! Thank heaven we shall not meet their flash when they look next week for the verses in vain. Here is a heavy back hand. We think we see the fist that made these marks. Our reputation for taste must suffer sadly; yet out of the whole heap which lies there piled up on the floor, not a solitary piece can we find without an insurmountable objection. Either they are too long, or they are illegible, or there is bad grammar, or abominable rhyme, or false metre, or stale subjects. Some are not without beauties, but so careless as to require more revision than we have time to bestow; besides, revising and altering are sometimes dangerous. Mr. Poet is sensitive, and won't have a word changed to save the universe from a general conflagration. We have had thoughts of drawing up a formal appeal to the young rhymers of our land, some of whom possess fine material, though rather in the rough. We would particularly recommend young gentlemen in love not to send their pieces too soon. There is no hurry. The public will wait, and perhaps the author might wish to cut a little. These "thrilling glances," and "exquisite tones," are all well enough—but—after the honey moon—the—that is—we are getting into trouble here!

SECOND VERSE.

I'll tell thee how the maiden wept
When her true knight was slain,
And how her broken spirit slept,
And never woke again:
I'll tell thee how the steed drew nigh,
And left his lord afar;
But if my tale should make thee sigh,
I'll strike the light guitar.
I'll sing the song, &c.

A HEROINE'S HAND.—The hand of the heroine of a novel is always small. Whatever may be the size of the lady herself, she must be sure to have a tiny hand. This the novelist gives her by prescriptive right, and as a necessary mark of beauty. We suppose they go upon the same principle that the Chinese do in relation to a lady's foot. And yet our christians ridicule the pagan taste of the gentry of the celestial empire.

But why should a small hand be accounted a characteristic of beauty? If we rightly understand the matter, a hand, or foot, or nose, in order to look well, should be in due proportion to the rest of the body. It is not the smallness of the limb that makes it beautiful—but the just relation it bears to the parts. A small hand, therefore, unless it be upon a small person, is an absolute deformity; and the novelists, while they think themselves beautifying their heroines by giving them tiny hands, are making them absolute frights. They are for the most part tall and personal ladies as one would meet with on a summer's day; but they have the most contemptible little hands that ever any poor creature was disfigured withal.

But perhaps there may be a reasonable motive, at least in the minds of the male novelists, for giving their heroines small hands—namely, the security of their husband's ears. But would it not be better to provide the husbands with wigs, and allow the ladies to have hands of a decent size? For our own part, we are absolutely tired of seeing the heroine of every novel put off with such shocking little hands. Do, gentlemen authors, get something original; your stock of small hands must be nearly exhausted by this time.

A mechanic in the north has invented a machine for seminaries, which, by means of steam, not only warms the room, but sings all the boys "on a graduated scale," according to their offences.

Dutch wives generally assist their husbands in their business, often taking the most active share in it; and it is a common remark in Holland, that where the women have the direction of the purse and trade, the husbands seldom become bankrupts.

It is a great misfortune not to have mind enough to speak well, nor judgment enough to be silent. Hence the origin of every impertinence.

The first consideration with a knave, is how to help himself; and the second, how to do it with the appearance of helping you.

Count Mazarin kept a complete collection of the libels written against him; it amounted to forty-six quarto volumes!

One solitary philosopher may be great, virtuous, and happy in the depth of poverty, but not a whole people.

To marry a widow, in good French, signifies to make one's fortune; but it does not always happen that this meaning is correct.

As secret grief shows itself on the face, so also on the face are undivulged crimes written in characters legible to the observant eye.

Pride costs more than hunger, thirst, and cold. We never repent of having eaten too little.

Well, peace to thy heart, though another's it be, And health to thy cheek though it blooms not for me.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SONG OF MARION'S MEN.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

The exploits of General Francis Marion, the famous partisan warrior of South Carolina, form an interesting portion of the annals of the American revolution. The British troops were so harassed by the irregular warfare which he kept up at the head of a few daring followers, that they sent an officer to remonstrate with him for not coming into the open field and fighting, to use their expression, "like a gentleman and a christian."

Our band is few, but true and tried,
Our leader frank and bold;
The British soldier trembles
When Marion's name is told.
Our fortress is the good green wood,
Our tent the cypress tree;
We know the forest round us,
As seamen know the sea.
We know its walls of thorny vines,
Its glades of reedy grass,
Its safe and silent islands
Within the dark morass.

Wo to the English soldiery
That little dread us near!
On them shall light, at midnight,
A strange and sudden fear:
When waking to their tents on fire
They grasp their arms in vain,
And they who stand to face us
Are beat to earth again;
And they who fly in terror, deem
A mighty host behind,
And hear the tramp of thousands
Upon the hollow wind.

Then sweet the hour that brings release
From danger and from toil:
We talk the battle over,
And share the battle's spoil.
The woodland rings with laugh and shout,
As if a hunt were up,
And woodland flowers are gathered
To crown the soldier's cup.
With merry songs we mock the wind
That in the pine-top grieves,
And slumber, long and sweetly,
On beds of oaken leaves.

Well knows the fair and friendly moon
The band that Marion leads—
The glitter of their rifles,
The scampering of their steeds.
'Tis life our fiery barbs to guide
Across the moonlit plains;
'Tis life to feel the night wind
That lifts their tossing manes.
A moment in the British camp—
A moment—and away
Back to the pathless forest,
Before the peep of day.

Grave men there are by broad Santee,
Grave men with hoary hairs,
Their hearts are all with Marion,
For Marion are their prayers.
And lovely ladies greet our band,
With kindest welcoming,
With smiles like those of summer,
And tears like those of spring.
For them we wear these trusty arms,
And lay them down no more
Till we have driven the Briton,
Forever, from our shore.

ANTIQUITIES OF NEW-YORK.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE OLD FEDERAL HALL.

BY JOHN PINTARD.

The old city-hall in Wall-street, at the head of Broad-street, has been faithfully copied from an engraving published by Tiebout, in 1789. It had been a short time previously enlarged and improved for the reception and accommodation of the first congress convened under the new constitution of the United States. In compiling the annexed succinct history of its predecessors, I have drawn largely from the original records of the common council.

The first stadt-house was erected by the Dutch while in possession of the colony of New Netherlands and the city of New Amsterdam, under the jurisdiction of a schout, burgomaster, and schepen.

Hudson came up to the island of Manhattan, called by the natives Manndoes, in the month of October, in 1609, then occupied by a ferocious tribe of Indians; he navigated as high as Albany, and on his return to Holland, transferred his right of discovery to the Dutch, who afterwards granted it to their West India company. The latter the next year sent ships to Manhattan to trade with the natives. In 1614 a fort was built by the Dutch at the south-west extremity of the island, and also another, called Fort Aurania, (Orange,) where Albany now stands, which was settled before the city of New-Amsterdam; the latter probably was not permanently occupied until the year 1619. From this period it remained in possession of the Dutch until the conquest of the colony by the English in 1664. A few years after, it was granted by Charles II. to his brother James, Duke of York and Albany—and the two principal, indeed only cities at that time in the colony, were called after him, New-York and Albany.

The date of the erection of the stadt-house is not ascertained, but most likely it was shortly after the settlement of New Amsterdam. It was, as were most of the houses of that period, built of bricks, called clinkers, imported from Holland, as ballast for merchant vessels. Few specimens of these early structures now remain here, but several yet exist in Albany. The style of architecture, with steep, tiled roofs, gables to the street, and alleys between the houses, was Spanish, introduced by that nation into Flanders, now Belgium, while that populous portion of the Netherlands was possessed by Spain. In consequence of the long protracted civil and religious wars between Spain and Holland, which terminated in the independence of the latter, a most rancorous antipathy existed on the part of the Dutch of New Netherlands against the Spaniards, which was scarcely obliterated from the minds of their descendants until the American revolution. Evidence of this fact is to be seen in the history of the famous negro plot in 1741, when the absurd idea was propagated and believed, that it was instigated by the Spaniards of South America. Indeed, the predatory wars of the English against Spanish America, privateering and buccaneering, fostered this early prejudice. To kill or plunder a Spaniard was regarded neither robbery nor murder. What dreadful principles to cherish in a civilized nation!

About the year 1695, the stadt-house began to require repairs, adequate to render it safe for the meetings of the court of common council, and of the supreme court. After several surveys and profound deliberations, the Hogen Mogens of the day determined that it was most expedient as well as economical, to build a new city-hall, at the head of Broad-street, and to lease or sell the old one. No lease offering, it was sold at auction to Mr. John Rodman, merchant, for nine hundred and twenty pounds, equal to two thousand three hundred dollars. Three thousand pounds, or seven thousand five hundred dollars, were appropriated towards building the new city-hall: a large sum in those days to be raised by direct tax on a population not exceeding five thousand.

The stadt-house, or first city-hall, was situated in Dock, now Pearl street, at the corner of Coenties (Countesses') lane.

The site of the new city-hall was laid on a bastion and line of stone fortifications that extended across the northern boundary of the city, from the East to Hudson river; whence the name of Wall-street is derived. This appears by a petition of the corporation to lieutenant-governor Hanfen and his majesty's council, to intercede with the earl of Bellamont, the governor, then absent at Boston, for permission, as the fortifications were dilapidated, to make use of the stones for building a new city-hall, which, no doubt, was granted. No ceremony appears to have taken place on laying the foundation, which was, probably, in the spring of 1700; and the common council held its first meetings there in the summer of 1703. This edifice, for a long time the most magnificent in the city, was frequently improved and embellished, until the revolutionary war. While in possession of the British, it was occupied for the main guard, and escaping the ravages of the enemy, it remained entire, although much injured, until the evacuation of the city by the British forces, on the twenty-fifth of November, 1783.

A room was appropriated in the hall for the use of the New-York Society Library, founded in 1754, whose collection of books, though not extensive, was select and valuable, and was totally plundered by the British. The present library was renewed in 1789. A chamber also contained a large stand of arms and equipments, purchased by the corporation in 1764, which were seized by the whigs on the Sunday afternoon, when the news of the battle of Lexington, nineteenth April, 1775, arrived, and threw the city into the utmost consternation. The chief persons concerned in the seizure were the "Liberty-boys," so called, McDougall, Willett, Lamb, Sears, and others, who immediately assembled in Van Dyck's ball-alley, north-east corner of Broadway and John-street, and formed a company under the command of Captain, afterwards General McDougall, which patrolled the city to prevent any disturbances—their parole was Boston, countersign Lexington. This was the first resort to arms in the province of New-York.

No city nor state in the Union suffered in proportion to New-York—a frontier at both extremities; exposed on the north to the predatory incursions of the Canadians and Indians, while its capital at the south was nearly one-fifth desolated by the awful conflagration on the twenty-first of September, 1776, shortly after its occupation by the British, who kept possession until the peace of 1783. At the evacuation, on the twenty-fifth of November, the patriot families returned, after a tedious and distressing exile of seven long years, to mourn over their homes, devastated or in ruins—their fortunes reduced by a depreciated currency, with little remaining to re-establish themselves in the enjoyment of their former plain, but redundant comforts. Their descendants at the present day, and the enterprising inhabitants of this commercial emporium of the ocean and the lakes, can but feebly estimate the privations and sufferings of the anti-revolutionary families, whose survivors may say, as Augustus did of Rome, we found our city in brick and leave it in marble. May they never lose sight of the plain, simple frugality and virtues of those progenitors whose word was their bond, and whose morals were irreproachable.

In the fall of 1784 the revolutionary congress removed to this city, and the court-room in the city-hall was fitted for their use. On the adoption of the new constitution, more extensive accommodations were required for the senate and house of representatives about to convene in this city, for which purpose the old edifice was entirely renovated, and an extensive addition made in the rear. The senate chamber was in the former, and that for the house of representatives in the latter. The expenses of these extensive improvements were defrayed by lottery. Major L'Enfant, a French engineer, of great abilities, in the service of the United States during the war, was the architect, and his skill and taste displayed in this edifice were universally admired, and gave the chief spring to a more improved style of architecture in public buildings throughout the United States.

In the spring of 1789 the first congress under the new constitution assembled in this city, and met in the new edifice. On the thirtieth of April George Washington was inaugurated the first president, in the gallery in front of the senate chamber, in view of an immense concourse of citizens collected in Broad-street—the doors, windows, and roofs of every house were thronged with exulting spectators. The oath of office was administered by Chancellor Livingston, on a superb quarto bible, then belonging to the Grand Lodge of the state of New-York, which is carefully preserved by St. John's lodge, No. 1., having an inscription* imprinted in gold letters on its cover, of an event so auspicious to the prosperity and happiness of the United States. The standard belonging to the Second Regiment of New-York State Artillery, held near the president on the occasion, is still in possession of the corporation of this city, which presented another elegant stand of colors to the regiment in exchange. May the bible and standard be preserved and transmitted to future generations as proud memorials of this important epoch in our national history.

This edifice, becoming superannuated, requiring constant and expensive repairs, and, moreover, not conveniently adapted for the increasing courts and municipal offices, was, after the building of the third present marble city-hall, at the head of the Park, the pride of our city and admiration of every visitor, demolished in 1812, and the site laid out in lots and sold to private individuals. The United States afterwards purchased the south-west buildings for a custom-house, which in its turn has become too confined and inconvenient for the immensely growing commercial operations of this city, and must ere long be replaced by a more extensive and commodious structure.

* On this sacred volume, on the thirtieth day of April, A. M. 5789, in the city of New-York, was administered to George Washington, the first president of the United States of America, the oath to support the constitution of the United States. This important ceremony was performed by the most worshipful grand master of free and accepted masons of the state of New-York, the Honorable Robert R. Livingston, chancellor of the state.

"Fame stretch'd her wings and with her trumpet blew,
"Great Washington is near—what praise is due?
"What title shall he have? She paused—and said,
"Not one—his name alone strikes every title dead."

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

FORTY YEARS AGO,

OR RECOLLECTIONS OF THE MAN ON HORSEBACK.

SEEN IN THE ENGRAVING.

Our old and valued correspondent in the cocked hat, who assures us he is the identical person that may be seen in the picture crossing Broad-street on horseback, has kindly favored us with his recollections, which will be found in the following memoranda.—Editors.

THE old, or as it was called not many years ago, the new city-hall, was built after a design of Major L'Enfant, a French officer, who I think served in the revolutionary war. He was afterwards employed at Washington in laying out the magnificent plan of that city, and in the construction of the public buildings, previous to Mr. Latrobe being appointed to the superintendence. I remember him some years ago, a sort of supernumerary at Fort Washington, some few miles below Washington, on the Potomac, where vast sums have been expended, and where he lived apparently in great poverty. L'Enfant was a singular character, and a man of such extensive views that his plans always fell short for want of means to complete them. There was a vastness in his conceptions that suited ill with the stinted finances and economical habits of our infant republic, and consequently the major always had the mortification of seeing them cut off short in the middle. Thus it was with the city-hall, one portion of which the writer well remembers was a sort of inexplicable lumber room, into which ran several passages that, as Gray says, "led to nothing." That part was never finished, and the major always demurred to every inquiry respecting its ultimate destination.

The plan of the city of Washington also partook of the magnitude of the major's ideas of the future, as did also that of the public buildings, the completion of which, agreeably to his designs, would have required the wealth of the whole republic. He was independent to obstinacy, no motive of interest, or temptation of convenience could sway him from his purpose, or induce him to alter his plans, to suit either the taste or the purses of his employers. Being engaged by the late Robert Morris, of Philadelphia, in the planning and erection of his celebrated palace in High-street, it is said that he devised and constructed so many subterranean passages, arches, and what not, that the original estimate for the whole building was expended before the major got above ground. He always boasted that he built for posterity; but it was certainly not for the posterity of his employers, for he generally led them into expenditures that were pretty certain to be followed by bankruptcy.

The latter years of his life were spent, if I mistake not, at Fort Washington, under the protecting bounty of the late Dudley Digges, whose estate originally comprehended the present site of that fort. I remember to have heard many anecdotes of the stern independence of character which marked him in all circumstances and situations, mixed up with a sort of mock heroic rhodomontade, not a little amusing as well as affecting. But the particulars have passed from my memory, and only the general impression remains. With all his eccentricities, he was a man of a most honorable and high spirit, which he maintained to the last in the midst of poverty and neglect. He died a few years ago, at a great age.

Another remarkable personage connected with the recollection of the old city-hall, was the worthy Rinier Skaats, keeper, or in Walter Scottish phrase, warder or seneschal of the castle. I remember him a venerable, gray-headed old man when I myself was a boy. He usually wore a sort of Dutch pea-jacket, with broad skirts, a pair of regular Dutch breeches, coming about as low as his knee-pan, woollen hose, and high-quartered shoes with square buckles, which I would venture to surmise, with the modesty becoming a man speaking of these remote ages, might peradventure have been of solid silver. He was a most vigilant guardian of the temple of justice, and waged numerous wars with the boys, who were wont to come and play at hide-and-seek in the mysterious labyrinths which the major's genius had appended to the building, as I have before observed. The exaggerations of history have elevated the wars of kings, princes, and nations into a fictitious consequence; but I maintain that of all the wars in this world, those carried on against boys are the most vexatious and unprofitable. This the worthy Rinier Skaats found to his cost, for as fast as he cleared them from one passage, they hid themselves in another; and no sooner had he dislodged them from behind a pillar, but they made their appearance in the upper gallery which ran round the hall, and shouting, and bantering the worthy seneschal till he poured forth his indignation in a Dutch philippic. My conscience smiteth me sorely when I think that I was often a party in the freaks of these mischievous urchins; some of whom are now right worshipful magistrates, and others are fast asleep in the church-yards.

But it was in the courts of justice, where he officiated as crier, that the good Rinier most distinguished himself, by the sonorous majesty with which he opened the court with "O yes! O yes!" the happy manner in which he repeated the names of jurymen and witnesses, so that nobody could understand him, and the watchful zeal with which he commanded "silence!" whenever a dog barked, a tongue fell down, or a catiff coughed or sneezed in the face of justice. He lived to a good old age, and when he died, the court cried for the loss of its crier, the dogs barked, the tongues and shovels fell, and the catiffs sneezed and coughed with impunity, until his son and namesake succeeded him in the worshipful dignity of seneschal of the castle.

A little beyond the hall, and hid by the projection of the western corner, on the right hand side of Wall-street, stood the tavern of Big Simmons, the greatest man that ever this goodly city produced, except Billy the Fiddler, of whom there is some doubt where he was born, and whether he was not descended from Orpheus or Orion, such was the magic of his violin, which he carried about the streets in a case so large, that it is affirmed it served him, after playing his last dead march, for a coffin.

Big Simmons was the prince, ay, the autocrat of Bonifaces, and his house was frequented by divers wags, now most of them gone to that bourne whence no traveller returns; but whose successors may every night be seen at the Shakspeare, cracking their jokes and quaffing their nut brown ale. I would commemorate some of these departed worthies, were it not that dwelling on such themes maketh me melancholy, even to sadness. One of these days, if all goes well, I purpose to give to the world their biographies, together with the veritable autographs of such as could write their names. The biography of Big Simmons shall be comprised in nothing less than an imperial folio, of a thickness aptly corresponding with the majesty of his person, which was such that he might be called the personification of good eating, inasmuch that nobody ever saw him standing at his own door, without being smitten with an irresistible propensity to call in and partake of that good cheer which had produced such a phenomenon. Thus he not only ate himself, but he was the cause of eating in others; and if, as is practically demonstrated in the present age, this indulgence lies at the root of human happiness, of a surety Big Simmons was one of the greatest benefactors of the human race. He shall certainly have a biography and an autograph, if I live a hundred years longer. But the greatest men must die, as did Xerxes and Big Simmons; and when this accident happened to the latter, it is affirmed that they were obliged to cut away the door-posts to afford room for his narrow house to pass. Can any one after this deny his claim to a biography and an autograph?

But who is she that standeth at the open window, shaded by the spreading branches of the old tree, which hath long since disappeared from the hallowed spot, modestly taking the morning air at home instead of gadding up and down the streets, and exhibiting her glowing beauties at the window, as becomes a modest virgin, instead of in the glare of Broadway? The sight of her warms my heart, and recalls the memory of youthful hopes and disappointments. Beautiful little Marian, thou at least deservest a biography, and thou shalt have it before I go to sleep. I am determined to rescue thee from oblivion, let what will be the consequence. If half-a-hundred dandies die of love of thy posthumous beauties, and half-a-thousand belles of envy, I cannot help it. Thy memory shall not perish, beautiful damsel!

Marian was the only child of a most respectable widow lady who inhabited the identical house, where the artist has represented her as standing at the window in the prime of maidenhood. She was destined to be a great fortune; and of the crowd of cocked hats exhibited by the artist, in the street and on the pavement, not one came there but with a view of casting a sheep's eye at the charming little Marian. I will not deny that I myself was predisposed to mount my steed and curvet before her, as may be seen in the picture, with a view to exciting her approbation of my horsemanship.

The household of the old lady was composed of three or four ebony domestics, such as the cook, a female, the coachman, the chambermaid, and the lady's own man, as gray as a badger and as black as anthracite coal. They were all old; for it seems to me there were no young servants in those days, except the humble servants of the ladies. There was a distant kinsman of the old lady who resided with her, said grace at dinner, cut up the tough geese, and made himself useful in all the multifarious ways that the ingenuity of patronage devises to enable such people to repay their obligations. He was known by the name of Herman; and his character partook largely of that trickery and cunning, interested hypocrisy, which is so often engendered by a life of dependence. He had long cherished a secret, yet vehement desire to wed the beautiful Marian, and appropriate her fortune to himself, and for this purpose used every art of subserviency to make himself, by slow inexpressible degrees, an interest in her heart, without alarming either herself or her mother.

But the young lady suspected not his attachment to her, or rather to her fortune; for, indeed, she felt no interest in him sufficient to make her either watchful or clear-sighted as to his sentiments or actions. The good lady-mother still less had an idea of his plans; for, in the first place, she considered him entirely out of the question, and in the second she was gradually becoming a strict devotee, as is very often the case with elderly ladies in want of excitement. Of late she had grown very superstitious; and there was not a dream, a ghost story, or a supernatural visitation that she did not believe as true as the gospel. But, notwithstanding all this, she would have bounced at the very thought of marrying her daughter to any thing less than a little great man, and of this Herman was perfectly aware. All that he could do, therefore, was to assail the young lady by silent attentions and grateful assiduity, waiting patiently till the chapter of accidents might pave the way to the success of his wishes. But the prospect of this became every day apparently more distant. Marian was surrounded by admirers, and now a new one entered the lists, who seemed destined to prevail over all his rivals. His name was Arthur Whittingham, and my readers will know more of him anon. It is sufficient for my purpose to say, that he gained a deep interest in the heart of Marian, and that he merited such a distinction.

Herman watched the progress of this attachment with a degree of ravenous jealousy, which every day became the more virulent from the necessity of repressing it in his own bosom. He dared not enter the lists with his rival; he dared not exhibit his feelings, and they preyed upon him like so many concealed vultures. He thought of nothing but how to thwart this growing attachment, and his solitary hours by day and by night were spent in devising plans which reason told him it was impossible to execute. Matters were in this state when the spirit of improvement, which at that time began to awaken in our city, prompted the old lady to change the location of the kitchen, which tradition said had originally been in the cellar, under the west end of the house, and had many years before been removed to the east. An ambitious neighbor had built a five-story house adjoining that end of the old lady's mansion, which, overtopping her chimney, caused it to smoke, in such wise that the black cook was afraid it would spoil her complexion, and never rested until she persuaded her mistress to remove the kitchen to the old place it had occupied before the revolutionary war.

This was accordingly done, to the great content of aunt Dinah, who excelled in pepper-pots; but she might better have staid where she was at the other end of the house. She had scarcely lighted the fire in her new dominion when there commenced a rattling of chains, and an infernal roaring in the premises, that sent aunt Dinah out of the kitchen ten times faster than she came in. She ran to her mistress, and told her the old boy, or something worse, was in the kitchen. By this time Prince and Cuffee and the whole household had evacuated the lower region, and ran altogether to tell their mistress what was going on, each in his own way, and all talking together.

The good old lady was frightened almost out of her wits, and calling Herman, proceeded at the head of the household troops, to investigate the mysterious affair. The rattling of chains, and the roaring noises still continued, and seemed to increase in violence, to the utter consternation of all parties. The old lady retreated into her strong hold, took down the bible, and, putting on her spectacles, began reading the story of Saul and the witch of Endor. Old Dinah declared she would not cook at such a diabolical fire, and Cuffee and the Black Prince swore they would not eat the dinner if she did. Herman proceeded to examine the premises, for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of this incomprehensible uproar, but without success. It continued during the whole day, until the fire went out in the evening, and was heard no more that night.

The next day Dinah emigrated back to the kitchen in the east wing, but the smoke was so intolerable that she declared the roaring noises and the rattling of chains were more tolerable, and again retreated to the diabolical region. The moment the fire began to burn the noises commenced, and again the whole household was thrown into confusion and consternation. But aunt Dinah had seen a good many witches in her day, and had once put a whole bevy of them to flight with a red-hot poker. She was, therefore, not so easily frightened as some inexperienced people, and always kept the poker heated for any emergency, determined rather to stand her ground than go back to her old quarters and be smoked to death. I ought to mention that recourse was had to an experienced chimney-doctor, who tried his hand at remedying the matter, but, like many other doctors, he only made bad worse.

In the meantime the report got abroad, and the whole neighborhood first, and the whole city by degrees, rang with the story of the haunted house. It was said that it had been used during the occupancy of the town by the British as a place of confinement for prisoners, and that a mysterious man, with an iron-bound physiognomy, had been kept there in chains, and finally disappeared in an unaccountable manner. People began to hear groans in the middle of the night, and glimmering lights were sometimes seen by the watchman, whose duty it was to guard the precincts of the old city-hall from nightly intruders. The venerable Skaats was also frequently disturbed by dreams and nightmares, which rode him so hard that he sometimes waked panting for breath. Finally, the whole affair got into the newspapers, and the whole country talked of nothing else. It should be borne in mind, that people had neither rail-roads, internal improvements, tariffs, nor nullifications to stultify them at that period, and were, therefore, right glad of something to talk about.

The old lady became ten times more devout than ever, and was often closeted with a mysterious person skilled in the "gramary" of the famous pow-wowings at old Hadley, who had been recommended to her by Herman, as a most skillful exorciser of evil spirits and layer of ghosts. This cunning varlet by degrees insinuated himself into her confidence, inasmuch that it was not long before he got the entire direction of the old lady's conscience, and could almost persuade her to any thing. He and Herman occasionally watched at night in the kitchen, where every day the same rattling of chains and accompanying noises were heard, from the time of lighting the fire in the morning to its going out at night, when all became quiet. The old lady would question the crafty varlet as to the causes of these untoward disturbances; but he only shook his head in a significant manner, and answered vaguely, on purpose to excite her curiosity. At length one day she insisted on his being more explicit, when, as if with great tribulation and reluctance, he told her that he had twice seen the ghost of her deceased husband appear immediately after the rattling of chains had ceased, and advance towards him as if to say something, but at each time the voice of a watchman crying "Past twelve o'clock, and all's well," had stopped his mouth, and caused him to vanish up the chimney, whence the rattling of chains seemed to come.

The good old lady was so frightened at this relation that she made little Marian sleep in the room with her from that time, justly concluding that no ghost, however mischievously inclined, would find it in his heart to injure such an innocent little darling. She also enjoined upon the pow-wow varlet to watch the next night, to see if the ghost would make his appearance again, and speak to him, at the same time exacting a solemn promise that he would repeat to her every word he said, without addition or diminution. Accordingly, the next day he asked a private audience of the old lady, and, locking the door inside, communicated the following intelligence, every word of which she most potently believed:

"About twelve o'clock," said he, "when the rattling of the chains and the roaring sounds had ceased, and all was silent as a church-yard, I heard three taps against the chimney-back, followed by three hollow groans, and three loud sneezes."

"My poor dear husband always sneezed three times in succession," thought the good lady.

"I sat still and said nothing, but kept my eye steadily on the spot whence the groans proceeded, when all at once a figure seemed to come out of the wall, with a long Meershaum pipe in his mouth, dressed in a cocked hat, a sky-blue bird's-eye silk coat, and gold-laced waistcoat, and breeches of the same color, a long queue, and powdered curls."

Here the old lady screamed, "The very dress my poor dear husband always wore! Did you ever see my husband when alive?"

"No."

"Wonderful!" exclaimed she again—forgetting that he might see his picture dressed exactly as he described hanging up in the hall every day.

"Well, and what did he say?"

"Why luckily the watchman happened to be asleep this time, and omitted to call out 'Past twelve o'clock.' The figure advanced slowly upon me with a gold snuff-box in his left hand, out of which he ever and anon took a pinch, and then sneezed three times."

"Just like my poor dear husband!" sighed the disconsolate widow.

"Well, when he came within about two paces, he cried out in a low, solemn, sepulchral voice, hem! I answered him in a voice equally solemn and sepulchral—hem!"

"Listen!" said the voice.

"Say on," replied I.

"My dearly beloved wife, who could never rest content without getting at every body's secrets—"

"'Tis a scandalous insinuation," cried the old lady in a pet; "but it's just like my foolish husband—"

"My dearly beloved wife," said the ghost.

"Well, well, you needn't repeat that over again."

"My dearly beloved wife would understand the occasion of these mysterious voices—listen! Know that on the birth of Herman and of my daughter Marian, which happened on the same day, I entered into a solemn agreement with his father, who was then a wealthy merchant, that if they both lived to the age of twenty-one, they should be joined in lawful wedlock. I cannot rest in my grave till this promise is complied with, nor will these noises ever cease till then. Report this to my dearly beloved wife, and tell her, as she values the repose of my body, and my soul, to fulfill my engagement without delay. I know she is an obstinate sort of an old lady, but it shall go hard but I worry her out at last, or my name is not—"

"Will he?" quoth the widow to herself: "I'm not quite so sure of that." She was not a little nettled at these posthumous reflections of her spouse.

"Here," continued the pow-wower, "the poor ghost was interrupted by the voice of the watchman, who had just waked up, and, seeing the windows reddening with the rising sun, began to cry 'fire!' with all his might. 'Farewell,' quoth he; 'I hear the milkman's summons, the morning salutation of the early chimney-sweeper, the rattling of the cartman's cart, and the noise of opening doors. Farewell!—the grave is open to receive me. Let not the day pass without communicating this to my dear wife.' Saying this, he deliberately took another pinch of snuff, sneezed three times, and disappeared. You now know all, madam, and must act according to your best discretion." So saying, he unlocked the door, and left the widow to her reflections.

These were by no means enviable. She was not a little affronted at the irreverent manner in which the ghost had spoken of her, and the thought of marrying her rich, beautiful daughter to such a poor sinner as Herman, was gall, wormwood, and aloes. But then the commands of her dead husband, the repose of his body and soul, and the horrible noises which beset her and her household from morning till night, furnished a counterpoise to all her objections. After a hard struggle, she determined to comply with the injunctions of the ghost.

When this was communicated to Marian, she turned pale, and wept her unwillingness to offer herself up as a sacrifice to the repose of her deceased parent's remains. The existence of these mysterious and appalling sounds she could not doubt, for she had often heard them; but the appearance of the ghost she did not entirely believe. She communicated the whole to Whittingham, who scouted the story of the pow-wower, and attempted to persuade her either to consent to a private marriage, or refuse to wed with Herman. But the poor girl was infected with superstitious fears, and her nerves weakened by the perpetual recurrence of these appalling sounds. By degrees, her opposition became weaker, and weaker as the thought of her being possibly accessory to the disturbance of that repose which belongs to the grave, gradually possessed her mind.

"I must make the sacrifice," said she, one evening, as she and Whittingham were strolling arm in arm on the Battery.

"The sacrifice of two living souls on the altar of superstition," cried he. "Oh, Marian! can you be so weak as to believe this wild tale!"

"Have I not heard the mysterious noises?"

"Yes; and so have I. I cannot deny but that there is something apparently supernatural, or at least unaccountable in them. But the tale of the ghost deserves only to be laughed at."

"Not by me. Every thing connected with the memory of my dear father is sacred. I cannot live under the impression of his wandering about after death, and wanting the repose of a quiet grave, and all through my fault."

"And you will destroy the peace of us both?"

"I will: it is the command of my loving mother—and perhaps of my dead father."

"Then you will never see me more," said Whittingham;—and they returned to the haunted house without another word. As they opened the door, they heard the rattling of chains and the roaring sounds. Marian shuddered, and even Whittingham felt his nerves somewhat shaken.

"Hark!" cried she; "don't you hear the warning?"

"It is the death-knell of my hopes," replied the youth. A pressure of the hand, and a last kiss—and they saw each other no more!

It was not long before Marian was worried into a slow, unwilling consent to wed with Herman. It was expected that the marriage would be followed by the repose of the ghost, and the discontinuance of the appalling sounds; but, to the astonishment of all, and the despair of poor Marian, they continued as they did before.

"I have sacrificed myself and poor Whittingham in vain," said she, a hundred times a day, as the neglect and ill humor of Herman deprived her of the last consolation of a wife, that of believing herself beloved by her husband. Herman, who, as the reader probably suspects, had concerted with the pow-wower the story of the ghost, quarreled with him when they came to divide the spoils of the plot, and the consequence was a full exposure. But the noises still continued as great a mystery to Herman as to the rest of the world; and, on the death of the old lady, he removed into a distant part of the city. Poor Marian continued to say to herself, "I have sacrificed myself, and him I loved in vain." And when, at length, she learned the plot of which she had been the dupe, she pined away, and died of a broken heart. I never knew what became of Whittingham.

The old house remained untenanted for many years, during which the mysterious rattling of chains and roaring noises entirely ceased. The whole story was forgotten, until, on pulling down the building, it was found that by accident, or from some cause or other, a smoke-jack had been masoned up in the wall, during the period the family had abandoned it in consequence of the city being in possession of the enemy, when, as I before observed, it was occupied as a prison, or guard-house. This discovery explained the whole mystery of the periodical rattling of the chains, and the roaring noises; but, alas! it could not restore the happiness of poor Marian, or wake the dead from their graves.

GREENOUGH'S CHANTING CHERUBS.

THIS lovely piece of sculpture, now exhibiting at the American Academy of Fine Arts in Barclay-street, has not been over praised. It is said to be the first group ever completed by an American artist. The subject is selected from a picture in Florence, by Raphael, and represents two infantile forms singing from a scroll. They are full of grace, particularly the countenance of the younger. It is beautifully lighted up with an expression of innocence, mingled with intelligence quite angelic; and the head is charming. From the circular we gather, that these embodyings of Raphael's genius have been executed in marble by a young American artist, for Mr. J. Fennimore Cooper, the popular novelist, although they are now offered to the public inspection for the benefit of the sculptor. They have been greatly admired, and eulogies upon the artist have been so lavishly bestowed, that we almost feared to visit them, lest our highly raised expectations should suffer a disappointment. Our anticipations, however, were more than realized.

THE WRECK OF THE MEDUSA.

This large painting, by G. Cooke, also in the American Academy in Barclay-street, forcibly illustrates one of those exquisitely awful scenes which are continually occurring, but the full horror of which is seldom conceived. It is a copy from one in the Louvre by Gericault, and adheres closely to the accounts of the actual event.

The Medusa, a French frigate, was wrecked in 1816, on the coast of Africa, but not within sight of land, and one hundred and forty-seven persons confided themselves to a raft, which sank three feet with their weight. Amidst famine, bloodshed, madness, and despair, these unhappy creatures remained twelve days, except that their number rapidly diminished, sixty-five having perished in one night. Imagination shrinks from relating by what means the survivors preserved themselves from starvation until they were taken off by the French brig Argus. The painting represents the moment when the Argus is descried in the horizon, and the few still alive on the raft are making a last effort to attract its notice. The sea is lifting its waves around them, and the sail glides in the distance. A variety of affecting objects strike the eye of the spectator, and call to mind Byron's powerful description of a similar scene. A number of paintings by the same artist are to be seen at No. 86 Broadway. We have not yet had an opportunity of examining them.

GENERAL MUSICAL REPORT.

We have had a succession of musical soirées lately, highly pleasing to the amateurs of that delightful art. Madame Brichta's entertainment was followed by the last Musical Fund concert of the season. There is, we understand, a strong subscription list to this praiseworthy institution, which was formed solely for the purpose of assisting destitute musicians and their families. It is a charity to which nobody can well object; we are, therefore, rather inclined to complain of the management of any theatre which does not facilitate the advancement of such an object as far as prudence will admit. We can scarcely credit the reports which reach us, that even members of the society, who perchance might need its support at some future period, have been more than once or twice refused leave of absence from the orchestra to which they belong: the concerts taking place but once in six months, and consequently the boon demanded twice in the year being neither extravagant nor ruinous in its consequences. The present, we are sorry to say, was not so well attended as the last concert. Madame Feron and Madame Brichta, were the vocal Donne—Mr. Fehrman the basso cantante of the evening. The band, led by Mr. Hill, contained some individual talents of a high order; but they played by no means together. Mr. Norton performed a concerto on the trumpet with good effect, and Mrs. Thorne, on the harp, has the calibre of an excellent amateur. We should, however, be inclined to think her a great acquisition to the city as a teacher of that refined and lady-like instrument. Madame Feron sang her brilliant bravura, "Cupid aid me," with force and execution. Madame Brichta's best effort was a song by Pacini, well suited to her mezza soprano voice. (We beg to correct the term contra alto, as applied to this lady in our last number. She is too much what the French term a "chanteuse a roulade," and has neither the quality nor the confined compass which constitute a female contra alto; at the same time her lower notes, being strong, would doubtless give her the advantage of executing moreaux written for a mere contra alto with effect.) The overture to "Guillaume Tell" we have never heard executed faithfully in this city, owing to the want of instruments—six violoncelli being an impossibility, and a corneo inglese, with hautboys, not having been imported. We once indeed, saw a French gentlemen named Hutet produce an instrument which he said was a hautboy, but when he proceeded to use it, at a rehearsal of sacred music, the most profound musicians doubted its nature, and many disputes took place as to whether it should be included among that species of music known as the cat-call, or whether it was the instrument used in the show called "Punch and Judy." Indeed, the consternation it produced will be well remembered by every member of that society who reads this article. The best version of the overture to Guillaume Tell that has been heard in this city, was at the concert given by Mr. Gear, jun., at the Masonic-hall prior to his departure for Italy.

At the Park theatre, there is a kind of dumb show done on the stage during its performance by the band, to suit which the music is mutilated in a most unseemly manner. At the last mentioned establishment we have had Mr. Sinclair in Guy Mannering—an apology being made for Miss Hughes, on account of indisposition. The music of this prettily adapted play is really good, when done justice to. The opening glee, the "Winds whistle cold," was executed admirably by Messrs. Pearson, Thornton, Haydon, and chorus, but, alas! the "Chough and Crow," the most effective concerted piece possible when fairly given, was a failure: we have heard it beautifully sung at the Park theatre by Miss Pearson, Mrs. Singleton, and Mr. Haydon, and rapturously encored—on this occasion, however, we were thankful when it was over. The finale, Mr. Sinclair inconsiderately sung in a instead of its original key G, and consequently Mrs. Sharp was obliged to gasp at the notes, which were far too high for her low and good contra alto voice, and Mrs. Wallack was compelled to scream.

The following opera night ushered in Rob Roy and Midas. Miss Hughes made her appearance as Diana Vernon, Mr. Sinclair as Francis Osbaldistone. We do not think this interesting young lady had entirely recovered from her indisposition. The duet, "Forlorn and broken hearted," in other words the old air, "Ye banks and braes," was sung without accompaniment, and was encored; but, on the chord being given a second time by the band, it was apparent that both voices had fallen at least half a note. Before we leave this opera we have a duty to perform to Mr. Richings, who has occasionally merited and received our censure, and shall as freely, and with more pleasure, be welcome to our approbation. His representation of the blustering Major Galbraith is an intelligent and masterly piece of acting, and his singing of the song admirable. We always look to his appearance in that part with pleasure. In addition to this we have to point out and condemn the total omission of the best chorus ever written by Bishop. It is entitled "Tramp o'er moss and fell," and thus we conclude with Rob Roy.

Mr. Hamblin has not been idle even in the department of opera, and has secured to himself several persons who will complete his company, and enable him to make at least a stand in that branch of the drama, particularly by their introduction into melo-dramatic pieces, in which his establishment must take the lead, aided as it is by an immense range of stage, and all facilities of getting up showy spectacles. The debut of one lady and two gentlemen, caused an early attendance at the American theatre. Mrs. Haddaway, late Miss Hallande, of Covent-garden, was announced as Lucy Bertram, in the opera of Guy Mannering; Mr. Spencer, of Drury-lane, as Henry Bertram, and Mr. Haddaway as Dominie Sampson. They were received very favorably. Mrs. Haddaway has a powerful, but extremely coarse voice; the best part of her execution is a clear and even shake; but she has acquired a habit of putting a crescendo upon this ornament, which gradually causes it to become discordant, and which we advise her to discontinue. Her countenance is pleasing, and stature about that of Mrs. Knight, but rather embonpoint. Her songs were encored, and her reception was decidedly favorable. Of Mr. Haddaway we can only say that we have many better actors in the states, native and imported. Mr. Spencer has a baritone voice of little power, and will serve to assist in musical pieces. Miss Mestayer acted Julia Mannering with liveliness. Her singing is the strangest sound possible in our ears; and one of the most extraordinary vocal efforts we ever heard, was a song accompanied on a trumpet or bugle, we hardly know which, the sound was so doubtful; it was, however, received with rapture, and encored with cries of delight! On the concerted music of this opera we drop the curtain. We have noticed the Park, for in their musical department there is pretension, and as it is their strongest feature, it ought to be good—at the Bowery there is none.

NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

The prospectus of a work to contain superior steel plates of eminent Americans, with biographies, has been published by Mr. Herring. If conducted with talent, liberality, and spirit, it will be a desirable addition to our literature and specimen of the fine arts. We presume it is intended to be something in the style of the London National Portrait Gallery, and will be useful in furnishing employment to artists and writers.

A NIGHT AT THE RAGGED-STAFF, OR A SCENE AT GIBRALTAR.

BY WILLIAM LEGGOTT.

The mists boil up around me, and the clouds
Rise curling fast beneath me, white and sulphury,
Like foam from the roused ocean of deep hell.
I am most sick at heart—nay, grasp me not—
I am all feebleness—the mountains whirl
Spinning around me—I grow blind—What art thou?—Byron.

THE first time I ever saw the famous Rock of Gibraltar was on a glorious afternoon in the month of October, when the sun diffused just sufficient heat to give an agreeable temperature to the air, and shed a soft and mellow light through the somewhat hazy atmosphere, which enabled us to see the scenery of the Straits to the best advantage. We had had a rough and stormy, but uncommonly short passage; for the wind, though tempestuous, had blown from the right quarter; and our gallant frigate dashed and bounded over the waves, "like a steed that knows his rider." I could not then say, with the poet, from whom I have borrowed this quotation, "welcome to their roar!" for I was a novice on the ocean in those days, and had not yet entirely recovered from certain uneasy sensations about the region of the epigastrium, which by no means rendered the noise of rushing waters the most agreeable sound to my ears, or the rolling of the vessel the most pleasant motion for my body. Never did old sea-dog of a sailor, in the horse latitudes, pray more sincerely for a wind, than I did for a calm during that boisterous passage—and never, I may add, did the selfish prayer of a sinner prove more unavailing. The gale, like Othello's revenge, "kept due on to the Propontic and the Hellespont," and it blew so hard that it sometimes seemed to lift our old craft almost out of the water. When we came out of port, we had our dashy fair-weather spars aloft, with skysail yards athwart, a moonsail to the main, and hoist enough for the broad-blue to show itself to good advantage above that. But before the pilot left us, our topgallant-poles were under the boom-cover, and storm-stumps in their places; and the first watch was scarcely relieved, when the boatswain's call—repeated by four mates, whose lungs seemed formed on purpose to out-roar a tempest—rang through the ship, "all hands to house topgallant-masts, ahoy!" From that time till we made the land, the gale continued to rage with unintermitted violence, to the great delight of the old tars, and the manifest annoyance of the green reefers, of whom we had rather an unusual number on board. If my pen were endued with the slightest portion of the quality which distinguished Hogarth's pencil, I might here give a description of a man-of-war's steerage in a storm, which could not but force a smile from the most saturnine reader. I must own I did not much relish the humor of the scene then—pars magna fui—that is, I was sea-sick myself; but

and I have often since, sometimes in my hammock, sometimes during a cold mid-watch on deck, burst into a hearty laugh, as the memory of our grotesque distresses, and of the odd figures we cut during that passage, has glanced across my mind.

But the longest day must have an end, and the stiffest breeze cannot last forever. The wind, which for a fortnight had been blowing as hard as a trumpet for a wager, blew itself out at last. About dawn on the morning of the day I have alluded to, it began to lull, and by the time the sun was fairly out of the water it fell flat calm. It was my morning watch, and what with sea-sickness, fatiguing duty, and being cabined, cribbed, confined for so long a time in my narrow and unaccustomed lodgings, I felt worn out, and in no mood to exult in the choice I had made of a profession. I stood holding by one of the belaying pins of the main life-rail, (for I had not yet, as the sailors phrase it, got my sea-legs aboard,) and looking I suppose as melancholy as a sick monkey on a lee backstay, when a cry from the foretop-sail yard reached my ear that instantly thrilled to my heart, and set the blood running in a lively current through my veins. "Land, oh!" cried the jack-tar on the lookout, in a cable-tier voice which seemed to issue from the bottom of his stomach. I have heard many delightful sounds in my time, but few which seemed to me more pleasant than the rough voice of that vigilant sailor. I do verily believe, that not seven bells (grog time of day) to a thirity tar, the dinner bell to a hungry alderman, or the passing bell of some rich old curmudgeon to an anxious heir, ever gave greater rapture. The how-d'ye-do of a friend, the good-by of a country cousin, the song of the Signorina, and Paganini's fiddle, may all have music in them; but the cry of land to a sea-sick midshipman is sweeter than them all.

We made what, in nautical language, is termed a good land-fall—so good, indeed, that it was well for us the night and the wind both ceased when they did; for, had they lasted another hour, we should have found ourselves landed, and in a way that even I, much as I wished to set my foot once more on terra firma, should not have felt particularly pleased with. On its becoming light enough to ascertain our whereabouts, it was discovered that we were within the very jaws of the Straits, completely land-locked by the "steepy shore," where and already beginning to feel the influence of the strong and ceaseless easterly current which rushes into the Mediterranean through that passage with a velocity of four or five knots an hour. A gentle land-breeze sprung up in the course of the morning watch, which, though not exactly fair, yet coming from the land of the "dusky Moor," had enough of southing in it to enable us to get along at a very tolerable rate, beating with a long and short leg through the Straits.

"Europe and Afric on each other gaze,"

It would be uncharitable to require that the reader should arrive at the Rock by the same sort of zig-zag course which we were obliged to pursue; so therefore, let him at once suppose himself riding at anchor in the beautiful but unsafe bay of Gibraltar, directly opposite and almost within the very shadow of the grand and gigantic fortress, which nature and art seem to have vied with each other in rendering impregnable. No one who has looked on that vast and fortified rock, with its huge granite outline shown in bold relief against the clear sky of the south of Europe—its towering and ruin-crowned peaks—its enormous crags, caverns, and precipices—and its rich historical associations, which shed a powerful though vague interest over every feature—can easily forget the strong impression which the first sight of that imposing and magnificent spectacle creates. The flinty mass rising abruptly to an elevation of fifteen hundred feet, and surrounded on every side by the waters of the Mediterranean, save a narrow slip of level sand which stretches from its northern end and connects it with the main land, has, added to its other claims to admiration, the strong interest of utter isolation. For a while, the spectator gazes on the "stupendous whole" with an expression of pleased wonder at its height, extent, and strength, and without becoming conscious of the various opposite features which make up its grand effect of sublimity and beauty. He sees only the giant rock spreading its vast dark mass against the sky, its broken and wavy ridge, its beetling projections, and its dizzy precipices of a thousand feet perpendicular descent. After a time, his eye becoming in some degree familiarized with the main and sterner features of the scene, he perceives that the granite mountain is variegated by here and there some picturesque work of art, or spot of green beauty, that shines with greater loveliness from contrast with the savage roughness by which it is surrounded. Dotted about at long intervals over the steep sides of the craggy mass, are seen the humble cottages of the soldiers' wives, or, perched on the very edges of the cliffs, the guard-houses of the Garrison, before which, ever and anon, may be descried the vigilant sentry, dwindled to a pigmy, walking to and fro on his allotted and dangerous post. Now and then, the eye detects a more sumptuous edifice, half hid in a grove of acacias, orange, and almond trees, as if they clustered around to shut from the view of its inhabitant, in his eyrie-like abode, the scene of desolate grandeur above, beneath him, and on every side. At the foot of the rock, on a small and narrow slip less precipitous than the rest, stands the town of Gibraltar, which, as seen from the bay, with its dark-colored houses, built in the Spanish style, and rising one above another in amphitheatrical order; the ruins of the Moorish castle and defences in the rear; and the high massive walls which surround it at the water's edge, and which, thick-planted with cannon, seem formed to "laugh a siege to scorn," has a highly picturesque and imposing effect. The military works of Gibraltar are on a scale of magnificence commensurate with the natural grandeur of the scene. Its walls, its batteries, and its moles, which, bristling with cannon, stretch far out into the bay, and against whose solid structures the waves spend their fury in vain, are all works of art planned with great genius, and executed with consummate skill. An indefinite sensation of awe mixes with the stranger's feelings, as gazing upon the defences which every where meet his eye, he remembers, that the strength of Gibraltar consists not in its visible works alone, but that, hewn in the centre of the vast and perpendicular rock, there are long galleries and ample chambers, where the engines of war are kept always ready, and from whence the fires of death may at any moment be poured down upon an assailant.

Though the Rock is the chief feature of interest in the bay of Gibraltar, yet, when fatigued by long gazing on its barren and solitary grandeur, there are not wanting others on which the eye of the stranger may repose with pleasure. The green shores of Andalusia, encircling the bay in their semicircular sweep, besides the attraction which verdant hills and valleys always possess, have the super-added charm of being linked with many classical and romantic associations. The picturesque towns of St. Roque and Algeiras, the one crowning a smooth eminence at some distance from the shore, and the other occupying a gentle declivity that sinks gradually down to the sparkling waters of the bay—the mountains of Spain, fringed with cork forests, in the back ground—the dimly seen coast of Morocco across the Straits, with the white walls of Ceuta just discernible on one of its promontories—the towering form of Abila, which not even the unromantic modern name of Apes-hill can divest of all its interest as one of "the trophies of great Hercules"—these are all features in the natural landscape which, combined, render it a scene of exceeding beauty.

The clear blue waters of the bay itself commonly present an appearance of variety and animation which very materially increase the picturesqueness of the general effect. Here may at all times be seen, moored closely together, a numerous fleet of vessels, from every quarter of the globe, of every fashion of structure, and manned by beings of every creed and color. The flags and pennons which float from their masts, the sounds which rise from their decks, and the appearance and employments of the moving throngs upon them, all tend to heighten the charm of novelty and variety. In one place, may be seen a shattered and dismantled hulk, on board of which some exiled Spanish patriot, with his family, has taken refuge, dwelling there full in the sight of his native land, which yet he can scarcely hope ever to tread again: in another—on the high latticed stern of a tall, dark-looking craft, whose raking masts, black bends, and trig, warlike appearance excite a doubt whether she be merchantman or pirate—a group of Turks, in their national and beautiful costume, smoking their long chibouques with an air of gravity as great as if they were engaged in a matter on which their lives depended. Beside them, perhaps, lies a heavy, clumsy dogger, on board of which a company of industrious, slow-moving Dutchmen are engaged in trafficking away their cargo of cheese, butter, Bologna sausages, and real Schiedam; and not far away from these, a crew of light-hearted Genoese sailors are stretched at length along the deck of their polacca, chanting, in voices made musical by distance, one of the rich melodies with which their language abounds. Boats are continually passing hither and thither between the vessels and the shore; and every now and then, a long and slender felucca, with its slanting yards, and graceful lateen sails, glides across the bay, laden with the products of the fruitful soil of Andalusia, which are destined to supply the tables of the pent-up inhabitants of the Garrison.

I have mentioned that it was on a fine day in October that we arrived at Gibraltar, and I have accordingly attempted to describe the Rock, and the adjacent scenery, as they appeared to me through the mellow light of that pleasant afternoon. To one viewing the scene from any other point than that which I occupied, our own gallant frigate would have presented no unattractive feature in the glorious landscape. During the time that we were beating through the Straits, the gunner's crew had been employed in blacking the bends, somewhat rusty from the constant attrition of a stormy sea; and we had embraced the opportunity of the gentle land-breeze to replace the storm topgallant-masts with our taunt fair-weather poles, and to bend and send aloft the topgallant-sails, royals, and skysails, for which we had not before had any recent occasion. Thus renewed, and all a-taunto, with our glossy sides glistening in the sun, our flags flying, and the broad blue pennant streaming at the main, there were few objects in all that gay and animated bay on which the eye could rest with greater pleasure, than on that noble vessel. The bustle consequent upon coming to anchor was, among our active and well disciplined crew, of but brief duration. In a very few minutes, every yard was squared with the nicest precision; every rope hauled taught, and laid down in a handsome Flemish coil upon the deck, and the vast symmetrical bulk, with nothing to indicate its recent buffetings from the storm, lay floating as quietly on the bright surface, as if it were part of a mimic scene, the creation of some painter's pencil.

Though I had been on duty ever since the previous midnight, yet I felt no disposition to go below; but for more than an hour after the boatswain had piped down, I remained on deck gazing with unweary eyes, on the various and attractive novelties around me. A part of the fascination of the scene was doubtless owing to that feeling of young romance, which invests every object with the colors of the imagination; and a part, to its contrast with the dull monotony of the prospect to which I had lately been confined, till my heart fluttered, like a caged bird, to be once more among the green trees and the rustling grass—to see fields covered with golden grain, and swelling away in their fine undulations—to scent the pleasant odor of the meadows, and be free to range at will through those leafy forests, which, I began to think, were ill exchanged for the narrow and heaving deck of a forty-four. Thoughts of this kind mingled with my musings, as I leaned over the taffarel, with my eyes bent on the verdant hills and slopes of Spain; and so absorbed was I in contemplation, that I heard not my name pronounced, till it was repeated a second or third time, by the officer of the deck.

"Mr. Transom!" cried he, in a quick and impatient voice, "are you deaf or asleep, sir? Here, jump into the first cutter alongside! Would you keep the Commodore waiting all day for you, sir?"

I felt my cheek redden at this speech of the lieutenant—one of those popinjays who, dressed in a little brief authority, think to show their own consequence by playing off impertinent airs upon those of inferior station. I had seen enough of naval service, however, to know that no good comes of replying to the insolence of a superior; so, suppressing the answer that rose to my lips, I sprang down the side into the boat, in the stern-sheets of which my commander, who had preceded me, was already seated.

"Shove off, sir," said he.

"Let fall! give way!" cried I to the men, who sprang to their oars with alacrity, making the boat skim through the water lightly and fleetly as a swallow through the air. In less than five minutes, we were floating alongside the stone quay at the Water-port—as the principal and strongly fortified entrance to the Garrison from the bay is called.

"You will wait here for me," said the Commodore, as he stepped out of the boat, "and should I not return before the gate is closed, pull round to the Ragged-staff," (the name of the other landing-place,) "and wait there."

"Ay, ay, sir," said I—though not very well pleased at the prospect of a long and tedious piece of service, fatigued as I already was with my vigil of the previous night, and the active duties of the day. The old Commodore in the meanwhile stepped quickly over the drawbridge which connects the quay with the fortress, and presently disappeared under the massive archway of the gate.

For a while, the scene which presented itself at the Water-port was of a kind from which an observant mind could not fail to draw abundant amusement. The quay, beside which our boat was lying, is a small octangular wharf, constructed of huge blocks of granite, strongly cemented together. It is the only place which boats, except those belonging to the Garrison, or national vessels in the harbor, are permitted to approach; and though of but a few yards square in extent, is enfiladed in several directions by frowning batteries of granite, mounted with guns, which by a single discharge might shiver the whole structure to atoms. Merchant vessels lying in the bay are unloaded by means of lighters, which, with the boats of passage continually plying between the shipping and the shore, and the market-boats from the adjacent coast of Spain, all crowd round this narrow quay, rendering it a place of singular business and bustle. As the sun-set hour approaches, the activity and confusion increases. Crowds of people, of all nations, and every variety of costume and language, jostle each other as they hurry through the gate. The stately Greek, in his embroidered jacket, rich purple cap, and flowing capote, strides carelessly along. The Jew, with his bent head, shaven crown, and coarse though not unpicturesque gaberdine, glides with a noiseless step through the crowd, turning, from side to side as he walks, quick wary glances from underneath his downcast brows. The Moor, wrapped close in his white bernoose, stalks sullenly apart, as if he alone had no business in the bustling scene; while the noisy Spaniard by his side wages an obstreperous argument, or shouts in loud guttural sounds for his boat. French, English, and Americans, officers, merchants, and sailors, are all intermingled in the motley mass, each engaged in his own business, and each adding his part to the confused and Babel-like clamor of tongues. High on the walls, the sentinels, with their arms glistening in the sun, are seen walking to and fro on their posts, and looking down with indifference or abstraction on the scene of hurry and turmoil beneath them.

Among the various striking figures that attracted my attention, from time to time, as I reclined in the stern-sheets of the cutter, gazing on the shifting throng before me, there was one whose appearance and manners awakened peculiar interest. He was a tall, muscular, dark-looking Spaniard, whose large frame and strong and well-proportioned limbs were set off to good advantage by the national dress of the peasantry of his country. His sombrero, slouched in a studied manner over his eyes, as if to conceal their fierce rolling balls, shaded a face, the dark sun-burnt hue of which showed that it had not always been so carefully protected. From the crimson sash which was bound round his waist, concealing the connection of his embroidered velvet jacket with his nether garments, a long knife depended; and this, together with a sinister expression of countenance, and an indescribable something in the general air and bearing of the man, created an impression which caused me to shrink involuntarily from him whenever he approached the boat. He himself seemed to be actuated by similar feelings. On first meeting my eye, he drew his sombrero deeper over his brow, and hastily retired to another part of the quay; but every now and then I could see his dark face above a group of the intervening throng, and his keen black eyes seemed always directed towards me, till, perceiving that I noticed him, he would turn away, and mix for a while again among the remotest portion of the crowd.

My eyes were endeavoring to follow this singular figure in one of his windings through the multitude, when my attention was drawn in another direction by a loud long call from a bugle, sounded within the walls, and, in an instant after, repeated with a clearer and louder blast, from their summit. This signal seemed to give new motion and animation to the crowd. A few hurried from the quay into the Garrison, but a greater number poured from the interior upon the quay, and all appeared anxious to depart. Boat after boat was drawn up, received its burden, and darted off, while others took their places, and were in turn soon filled by the retiring crowd. Soldiers from the Garrison appeared upon the quay to urge the tardy into quicker motion; mingled shouts, calls and curses resounded on every side; and for a few minutes confusion seemed worse confounded. But in a short time the last loiterer was hurried away—the last felucca shoved off, and was seen gliding on its course, the sound of its oars almost drowned in the noisy gabble of its Andalusian crew. As soon as the quay became entirely deserted, the military returned within the walls, and a pause of silence ensued—then pealed the sun-set gun from the summit of the rock—the draw-bridge, by some unseen agency, was rolled slowly back, till it disappeared within the arched passage—the ponderous gates turned on their enormous hinges—and Gibraltar was closed for the night with a security which might defy the efforts of the combined world to invade it.

Thus shut out at the Water-port, I directed the boat's crew, in compliance with the orders I had received, to pull round to the Ragged-staff. The wall at this place is of great height, and near its top is left a small gate, at an elevation of fifty or sixty feet above the quay which projects into the bay beneath. It is attained by a spiral stair-case, erected about twenty feet from the wall, and communicating with it at the top by means of a draw-bridge. This gate is little used, except for the egress of those who are permitted to leave the Garrison after nightfall. On reaching the quay, I sprang ashore, and walking to a favorable position, endeavored to amuse myself once more by contemplating the hills and distant mountains of Spain. But the charm was now fled. Night was fast stealing over the landscape, and rendering its features misty and indistinct: a change, too, had taken place in my own feelings, since, a few hours before, I had found so much pleasure in dwelling on the scene around me. I was now cold, fatigued, and hungry; my eyes had been fed with novelties until they were weary with gazing; and my mind crowded with a succession of new images, until its vigor was exhausted. I cast my eyes up to the Rock, but it appeared cold and desolate in the deepening twilight, and I turned from its steep, flinty sides and dreadful precipices, with a shudder. The waves and ripples of the bay, which the increasing evening wind had roughened, broke against the quay where I was standing with a sound that created a chilly sensation at my heart; and even the watch-dog's bark, from on board some vessel in the bay, gave me no pleasure as it was borne faintly to my ear by the eastern breeze; for it was associated with sounds of home, and awakened me to a painful consciousness of the distance I had wandered, and the fatigues and perils to which I was exposed. A train of sombre thoughts, despite my efforts to drive them away, took possession of my mind. At length, yielding to their influence, I climbed to the top of a rude heap of stones, which had been piled on the end of the quay, and seating myself where my eye could embrace every portion of the shadowy landscape, I yielded the full rein to melancholy fancies. My wandering thoughts roamed over a thousand topics; but one topic predominated over all the rest. My memory recalled many images; but one image it presented with the vividness of life, and dwelt upon with the partiality of love. It was the image of one who had been the object of my childhood's love, whom I had loved in boyhood, and whom now, in opening manhood, I still loved with a passionate and daily increasing affection. Linked with the memory of that sweet being, came thoughts of one who had sought to rival me in her affections, and who, foiled in his purposes, had conceived and avowed the bitterest enmity to me:—and from him, my mind reverted, by some strange association, to the tall and singular-looking Spaniard whom I had seen at the Water-port. In this way my vagrant thoughts ranged about from topic to topic, with all that wildness of transition which is sometimes produced by the excitement of opium.

While thus engaged in these desultory meditations, I know not how long a time slipped by; but at length my thoughts began to grow less distinct, and my eyes to feel heavy; and had I not been restrained by a sense of shame and duty as an officer, I should have been glad to resign myself to sleep. My eyelids, in despite of me, did once or twice close for an instant or two; and it was in an effort to arouse myself from one of these little attacks of somnolency, that I saw an object before me the appearance of whom in that place struck me with surprise. The moon had risen, and was just shedding a thin and feeble glimmer over the top of the Rock, the broad deep shadow of which extended almost to the spot where I was sitting. Emerging from this shadow, with his long peculiar step, I saw approaching me the identical Spaniard whose malign expression of countenance and general appearance had so strongly attracted my attention at the Water-port. That it was the same I could not doubt, for his height, his dress, his air, all corresponded exactly. He still wore the same large sombrero, which, as before, was drawn deep over his brows; the same long and glistening knife was thrust through his sash, and the same fantastically stamped leather gaiters covered his legs. He approached close to me, and in a voice, which, though hardly above a whisper, thrilled me to the bone, informed me that the Commodore had sent for me, on delivering which laconic message, he turned away, and walked towards the Garrison. Shall I own it, gentle reader? I felt a sensation of fear at the idea that I was to follow this herculean and sinister-looking Spaniard, and I had some faint misgivings whether I ought to obey his summons. But I reflected that he was probably a servant or messenger of some officer or family where the Commodore was visiting; that he could have no motive to mislead me; and that, were I to neglect obeying the order through fear of its bearer, because he was tall, had whiskers, and wore a sombrero, I should deservedly bring down upon myself the ridicule of every midshipman in the Mediterranean. Besides, thought I, how foolish I should feel, if it should turn out, as is very likely, that this is some ball or party to which the Commodore has been urged to stay, and, unwilling to keep me waiting for him so long in this dreary place, he has sent to invite me to join him. This last reflection turned the scale, so slipping down from my perch, I followed towards the gate. The tall dark form of the stranger had already disappeared in the shadow of the Rock; but on reaching the foot of the spiral stair-case I could hear his heavy tread ascending the steps. Directly after, the gate was unbarred, the draw-bridge lowered, and a footstep crossing it announced that the Spaniard was within the walls. I followed as rapidly as I could, and got within the gate just in time to see the form of my conductor disappear round one of the angles of the fortifications; but accelerating my pace, I overtook him as he reached the foot of a path which seemed to ascend towards the southern end of the Rock.

"This way lies the town," said I, pointing in the opposite direction; "you surely have mistaken the route."

The Spaniard made no answer, but pointing with his hand up the narrow and difficult path, and beckoning me to follow him, he began the ascent. The moon shone on his countenance for a moment as he turned towards me, and I thought I could perceive the same sinister expression upon it which had been one of the first things that drew my attention to him. I continued to follow, however, and struggled hard to overtake him; but without much effect. I became fatigued, exhausted, almost ready to drop, but was unable to diminish the interval between us. The ascent soon became very steep—so steep, indeed, that it was with the greatest difficulty I could keep from sliding back faster than I advanced. My feet were blistered, and I toiled along on my hands and knees, till my flesh was torn and penetrated with the sharp points and edges of the rock. After thus slowly and painfully groping my way for a considerable distance, we at length reached a place where the path pursued a level course—but what a path! what a place! A narrow ledge, scarce two feet wide, had been formed, partly by nature, partly by art, at the height of a thousand feet above the water, around a sweep of the rock where it rose perpendicularly from its base to its extreme summit. This ledge was covered with loose stones, which, at every footstep, fell rattling and thundering down the mighty precipice, till the sound died away in the immense depths below. I could not conjecture whether the Spaniard was leading me; but I had now gone too far to think of retreating. Every step I now made was at the hazard of life. The ledge on which we were walking was so narrow, the loose stones which covered it rolled so easily from under our feet, and my knees trembled so violently from fear and fatigue, that I could scarcely hope to continue much further in safety over such a pathway. At last we reached a broader spot. I sunk down exhausted, yet with a feeling of joy that I had escaped from the perilous path I had just been treading. The Spaniard stood beside me, and I thought a malignant smile played round his lips as he looked down upon me, panting at his feet. He suffered me to rest but for a moment, when he motioned me to rise. I obeyed the signal, as if it were the behest of my evil genius.

"Look round you," said he, "and tell me what you behold?"

I glanced my eyes round, and shuddering withdrew them instantly from the fearful prospect. The ledge or platform on which we were standing was but a few feet square; behind it a large and gloomy cavern opened its black jaws; and in front, the rock rose from the sea with so perpendicular an ascent, that a stone, dropped from its edge, would have fallen without interruption straight down into the waves.

"Are you ready to make the leap?" said the Spaniard, in a smooth, sneering tone, seeing, and seeming to enjoy, the terror depicted on my countenance.

"For heaven's sake," cried I, "who are you, and why am I made your victim?"

"Look!" cried he, throwing the sombrero from his head, and approaching close to me, "look! know you not these features? They are those of one whose path you have crossed once, but shall never cross again!"

He seized hold of me as he spoke, with a fiendish grasp, and strove to hurl me headlong from the rock. I struggled with all the energy of desperation, and for a moment baffled the design. He released his hold round my body, and stepping back, stood for an instant gazing on me with the glaring eyeballs of a tiger about to spring upon its prey; then darting towards me, he grasped me with both hands round the throat, and dragged me, despite my vain struggling, to the very verge of the precipice. With a powerful exertion of strength, which I was no longer able to resist, he dashed my body over its dreadful edge, and held me out at arm's length above the dread abyss. The agony of years of wretchedness compressed into a single second, could not have exceeded the horror of the moment I remained so suspended. There was a small tree or bush which grew out of a cleft just beneath the ledge. In my frenzied struggle, I caught by a branch of it, just at the critical instant when the Spaniard relaxed his hold, intending to precipitate me down the fearful gulf. His purpose was again baffled for another moment of horror. He gnashed his teeth as he saw me swing off upon the fragile branch, which cracked and bent beneath my weight, and which, at most, could save me from his fury but for a fleeting moment. That moment seemed too long for his impatient hate. He sprang to the very verge of the ledge, and placing his foot firmly on the tree, pressed it down with all his strength. In vain, with chattering teeth and horror-choked voice, I implored him to desist. He answered not, but stamped furiously on the tree. The root began to give way—the loosened dirt fell from around it—the trunk snapped, cracked, and separated—and the fiend set up an inhuman laugh, which rung in my ears like the mocking of a demon, as down—down—down I fell, through the chill, thick, pitchy air, till striking with a mighty force on the rocks beneath—I waked, and lo, it was a dream!

It was broad daylight. In my sleep I had rolled from the heap of stones which had furnished me with my evening seat of meditation, and which, during my sleep, had supplied my imagination with an abundance of materials for horrid precipices and "deep-down gulfs." The laugh of the infernal Spaniard turned out to be only a burst of innocent merriment at my plight from little Paul Messenger, a rosy, curly-haired midshipman, and one of the finest little fellows in the world. The matter was soon explained. The Commodore, returning to the boat, and seeing me, as he expressed it, sleeping so comfortably on a bed of my own choosing, thought it would be a pity to disturb me; so shoving off, he left me to my slumbers; but on reaching the ship, gave the officer of the deck directions to send a boat for me at daylight. Little Paul, always ready to do a kind act, asked to go officer of her; and we returned together to the frigate, laughing over my story of the imaginary adventures of the night.

PHILADELPHIA.—Just at this season, the beginning of November, the city from which I date is the pleasantest in this country. The climate is perfect. It is just between the chilliness of the east and the prolonged summer of the south. The principal streets, too, run from east to west, and consequently you can choose between sun and shade at any hour of the day—no trifling circumstance to those who breathe delicately. He who has broiled in Broadway in fashionable hours, or like Sancho Panza, "heard his brains frying in his skull," in the Washington-street of Boston, will know how to appreciate the forethought of William Penn.

And, speaking of that, it is a little singular how it has proved the best policy of this eventful city to follow the minutest points even of the original founder's design. No institution of his establishment has fallen through. No street has been cut, and almost no appropriation of land made which the worthy old patriarch had not foreseen and projected. It is a great pity that the only exception to this remark should be such an important one. The bank of the river was laid out originally for a broad and spacious quay; in the thrift of his less liberal descendants, however, it had been built over; and instead of a fine broad terrace, covered with merchandise, you see only unsightly buildings and crowded narrow piers, the whole bearing an impression of confusion and want of room, not at all in keeping with the beautiful order and spaciousness of the rest of the city. It should appease the shade of the sturdy quaker, however, that it is so universally regretted; and if he is permitted to walk the handsome streets built after his judicious landmarks, and witness the happy result of his wise contrivance both for use and beauty, he needs little of the quiet philosophy of his sect, I should think, to reconcile him to his proportion of ghostly vexation.

Philadelphia is a city to be happy in. At any rate, he who has no internal uneasiness need not be annoyed by anything external. Delightful cleanliness every where meets his eye. The sidewalks are washed constantly; the marble steps are spotlessly neat; the wealthy dress handsomely, of course, and drive well-appointed and compact equipages; and the poor are quakers, or in the hands of quakers, and have not, in a single instance, as far as I have seen, the look of dirty and squalid wretchedness so common and obtrusive in New-York. Every thing that meets the eye is well conditioned and well cared for. If any fault could be found, it would be that of too much regularity and too nice precision. There is such a verisimilitude about the houses and streets, that one is puzzled to remember where he has been. I have frequently regretted the want of that individuality of taste so peculiar to Boston, where every house has a character of its own, and every street is so unlike its neighbors, that there is little danger of confounding them.

BALTIMORE.—I feel as if I had scarce a right to speak of this flourishing city, having been here but half a day, and leaving it almost immediately. I have seen its principal buildings, however, and it is not necessary to know the people, that one should have been here, for its better classes are to be met every where at the north during the summer months, and I have beheld most of its beauty and talent under the pleasant circumstances and in the genial humor of travel. The consequence is a strong attachment to them as a people, and a conviction that their character, like their meridian, unites the excellencies of north and south, without the salient faults of either. There is no place, probably, where a stranger would be more cordially welcomed and generously entertained; and the style of living I have always heard, and have partly seen, is princely. The town itself is like Boston in many of its features. Its cathedral and churches are celebrated for their beauty. I regret not a little the driving haste with which I am compelled to pass it, both now and when I return.

WASHINGTON.—Here, too, I can give but a day to objects of curiosity, which might employ me much longer to the greatest advantage. The capitol surprised me agreeably. It is truly a magnificent structure, and evident as its faults are, I do not believe the most critical observer could see it for the first time without admiration. The dome is too heavy, or the pillars of the façades are too slight; but the side view from the Potomac does not present even this fault, and the effect is highly imposing. The house of representatives is the most beautiful room by far in this country. The pillars of native brexia are splendid, and the whole architecture seems, to my unpractised eye at least, perfect. I visited the president's house also, and was honored by an introduction to General Jackson. He had just recovered from a severe attack of the intermittent fever. He sat with his family reading when we entered, and though paler than usual, I was struck with the fidelity of the common portraits I have seen of him. Alexander's, I think, however, is far the best, and his reflection in the mirror is not more like him. He rose with a dignified courtesy to receive us, and conversed freely and agreeably. I left him with a decided impression in his favor. His whole appearance is imposing and in the highest degree gentlemanly and prepossessing. I dislike and disapprove of his administration; but, if his face is an index of his character, General Jackson himself is both an upright and a fearless man. I shall ever entertain the high personal respect for him with which this interview has inspired me. He remarked, by the way, that he had been some time intending a visit to the northern states, but should not compass it till the next year. I hope, in such an event, that no party feeling will interfere with his reception, that he will be treated with the universal distinction to which his services to the country and his private worth, quite apart from his office, fully entitle him.

I visited Mount Vernon yesterday. This, of course, is the most interesting pilgrimage that can be made by an American. We took the steam-boat down the Potomac to Alexandria, thence pursued its banks seven miles to our destination. This celebrated spot has been described often, and I have no time, if it were worth while, to describe it minutely again. The estate is the most superb gem of natural scenery, I do not hesitate to say, in this country. It stands on a terraced bank of the Potomac, eighty or a hundred feet above the water, overlooking that majestic river for a great distance, and commanding from the front piazza its boldest bend towards the sea. All this fine natural beauty is a proper preparative for the associations of the place; and after gazing at the scene till my mind was elevated and calmed, I followed the decrepid old family servant, who had served Washington himself forty years, to his master's tomb. It is an humble place enough—a mere mound, with a brick front and a plain slab of marble inscribed with the name of WASHINGTON—but no man could stand before it without emotion. My heart swelled and my eyes filled with tears. I stood by the side of his old white-headed servant, I know not how long, gazing upon the iron door, without the power or the disposition to ask a question. I came away, after breaking a branch from one of the cedars that grow over the spot—sure that wherever I might tread amid the relics of human greatness, I should find nothing which would move me so much, nothing which had about it associations of such moral sublimity, as the unadorned and humble tomb of Washington.

And now, my dear M—s and F—y, farewell for a while. My travels on this side of the water are ended for the present—I trust for the present only. Breaking many a pleasant tie, and tearing myself from every association of my life, I embark for a foreign land to-morrow. You shall hear from me next when I have set foot in "the garden of the world."

FAMILY TROUBLES.

Let us no more contend, nor blame
Each other, blamed enough elsewhere; but strive
In offices of love, how we may lighten
Each other's burden in our share of woe.—Milton.

SOME time ago I spent an evening at the house of a friend, who seemed to me singularly blessed with rational happiness. Nature has given him health, a fine mind, and an unceasing flow of spirits; and fortune, as if unwilling to be outdone in liberality, has added reputation, affluence, an affectionate wife, and lovely children. I never saw such faces as greet this excellent man every evening on his return to his dwelling. His habits are domestic. He takes an amiable pleasure in adding comforts and embellishments to his home, to make it the centre of attraction to his family. I have often been secretly and silently touched with admiration to see him prepare beautiful surprises for them; filling the bosoms of his sweet children with innocent rapture, and planning sly artifices to gratify and delight their mother, so that his approach is the signal for a general joy. How noble a gratification he must realize in knowing that he brings cheerfulness with him wherever he comes, and that several tender and virtuous beings feel their hearts leap at the sound of his voice. No more soothing and pretty a scene can be fancied than his parlor, when the evening closes in, and the children have learned their lessons for the next day's school, and the mother and daughters are seated at their work, and the door opens and presents the noble form and lighted countenance of this generous husband and father, with a choice book, or a rare picture, or something entertaining or instructive in his hand. I think this man is a true disciple of the Epicurean philosophy, and renders pleasure subservient to virtue and ultimate happiness. Among other accomplishments which shed a charm about the good-natured scene is music, in which he has himself marked taste. His eldest daughter has learned the science with great success. She is a lovely blooming girl of seventeen, and has taught her little sisters to sing and play several sweet melodies with grace and feeling. I sat in a shady part of the room the other evening, and I believe the whole party forgot my presence. The elder girl went to the piano, and ran over the accompaniment to an air of unusual tenderness. The father breathed a low sweet second on the flute, and the others raised their girlish voices in the blended harmony. A bright boy's face peeped over his sister's chair, and raised his soft eyes to hers, as if then, for the first time, touched with the power of music; and the mother, a glow of quiet delight spread over her features, in which I could trace a subdued resemblance to the vivid and beaming beauty of her children, paused from her sewing and listened.

I was particularly pleased with the kind manner in which this agreeable family transacted trivial circumstances and conversations with each other. If any thing was wrong in the performances of the little ones, the sister corrected it in a persuasive voice. The mother's rebuke was gentleness itself, and yet instantly attempted to, and the children together were affectionate and social. Perhaps my admiration may have drawn me into rather an elaborate description of what may not be deemed of importance to all my readers, although I know there must be some willing to leave for a moment the loftier events of the world, to muse upon this humble picture, just as a traveller among stupendous bridges, artificial roads, and gaudy palaces will sometimes pause by a cottage, in a secluded pathway, with nothing to recommend it but the simple beauty of peace and nature.

After a few hours spent in this manner, I retired to my silent room, musing upon the contrast presented by the lives of this tranquil society and my own. One of the sweetest rewards of social endearments springs from the fact that the same participation of those we love which enhances our joys, also alleviates our sorrows. In the atmosphere of an affectionate home, therefore, the keen arrows of the world are blunted, while the flowers which would, peradventure, elsewhere fade away neglected, here bloom with more vivid beauty, none of their fragrance wasted, or their delicate colors overlooked. As for me, when I withdraw from the merry circle or turn from the gay and crowded streets, I seem to shut myself up in a kind of tomb. There are no connecting links between me and the world. No light step breaks the perpetual stillness. No familiar voice sends its welcome thrill through my veins, banishing weariness and gloom. The pleasant thoughts which flash on me from my book are like gems found in the desert by a lonely pilgrim.

This is a subject which, however common-place, is nevertheless materially connected with the comfort of mankind. You may, in a measure, estimate a man's happiness by his degree of contentment in his family; and I fear the gentle beings in whose society I had been beguiling the evening hours are an unusual instance of peace and harmony. You may find in many an apparent resemblance, but good breeding and pride often smooth over the surface, while indifference, or jealousy, or hatred lurk like monsters beneath. Real domestic bliss requires such a combination of favorable circumstances as to render its existence almost impossible. That several persons should be amiable, intelligent, good-humored, and of an affectionate disposition, is not wonderful, but that all the members of a household should be so, cannot very frequently be the case. A single individual often spoils the peace of a whole family. How frequently I have seen a sweet circle gathered around the winter fire, the native liveliness of the pretty children breaking out innocently, and their conversation and actions such as in youth are natural and graceful, and all this sunshiny scene in a moment overclouded by the entrance of a scolding mother or an austere and tyrannical father; or intruded upon by the dark countenance and bitter discontent of some of those who are never happy themselves unless they are making every one around them miserable. Such a being in my eye is a criminal. The world is so thronged with dangers and disturbances, and so full of anguish and melancholy, that when I behold any group seemingly forgetting the general wretchedness, and surrendering their souls to pure merriment and contentment, I pause to contemplate it as something rare and beautiful; and I look upon him who ruthlessly destroys that of which mortals have so little, as an enemy to his fellow-creatures.

What would such a person think if, doomed to travel over a parched desert, some enemy should ruin the spring of cool water just as he was kneeling to drink. To many, life is this desert, and few are their fountains of happiness, and how cruel it is to sully those precious moments with unnecessary austerity or ill nature. When old age preaches to youth, let it reflect whether it does not itself sometimes fall into error. I have seen a lovely child suffer punishment simply because it did not act as if it were forty, and parents displaying the most pernicious example to their offspring by cross glances, cutting sarcasms, and open reproaches. I once knew a mistaken father who on certain days of the week would not permit his children to utter a single word. It was a painful sight to behold their eyes, from which nature strove to shoot out the lustre of sprightliness and unshadowed innocence, casting down their pretty orbs with a forced seriousness more proper to broken health, withered hopes, and troubled age; and ever and anon, by a furtive look, contradicting the artificial gravity of their innocent sweet mouths, where smiles were as natural as fragrance to flowers. It reminded me of some free wild bird forced from the forest, and compelled to sit all day in a narrow close cage. Yet even he is not demanded to hold his little wings motionless, cast down his bright eyes, and hush the warblings that gush up in his throat. Do not fathers know that, if their own hearts cannot persuade them, it is their best policy to possess themselves of the affections of their children? However pure and full of love may be their young hearts, they cannot be insensible to the distinction between happiness and misery; and what a reflection for a dying father, that he leaves behind him beings who, when he is in the grave, will only for the first time begin to enjoy the blessing of existence!

THE SOLITARY AND SENSITIVE MAN.

Solitude afflicts a man with certain troublesome peculiarities. I have had so little traffic with my fellow-creatures that I am destitute of numerous little pieces of knowledge requisite in all who would mingle with them without being ridiculous. The manner in which these awkward eccentricities multiply and strengthen upon me, occasions me some alarm. There are a thousand petty local circumstances of which I am totally ignorant, and persons suddenly shot up into popularity whose names I have never heard. A gentleman from London the other day asked me, in the presence of several red-hot politicians, on what day the election commenced. On confessing my inability to enlighten him, the company, among whom was a distinguished patriot on a small scale, who frequents ward meetings, and even came within an ace of being nominated for assistant alderman, regarded me with such a wondering air, and such an ill-disguised effort to smother their amusement, that if I had been the man skeleton, or a calf with two heads, or any other lusus nature, they could not have been more struck. A lively young girl, to whom I was accidentally introduced at a friend's, after chatting for ten minutes about the weather, Mr. Anderson, and Mr. Bulwer, turned upon me suddenly, and inquired if I thought Miss Thompson pretty? I suppose I colored a little to acknowledge that I had never seen her, upon which the complaisance of my charming companion fell like the mercury in a thermometer suddenly dropped into cold water; and though she was very civil, and all that, during my brief subsequent stay, I could easily perceive she thought what the next day I am told she said, that I might be mighty clever, but I had an odd way of showing it. These defects creep upon one with an insensible progress, but are very stubborn when once established, and the consciousness of them perhaps makes a decent fellow appear worse than he is, and at length banishes him from society altogether. I must also add, as another important failing natural to good people, who are not active men of the world, the difficulty I find in becoming acquainted with those ladies and gentlemen whom one meets with indiscriminately in parlors, and the embarrassment which prevents me from taking a polite and easy share in the conversation. Love of solitude contracts such stiff and unfashionable ways, that one will sit like a ghost in the midst of a merry circle, till he is absolutely afraid of the sound of his own voice. Even all the precepts of my philosophy have not prevented my being touched with these trivial diseases, and I was mortified almost to death, after having played the part of a dumb gentleman at the house of a well-bred and elegant lady, to overhear a witty belle, about whom I had indulged my own thoughts for fifteen minutes, whisper to an empty-headed coxcomb, whose tongue was a perpetual motion, "that my conversational powers were amazing, but it was kept a great secret!" I am also haunted with a terrible propensity to look straight into the fire through which my imagination escapes to other regions. The falling down of the coals has in this way often disturbed agreeable, or put to flight unpleasant reflections; and I some time since had arranged in my mind two-thirds of one of these very numbers, and was congratulating myself upon having grasped an idea of unusual size, when a servant emptied the coal-scuttle upon the grate, and I was awakened just in time to hear a general laugh, and to answer to an interrogatory from a good-natured girl, who assured me she was then preferring it for the fifth time.

My lonely way of life not only makes me absurd in company, but troubles me with a nervous sensitiveness even when I am withdrawn from it; and when I retire to my books I like to be silent and alone. Every noise disturbs me. I cannot write without being cut off, and perfectly isolated from every body and every thing about me. A walk around the corner, or humming a tune, or the promiscuous chat of a friend, breaks up the current of my reflections, and I am well off if I can afterwards compel them to flow on as before. This very article was nearly ruined after the first paragraph by the carelessness of a fellow who placed a pair of right and left boots before me, with their relative position reversed. My wayward and too much indulged fancy would not stir an inch till I located them properly. I wish, when inclined to study, that I could bury myself for a time in a dungeon, separated from the alightest trace of a human being. You must excuse my complaints upon this subject, as my sufferings are excessive, although I have, as far as possible, immured myself from the world, and even retired into a high apartment, in whose shaded light I strive to be alone. Yet fortune pursues me with unrelenting cruelty. A small family haunt the adjoining room. The boys come there and drum on the door, whistle tunes, and quarrel. The lady has an infant daughter, whom she is instructing in the rudiments of music. It sets my teeth on an edge. The bare recollection gives me fears of the lockjaw. I paid the landlord his rent, and took a small apartment up town, in a house where there were no families, no boys, nor babies learning music; but I was driven thence by a negro girl, who sweeps the house with a red handkerchief twisted round her head, and squalls "I'd be a butterfly!"

LITERARY NOTICES.

Address delivered before the American Institute of the City of New-York, at their Fourth Annual Fair, October 14th, 1831, by Edward Everett. New-York: Van Norden & Mason. 1831.

This is a plain matter-of-fact, but ably drawn speech, in which, considering the character of Mr. Everett's auditory, there is rather less fancy and more political economy than we expected. Perhaps our simplicity induced us to anticipate something abstract and moral, rather than political, although we were dull not to perceive what a tempting opportunity the occasion offered of debating the dazzling question which now agitates the nation, from Maine to Mexico. It only discloses to us, in a new instance, how thoroughly we are all imbued with the spirit of political discussion. The daily journals teem with it. Private circles grow angry on it. The host of your hotel, as he lays open the turkey at dinner, mingles up his little colloquial details with talk about the Liverpool prices and the New-York prices, and the duty on raw cotton. There is no escaping from it. We can scarcely take up a novel, or listen to a lecture on chemistry, without being swindled into a dose upon the tariff or the Indian claims, and thus the ardor of proselytism lurks under every disguise. It must be confessed that Mr. Everett has done the subject ample justice. The address is characterized by a smooth perspicuity, which marks the gentleman and the scholar; and, if so common-place and hacknied a theme could ever be rendered attractive to a mixed audience, comprised in a great measure of females—we are not surprised at its becoming so in the hands of this elegant and chaste writer. Under the pretence of sketching a history of the mechanic and manufacturing industry of the country, before and since the revolution, we have an ingenious, and indeed powerful defence of the orator's political principles, which is also intended to be a keen rebuke to the southern malcontents.

Among several other similar estimates, he mentions that the annual manufacture of hats in the United States, amounts to thirteen millions of dollars; and that of boots and shoes to twenty-six millions; making the amount of hats equal to more than half the export of cotton, to twice the rice and tobacco, and twice the amount of the sugar crop. It is curious, if true, as Mr. Huskisson stated, and Mr. Everett sanctions, that the causes of our revolution are not to be found in the measures subsequent to Mr. Grenville's plan of taxation, but in the discontent of the colonies at the tendency of the British administration to put down every appearance of domestic manufacture. The facts here cited are interesting. The house of commons, in consequence of a report by the board of trade and plantations respecting manufactures set up, or trade carried on in the colonies, detrimental to the trade, navigation, and manufactures of Great Britain, passed a law forbidding hats or felt to be exported from the colonies, or even "to be loaded on a horse, cart, or other carriage, for transportation from one plantation to another." In 1750 an act was passed which the speaker justly enough terms disgraceful to the legislation of any civilized country, prohibiting "the erection or continuance of any mill or other engine for slitting or rolling iron, or any plating forge to work with a tilt hammer, or any furnace for making steel in the colonies, under penalty of two hundred pounds;" and every such mill, engine, forge, or furnace, was declared a common nuisance. But we must refer the reader to the details presented by Mr. Everett himself, without examining either their historical or political orthodoxy. For we disclaim all political adjudication between the parties, and profess to look upon the pamphlet only as a literary composition. As such it shows the marks of a skilful hand, and, bating a little elegant ranting towards the end, it will be much admired.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1831.

TO THE SUBSCRIBERS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

We have the pleasure of informing our friends that, in pursuance of a long contemplated design, Mr. WILLIS, our associate editor, has sailed upon an enterprise connected solely with the NEW-YORK MIRROR. We have felt that nothing would be more acceptable to our readers than the FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF FOREIGN SCENES upon a mind with whose peculiar character they were familiar. It is Mr. Willis's intention to remain a considerable time in Italy, and transmit to us his observations, taken freshly from the scenes about him. We think him well qualified for the task he has undertaken, and have little doubt that he will be entirely successful in rendering this novel department in a high degree interesting. A month or two will necessarily elapse before we can hear from him, during which time we beg the indulgence of our readers.

GEORGE P. MORRIS.
THEODORE S. FAY.

The present number.—Two of the steel plates promised in the prospectus are this week presented. As neither care nor expense has been withheld, they may be offered as among the best the country can furnish. The vignette, which properly belongs to the first number of the volume, has been delayed at the request of Mr. Durand, that he might finish it to his entire satisfaction. It was designed and painted by Weir. The view of Wall-street was copied by Weir also, from an old picture, and was executed by Hatch and Smillie. The subject was selected in conformity to our plan of illustrating the antiquities, as well as the present state of our city, so rich in reminiscences. The costume is admirably well preserved. The literary contents are from a variety of contributors, too well appreciated by the public to require commendations on our part. We have only to add, that our exertions to render the Mirror generally interesting, will continue to be unremitting; and we solicit attention to the work with the hope that it may not be found unworthy of encouragement.

Editor's study.—A crowd has been all this afternoon collected before St. Paul's church, attracted by an immense solid obelisk thirty feet in length, upon a pedestal seven and a half feet square. On inquiring of a by-stander, we were informed it was a monument to be erected in St. Paul's, to the memory of the late Thomas Addis Emmet. We were struck with this preparation to signalize the dead in the midst of so busy a crowd of the living, who were looking on and passing away to their respective vocations with such a mixture of carelessness and curiosity. Neither did we omit to notice the coincidence, however trifling, of this column, thus rising to the honor of the departed, in full view of the white hall in which we have so often heard his eager and eloquent words, and gazed with respect upon his fine classic head and venerable form. The tones of his voice were familiar to our ears, and we could scarcely even yet realize that this proud marble was a tribute to one gone from among us forever. We remember to have once heard this gifted advocate under very interesting and imposing circumstances. A pure-hearted and excellent old man had been ruined in all his prospects by slander of the blackest die. His family had been rendered wretched and degraded. He had been himself expelled from the church with dishonor. His aged mother had actually died of grief and shame, and his own gray hairs were nearly brought down in sorrow to the grave. The inventor and circulator of all these calumnies was a powerfully formed immense dark-looking man, who had sworn his destruction, and came near accomplishing his oath. His victim had shrunk from a public exposure, as it involved family secrets of a sacred nature, and had gone to his persecutor with streaming eyes and tremulous voice, and besought him to recall the dreadful assertions, and spare him the necessity, the anguish, of appealing to a public tribunal of justice. These solicitations were repulsed with bitter scorn, and the unhappy old man saw himself, although sinking in the very shadow of the grave, compelled to plunge into the whirl and clash of an exciting law-suit. He was the more led on to this from the idea that the defendant, when convinced of his resolution to resort to a legal examination of the affair, would yield him an apology. So far from doing so, however, was he, that he placed upon record, as the phrase is, all his charges, and announced his determination and power to prove their truth. The old man was struck with horror, and his friends with amazement and doubt. What might not be accomplished by so desperate a foe? What dark and fatal scheme must he not have engendered, that he thus confidently advanced to the conflict? What might not hatred, backed by gold, have effected? What crowds of bad and licentious men, ever to be found in populous cities, might not have been summoned—for there are such who would commit perjury for hire as carelessly as look in the face of the blue heaven? We were witness to the fear and agony of the plaintiff when the day of trial arrived. He was amiable and sensitive, and recoiled from the approaching developments. He entreated that the action might be withdrawn. He said he was a wretched and a ruined man. He would fly to some distant country, and spend the brief remnant of his life in obscurity and shame. We heard also the calm, encouraging voice of his counsel, cheering up his drooping hopes, and breathing balm into his wounded soul. The testimony was a mass of chaos. At the close of it the court appeared embarrassed and the jury bewildered. Only a powerful, gigantic, and practical mind could grasp it in all its ramifications, separate the improbable and inconsistent from the rest, and so arrange it as to demonstrate the simple truth. It was twelve at night when, after several days' investigation, it became the duty of Mr. Emmet to sum up. The trial had excited a general sensation. The very hall before the court-room was crowded, and in the apartment itself such a throng had gained entrance that the long windows, the embrasures, the columns, and indeed every object where a human foot could brace itself or a hand cling, was occupied. It was a thrilling picture in the depth of that night within the walls of the high chamber. The judges on their benches—the jury—the lawyers ranged around in various attitudes, all expressive of interest and anxiety—the dense mass of beings among whom ran the murmur of anxious expectation, the despairing and half broken-hearted form of the plaintiff, his care-worn forehead and few white hairs, the calm figure of the orator rising in the midst, with his time-stricken head; and, with his elbow leaning on the table and his chin upon his clenched fist, the defendant—his mouth half curled into a triumphant and audacious smile—his eyes lighted up under their black brows—and his savage countenance turned boldly upon the face of that fine old man, as if striving to abash or intimidate him from the performance of his duty. The presumptuous traitor little dreamed of the thunders that slept in his peaceful breast, or thought how near was the moment when that mild voice, whose gentleness had made him bold, should fall on his ear and his soul like burning fire, and make him writhe as if beneath the lash of a fury.

After a moment's pause, during which the lowest breath seemed to have been hushed, so unbroken was the silence, the object of our remarks entered upon the examination of the evidence. It was his way to first review the testimony dispassionately and logically, without any appeal to the feelings of the jury, till, by an ingenious course of reasoning he had demonstrated his point. As he reached this crisis the scornful self-possession of the defendant gradually deepened into a scowl of bitter and desperate hate and defiance—hate of his foe, and of the being who was with the hand of a Titan hurling back upon his head the mountains of obloquy he had heaped on the plaintiff, and defiance of the court and the jury, and all the world—of the present and the future. When the speaker had made the innocence of his client—not only his innocence, but his benevolence and his virtue, shine out to the understanding of all present with a noonday clearness, he turned to the savage face which was fiercely glaring upon him, and changing his course, like a hawk when he leaves the clouds to dart upon his prey, he seized on his character and conduct, and held it up to the public deprecation in all the naked hideousness of cruelty, treachery, and guilt. We never have beheld the splendid triumph of intellect over physical ferocity so illustrated. The nerve appeared to desert the features of the conquered slanderer. He seemed struggling to escape from the lightnings that were falling upon him like "death shots thick and fast," and, after a futile attempt to rise, as if to revenge himself by personal violence, he sank back into his seat, and, bending down his head, hid his abashed and blighted forehead in darkness and shame. The effect was tremendous. The damages of the jury were only limited by the pecuniary means of the defendant, and the plaintiff, who had entered the room in the evening a shunned being, sinking beneath a blackened fame, went forth with the halo of innocence beaming around his brow.

This scene was called up vividly in our memory by the sight of the column, upon the completion of which we cannot but congratulate a city, boasting of so few similar embellishments. It was quarried and finished by Messrs. Francis and James Kane, for the sum of six thousand dollars. We are informed that it would have been yet more expensive if a larger piece of solid stone could have been procured.

We are interrupted by a rush of people through the street, and the approach of the volunteer companies of the "Indescribables." Our distant readers must be informed that a large number of citizens have long cherished a dissatisfaction against the militia system; and, in order to bring it into disrepute, planned a parade with every contrivance calculated to render it ridiculous. And here they are—and such a medley of grotesque and monstrous shapes, we have never seen even in a feverish dream. Some Turks, and some Persians. Here is one in the disguise of an Amazonian, and there a hero that struts like Von Poffenburgh, in Knickerbocker, with a chapeau bras a yard square, and looking as if he could "knock down an ox with his fist, and pick his teeth with its horns." They put us in mind of a set of common men seen through a prism. Whiskers, mustachios, and red noses, appear to be the favorite species of embellishment. Bardolf, Pistol, and Bombastes Furioso, meet us at every glance. On one of their banners is inscribed, "Soldiers in peace—citizens in war." A sturdy hero has slung over his shoulder a dead racoon with the motto, "We came—we saw—we conquered;" and another carries an unfortunate little pig, and on his immense hat is chalked, "We have met the enemy and they are ours."—Negroes were whitewashed, and the white men painted various colors, but all behaved with order and the most ludicrous gravity. A large crowd honored this display with signs of approbation. A great difference of opinion exists respecting the propriety of this method of proceeding on the part of our young men. They themselves assert that it is their only means of expressing their sentiments upon a subject nearly connected with their interest, and attracting towards it the general attention of the people and legislature of the state. If we understand their objections, they arise, not solely from the idea that the system is burdensome, but that it is also unequal, as several classes of society are exempt from duty, which falls heavily upon the poor laborers. The fantastic parade has attracted general notice, and excited a great deal of mirth. It may at all events lead to a dispassionate examination of the militia question, and perhaps a modification more agreeable to all parties.

ARIETTA,

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

LINES TO A YOUNG FRIEND.

YOUNG in heart, of spirit free,
Life is opening bright to thee,
And no cloud of care is drawn
O'er its morning's purple dawn;
While for thee the fairy, hope,
Strews with flowers the future's slope,
And thy parents' hearts intent,
Watch thy youth's development.
Therefore, in thy favor'd prime
Hoard each fleeting gem of time;
Pluck from knowledge every flower,
Talk with wisdom hour by hour;
That thy after years may be
Bright as hope now offers thee,
And the name thy manhood bears
Rich repay thy parents' cares.

INTELLECTUAL EQUALITY IN THE SEXES.—This is a doctrine of modern date; and like many others of the present age, is much more talked of than understood. The fact is, we believe, that all the difference of opinion which exists on this subject, arises from forgetting, or not knowing, that there are, in every thing, discrete as well as continuous degrees. Light and heat may be, and doubtless are, equally perfect in themselves, and equally capable of fulfilling the purposes of their creation. So are eagles and doves, oaks and cedars, air and water, and so on ad infinitum. Take, for instance, those two well known faculties of the human mind—the understanding and the will, or thought and affection. They may be equal in perfection—the one may be elevated to the wisdom of an angel, the other to a seraphic fervor—yet, still, the original distinction exists, and must exist to eternity. Thus it is with the sexes. I have never yet seen a little boy evince the slightest inclination to nurse a doll, or deck himself with gaudy ribbons, though constantly surrounded by sisters who, at a similar age, seldom display an inclination for any other amusements. The immortal Milton thought as we do on this head, when he wrote the following lines on the first pair:

"Though both,
Not equal, as their sex not equal seemed;
For contemplation he, and valor formed,
For softness she, and sweet attractive grace:
He for God only, she for God in him."

ART OF THINKING.—Franklin informs his son, that had he opened a "swimming school" in England, at a certain period, he might have made a fortune. Would not a "thinking school" be as likely to succeed, at the present time, in this city? How much better writers might we have, if every scribbler had learned how to think! Many persons doubtless imagine they have been thinking, when they have only been chasing gilded butterflies through their weedy brains; insects that are seldom caught alive, and which prove to be worse than useless when they are. A worthy teacher of this city lately rebuked an idle pupil for neglecting his allotted exercise in composition; the delinquent having presented, instead of the expected essay, a small strip of paper, containing these words only: "Sir, I cannot think of any thing to write." The teacher sternly replied, "Instead of thinking what to write, sir, you should write what you think." "So I did, sir," replied the boy: "it is on that paper."—Which was right?

AN EXCLAMATION, BY A DISCARDED LOVER.

Oh woman! thou art made of change,
Be thou or maid or mother;
For ere the tongue can call thee this,
Presto! thou art another!

DR. MITCHELL.—The doctor was always instructive, and, at times, highly humorous, in his observations to the evening guests who enjoyed the privilege of attending his conversations. On one occasion, he repeated the following impromptu. It was addressed to a lady from whom he had just received a fine preparation of the Paradisea Apoda,

"Gentlemen," said the gallant philosopher, "this is the way I pay a lady for a bird of paradise. If the curiosity of woman lost us the garden, she has now made some atonement by preserving one of its feathered tenants for our gratification."

"When ancient artists, gallantly intent,
Resolved the goddesses to compliment,
They strove the point of elegance to hit,
And give to each a contribution fit.
They placed with Juno, of exalted views,
The stately peacock, with his gorgeous hues:
The attic owl discreet Minerva took,
That mimic'd wisdom with his solemn look:
On Venus they bestowed the gentle dove,
The neat and proper attribute of love.
A modern bard, when asked what feathered kind
Should to the accomplished Julia be assigned,
Answered, with promptness and decision nice,
That hers must be the Bird of Paradise."

TRUTH.—Truth is of so great a value, as well as beauty, that both for its use and its ornament it is strange it should ever be disregarded. Yet many believe they are not guilty of uttering falsehoods, so long as they do not say that in words which may be flatly contradicted. For my part, I prefer a bold-faced liar to one, who, under the mask of veracity, and without violating the letter of truth, avails himself of looks, shrugs, innuendoes, or even silence, in order to convey, or to permit erroneous impressions in others. The one is soon detected, and may be guarded against; the other, under the disguise of virtue, can do infinite mischief. If a falsehood appears detestable in a man, how much more so is it disgusting in a female! No beauty nor accomplishments can counteract the disagreeable effects of such a disposition. The soul of a sensitive and honest man recoils from mingling itself with that of one capable of so groveling an act. There is a positive pleasure in knowing that dependence may be placed on what you hear; and I confess I can scarcely refrain from awarding full credit to the assertion of any of my friends, until their fault becomes too glaring to admit of further doubt. If a lady could conceive what a difficulty there is in convincing one's self that what she declares with a grave face has no foundation in reality, and also what an unnatural creature she appears, when once detected in an untruth, I should think that, however she might be inclined, fear alone would be sufficient to prevent her from ever polluting her pretty lips with that which has the power to cover her whole person, in the eyes of others, with shame and degradation.

LINES TO A YOUNG LADY,
AFTER AN ACCIDENTAL FIRE IN HER CHAMBER.

For thee, the sympathizing tear,
Dear Jane I cannot shed,
Though rudely from thy room were torn
Thy toilet, cap, and bed;
For, sure the lot's not passing hard,
The laughing fates exclaim,
That she who fires a thousand hearts,
Should suffer from one flame.

LOVERS.—There is not in all nature any thing so utterly ridiculous as a man so much in love as not to be able to conceal it from the rest of the company. Not only is he ridiculous, but, in time, he gets to be a regular nuisance, and is as impertinent and tiresome as he was at first laughable. He is always either extremely happy, or wonderfully wretched, without any apparent cause. This class of lovers, who would give their fortunes for a curl of their mistress's hair, or a piece of her shoe-string, generally make the worst husbands in the world.

EPIQUEUREAN EPIGRAM.

If life be a dream, as the moralist sings,
Let us wake not,—'tis wisdom's conclusion—
For, surely the essence of happiness springs
From the dreamer's continued illusion.

GERMAN CHURCH IN FRANKFORT-STREET,
CORNER OF WILLIAM.

This church was erected by the German Lutheran congregation, being commenced in 1766, and dedicated to the worship of God on the first day of May, 1767, when it received the name of "Christ's church." This was eight years previous to the actual commencement of hostilities in the revolutionary war, "when the Park was out of town." Six years before (as the records inform us) "that part of the high-road to Boston which leads towards fresh-water, extending from Broadway to the place where the negroes were burnt in 1741, and to which the gallows has lately been removed, begins to be regulated as a street, and a few houses have been erected." Chatham-street, it will be perceived, is therefore classic ground, particularly the spot here alluded to, between Chatham-garden and Pearl-street.

That section of the city which is still called the Swamp, was then literally so, being a wet waste, covered with trees and bushes, in which the birds built their nests. The Baptist church in Gold-street was erected in 1760; Vesey-street was not regulated until the following year, and St. Paul's church was built four years afterwards. In 1766, "the Presbyterian church petitioned, in a long and eloquent appeal, for the angular lot, lately called the Vineyard; stating the great increase of that persuasion," &c. The land asked for (where the Brick Meeting now stands) was unanimously granted them, at a rent of forty pounds per annum. These facts are alluded to in order to enable the reader to form some idea of the extent and population of the city in the year 1767, when the edifice was erected, of which a correct view stands at the head of this article.

The first pastor of this church was the Rev. John Siegfried Gerroek, who officiated six years, when he was succeeded by the Rev. Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, who occupied the pulpit and administered the ordinances until the British took possession of the city, in 1776. From that period the congregation were destitute of a regularly stationed pastor; but the chaplains of the German regiments, then in the city, officiated by turns for a considerable length of time, the Hessian soldiers and the congregation assembling together for divine worship. In 1784, when a treaty of peace, and the acknowledgment of our independence, had put an end to hostilities, the late Rev. Dr. I. C. Kunze was called to the pastoral charge of the German Lutheran congregation, and officiated until he departed this life in July, 1807. In the succeeding October, the Rev. F. W. Geissenhainer was installed, and officiated until 1814, when he resigned, and removed to Pennsylvania. In the following year, the late Rev. Dr. C. F. Schaeffer was called to the clerical office in this church, the duties of which he faithfully and zealously discharged until December, 1822, when he left the German and took charge of the new English Lutheran church in Walker-street. On his departure a call was given to their former pastor, the abovenamed Dr. F. W. Geissenhainer, who accepted the unanimous invitation, and again officiated in Christ's church until it was vacated in May, 1830, when, in pursuance of a previous resolution of the members, they removed to the Walker-street church, the congregation of Mr. Schaeffer having been previously provided with another church in Orange-street. This was sixty-three years after the dedication of Christ's church in Frankfort-street. The vacated building was afterwards purchased by George Lorillard, Esq.

While the city of New-York was in possession of the British, during the revolutionary war, the Hessian regiments, as before stated, attended worship in this building, administered in their own language, and by their own chaplains. Several Hessian officers, who received mortal wounds in the battle of Long-island, were interred in the cemetery of this church, as were all who died in the city during its occupancy by the enemy. Several coffins were lately disinterred, which contained the remains of these hireling veterans, in full military costume, with their side-arms, cocked hats, boots, queaus, &c.

This edifice, which is built of stone, is sixty feet in length and thirty-four in breadth, with a plain hipped or gambrel roof, without tower, cupola, or steeple. During its occupation by the German Lutheran Society it contained a fine-toned organ, which was removed, we believe, to Walker-street church. To what use the building is now to be devoted we have not been informed. It will probably share the fate of the French Protestant church in Pine-street, by giving place to a block of modern stores. Aware of this probability, we took the precaution to secure its portrait, for the gratification of such as may have never seen the original. For the historical facts here detailed we are indebted to the Rev. Dr. F. W. Geissenhainer, and also to Goodrich's Picture of New-York, a valuable work, which ought to be better known.

AFFECTATION.

I HAPPENED, the other day, to be caught in the society of two or three young belles with their beaux, and, as I have neither a handsome face nor a fashionable air, they designed me but a few civil common-places about the weather, which rather appeared to me a polite way of examining what sort of a looking creature I was, and then formed a little colloquial circle of their own. The girls were extremely pretty and finely dressed, and the men disposed to be agreeable; and the conversation ran on merrily, sometimes mingling into a general clash of their voices, and again rising into a cordial laugh. The subjects discussed were such as are usual in drawing-rooms. Miss B. was engaged to be married, and Mr. C. was paying attentions to Miss D. The character of several underwent a severe examination, while others were lauded, I suspect, quite above their actual deserts. At length they brought forward many of my particular friends for trial, although they knew not that I was honored with their acquaintance. The decisions they gravely uttered respecting the character and talents of such as came under review were so ludicrously erroneous, that I insensibly began to take an interest in their opinions, and several times had hard struggles with myself to keep from betraying my amusement. How deceived are these individuals who spend their lives in parlors! Many a dunce they spoke of as a "young man of great talent," and many a sensible fellow they set down as a fool. Some whom I knew, possessed of tempers sufficient to render any woman wretched, were praised for their amiable dispositions; and others, really noble, were covered with derision, perhaps for some awkwardness in their manner, or the want of a smooth face, or an unfashionable way of getting through the little difficulties of a parlor. I could pardon them for their misunderstandings and misrepresentations of the men, for they, by their way of life and their reputation in the world, can eventually succeed in making their real character apparent; but I was displeased to find the thoughtless tribunal judging individuals of the other sex, by their superficial demeanor and accomplishments, instead of those qualities which render the wife and mother useful and happy. Among the charges most frequently alleged was that of affectation. Miss So-and-so was a sweet girl—very amiable, and extremely beautiful, but then—she was so affected. And Mr. Such-a-one would be an excellent man were it not for his affectation. There are, doubtless, many persons guilty of this fault; but I am inclined to believe numbers are accused of it innocently, and when thus accused, it would be difficult for the most naturally behaved person in the world to escape conviction. If the unfortunate thus set upon is aware of what is going on, he will soon actually become affected in striving to avoid being so. It is strange that the world should be so bitter against a folly which arises from a desire to please them, and to stand well in their estimation. Besides, we are all so, in a measure, from our education. Only very young children are free from it, for nature is frowned out of countenance whenever she appears in all "good society;" and if a plain, honest laborer should come from the country, and be led through the various scenes of elegant life in this city, I question whether he would not laugh at all of us, as a set of the most affected creatures that could possibly exist; and there are certain modes of dress and conduct which would fully warrant such a conclusion.

I am inclined to attribute to the female sex a vast deal of affectation, which it would scarcely be just to ascribe to individuals. The decrees of fashion must be obeyed, and no individual therefore can be censured for not rendering herself an object of notice by dressing with any marked difference from the prevailing mode. It is a strange state of affairs, but it is the true one, that a young lady who should now presume to dress with simplicity and natural grace, would become an object of absolute ridicule. They laugh sometimes at the style of apparel among their great grand-mothers; but I am very certain the time will come when the dress which is now considered as a model of elegant fashion, would set the world in a roar. Perhaps the effect upon persons unaccustomed to it might be in a measure estimated by the degree of notice which a gentleman would now attract by indulging in the same species of eccentricity. Fancy a company seated gravely together, and a youth entering with a pair of sleeves to his coat resembling two inflated balloons, and magnifying his arms into several times the dimensions of his body. Suppose that the same taste which led him to extend the size of his arms, should induce him to diminish that of his waist, as if resolved to metamorphose himself into a shape as unlike as possible that bestowed upon him by nature. Then let him decorate his ears with jewels, hang a diamond upon the centre of his forehead, and build up his hair a foot or two above his real stature. I am half afraid to be set down as a dull, silly proser, but however erroneous my ideas may be, I must candidly confess that I could never persuade myself to think any thing in the world sweeter than woman's face and form, as nature created them, to look upon every fashion which tends to distort them as something impertinent and offensive; and when I have caught myself admiring a female the most, it has invariably been when she had made the least apparent effort to excite my admiration by any affectation of charms not her own. There is to me something exceedingly repulsive in any glare and gaudiness in dress. I cannot admire a woman for that which she only put on perhaps a few hours ago, and will take off again presently. Besides, I think a woman of delicate feeling and real good sense always betrays them by a kind of chasteness in apparel, even when she is in the fashion. There are always prevailing pieces of display which you will not find in her. There is visible to a nice eye a kind of restraint upon herself, so that the eccentricity of fashion is subdued by her own modesty and taste. I do love to detect that elegant gentility in a female. It is better than beauty. It tells favorably of the mind, and wins upon me more than an accomplishment. If one of ordinary person is so much benefited by this, how fine is its effect in one whom nature has created lovely? There is something noble in seeing a girl put aside, as unworthy of her, the silly decorations which can only attract the superficial, and depend merely upon the force of her native qualities. I noticed this once when a young belle, who had turned the hearts of whole crowds of dandies, and caused the wasting of more sad sighs, moonlight walks, and real Havana cigars than I am sure ever her innocent bosom dreamed of, was caught, at last by a noble fellow, and a number of select friends were invited to attend the ceremony. Such a host of brilliant head-dresses might have graced the court of the gayest of emperors—such a flashing, and rustling, and nodding—feathers, diamonds, and all sorts of nameless magnificence. There was a great deal of surmise respecting what would be the appearance of the bride, and expectation was on tiptoe to discover how she should be able to overtop all the lofty splendors of the blooming young beauties who awaited her coming in the brilliantly lighted apartments of her wealthy father's mansion. For my part, I was almost afraid to see her enter when the reverend gentleman arrived and every thing was ready for her appearance. I am afraid of women when they are fixed up so. They always look to me as if they had too much to do in superintending their own concerns to think of others. How I wronged thy good sense and exquisite taste, beautiful Fanny! The opened door presented to the eyes of the admiring company a head that some sculptor seemed to have formed to make a statue of. The Venus is not more simple. A single beautiful rose, just taken from the dew of heaven, blushed above her forehead, made her appear the most bewitching of women, and confirmed my hatred of those ugly fashions forever.

I should be but taking a very contracted view of my subject, however, were I to confine the influence of affectation only to dress and manner. There is much of it in the mind. We affect a thousand virtues that we have not. I knew an honest gentleman who always affects charity and humility. It is curious also to see that he himself is deceived as well as several of his friends, and really believes himself to be meek and philanthropic. In a debate he will say the most bitter things, but in a soft, gentle way, and show you that he thinks you a liar or a fool, "as far as he is able to understand," and "according to his humble opinion." I think some day he will knock his antagonist down, telling him at the same time "he should be very sorry to offend him." It is wonderful how grossly we are sometimes deceived about our own characters and dispositions. I was witness once to an instance of this, which placed the real malice and the seeming humbleness of a person in a very strong contrast. It was at a little country church, where a young preacher had committed an offence in his manner of addressing a respectable congregation, composed of individuals most of whom were old enough to be his father, and was consequently advised that his pulpit would be occupied for the future by another. The instance I allude to occurred in the close of his farewell discourse. He told them that he had that day presented them with his last sermon. He said they were all beloved by him, all his dear friends and brothers. He was sorry that the fault which had been found with him by some, had compelled him to leave them. He regretted that the depravity of the time rendered it impossible for a man to do his duty, but he had the sweet consolation to know that he had acted up to the dictates of his conscience, and he would love them though they reviled him and spit on him. "But," he added, and the natural fierceness of his anger betrayed itself in his features, "remember that I am a disciple of one who will not see his meanest followers trampled on, and who will not be slow to revenge!" I was shocked to see a place and office so sacred made but the occasion and disguise of a passion which jarred more discordantly upon my feelings of piety because it assumed the mask of religion.

VILLAGE SKETCHES.

THE INCENDIARY—A COUNTRY TALE.

BY MISS MITFORD.

No one that had the misfortune to reside during the last winter in the disturbed district of the south of England, will ever forget the awful impression of that terrible time. The stilly gatherings of the misguided peasantry amongst the wild hills, partly heath and partly woodland, of which so much of the northern part of Hampshire is composed, dropping in one by one, and two by two, in the gloom of the evening, or the dim twilight of a November morning; or the open and noisy meetings of determined men at noontide in the streets and greens of our Berkshire villages, and even sometimes in the very churchyards, rallying forth in small but resolute numbers to collect money or destroy machinery, and compelling or persuading their fellow-laborers to join them at every farm they visited; or the sudden appearance and disappearance of these large bodies, who sometimes remained together to the amount of several hundreds for many days, and sometimes dispersed, one scarcely knew how, in a few hours; their day-light marches on the high road, regular and orderly as those of an army, or their midnight visits to lonely houses, lawless and terrific as the descent of pirates, or the incursions of banditti; all brought close to us a state of things which we never thought to have witnessed in peaceful and happy England. In the sisterland, indeed, we have read of such horrors, but now they were brought home to our very household hearths; we tasted of fear, the bitterest cup that an imaginative woman can taste, in all its agonizing varieties; and felt, by sad experience, the tremendous difference between that distant report of danger, with which we had so often fancied that we sympathized, and the actual presence of danger itself. Such events are salutary, inasmuch as they show to the human heart its own desperate self-deceit. I could not but smile at the many pretty letters of condolence and fellow feeling which I received from writers who wrote far too well to feel anything, who most evidently felt nothing; but the smile was a melancholy one—for I recollected how often, not intending to feign, or suspecting that I was feigning, I myself had written such.

Nor were the preparations for defence, however necessary, less shocking than the apprehensions of attack. The hourly visits of bustling parish officers, bristling with importance (for our village, though in the centre of the insurgents, continued uncontaminated—"faithful amidst the unfaithful found")—and was therefore quite a rallying point for all loyal men and true; the swearing in of whole regiments of petty constables; the stationary watchmen, who every hour, to prove their vigilance, sent in some poor wretch, beggar, or match-seller, or rambling child, under the denomination of suspicious persons; the mounted patrol, whose deep "all's well," which ought to have been consolatory, was about the most alarming of all alarming sounds; the soldiers, transported from place to place in carts, the better to catch the rogues, whose local knowledge gave them great advantage in a dispersal; the grave processions of magistrates and gentlemen on horseback; and, above all, the nightly collecting of arms and armed men within one's own dwelling, kept up a continual sense of nervous inquietude.

Fearful, however, as were the realities, the rumors were a hundred-fold more alarming. Not an hour passed but, from some quarter or other, reports came pouring in of mobs gathering, mobs assembled, mobs marching upon us. Now the high-roads were blockaded by the rioters, travellers murdered, soldiers defeated, and the magistrates, who had gone out to meet and harangue them, themselves surrounded and taken by the desperate multitude. Now the artisans—the commons, so to say of B—, had risen to join the peasantry, driving out the gentry and tradespeople, whilst they took possession of their houses and property, and only detaining the mayor and aldermen as hostages. Now that illustrious town held loyal, but was besieged. Now the mob had carried the place; and artisans, constables, tradespeople, soldiers, and magistrates, the mayor and corporation included, were murdered to a man, to say nothing of women and children; the market-place running with blood, and the town-hall piled with dead bodies. This last rumor, which was much to the taste of our villagers, actually prevailed for several hours, terrified maid-servants ran shrieking about the house, and every corner of the village street realized Shakespeare's picture of "a smith swallowing a tailor's news."

So passed the short winter's day. With the approach of night came fresh sorrows; the red glow of fires gleaming on the horizon, and mounting into the middle sky; the tolling of bells; and the rumbling sound of the engines clattering along from place to place, and often, too often, rendered useless by the cutting of the pipes after they had begun to play—a dreadful aggravation of the calamity, since it proved that among those who assembled, professedly to help, were to be found favorers and abettors of the concealed incendiaries. Oh the horror of those fires—breaking forth night after night, sudden, yet expected, always seeming nearer than they actually were, and always said to have been more mischievous to life and property than they actually had been! Mischievous enough they were, heaven knows! A terrible and unholy abuse of the most beautiful and comfortable of the elements! a sinful destruction of the bounties of Providence! an awful crime against God and man! Shocking it was to behold the peasantry of England becoming familiarized with this tremendous power of evil—this desperate, yet most cowardly sin!

The blow seemed to fall, too, just where it might least have been looked for—on the unoffending, the charitable, the kind; on those who were known only as the laborer's friends; to impoverish whom was to take succour, assistance, and protection from the poor. One of the objects of attack in our own immediate neighborhood was a widow lady, between eighty and ninety; the best of the good, the kindest of the kind. Occurrences like this were in every way dreadful. They made us fear (and such fear is a revengeful passion, and comes near to hate) the larger half of our species. They weakened our faith in human nature.

The revulsion was, however, close at hand. A time came which changed the current of our feelings—a time of retribution. The fires were quenched; the riots were put down; the chief of the rioters were taken. Examination and commitment were the order of the day; the crowded jails groaned with their overload of wretched prisoners; soldiers were posted at every avenue to guard against possible escape; and every door was watched night and day by miserable women, the wives, mothers, or daughters of the culprits, praying for admission to their unfortunate relatives. The danger was fairly over, and pity had succeeded to fear.

Then, above all, came the special commission; the judges in threefold dignity; the array of counsel; the crowded court; the solemn trial; the awful sentence—all the more impressive, from the merciful feeling which pervaded the government, the counsel, and the court. My father, a very old magistrate, being chairman of the bench, as well as one of the grand jury; and the then high sheriff, with whom it is every way an honor to claim acquaintance, being his intimate friend, I saw and knew more of the proceedings of this stirring time than usually falls to the lot of women, and took a deep interest in proceedings which had in them a thrilling excitement as far beyond acted tragedy as truth is beyond fiction.

I shall never forget the hushed silence of the auditors, a dense mass of human bodies, the heads only visible, ranged tier over tier to the very ceiling of the lofty hall; the rare and striking importance which that silence and the awfulness of the occasion gave the mere official forms of a court of justice, generally so hastily slurred over and slightly attended to; the unusual seriousness of the counsel; the watchful gravity of the judges; and, more than all, the appearance of the prisoners themselves, belonging mostly to the younger classes of the peasantry, such men as one is accustomed to see in the fields, on the road, or the cricket-ground, with sunburnt faces, and a total absence of reflection or care, but who now, under the influence of a sharp and bitter anxiety, had acquired not only the sallow paleness proper to a prison, but the look of suffering and of thought, the brows contracted and brought low over the eyes, the general sharpness of feature and elongation of countenance, which give an expression of intellect, a certain momentary elevation, even to the commonest and most vacant of human faces. Such is the power of an absorbing passion, a great and engrossing grief. One man only amongst the large number whom I had heard arraigned (for they were brought out by tens and twenties) would, perhaps, under other circumstances, have been accounted handsome; yet a painter would at that moment have found studies in many.

I shall never forget, either, the impression made on my mind by one of the witnesses. Several men had been arraigned together for machine breaking. All but one of them had employed counsel for their defence, and under their direction had called witnesses to character, the most respectable whom they could find—the clergy and overseers of their respective parishes, for example—masters with whom they had lived, neighboring farmers or gentry, or even magistrates—all that they could muster to grace or credit their cause. One poor man alone had retained no counsel, offered no defence, called no witness, though the evidence against him was by no means so strong as that against his fellow-prisoners; and it was clear that his was exactly the case in which testimony to character would be of much avail. The defences had ended, and the judge was beginning to sum up, when suddenly a tall gaunt upright figure, with a calm thoughtful brow, and a determined but most respectful demeanor, appeared in the witnesses' box. He was dressed in a smock frock, and was clean and respectable in appearance, but evidently poor. The judge interrupted himself in his charge to inquire the man's business; and hearing that he was a voluntary witness for the undefended prisoner, proceeded to question him, when the following dialogue took place. The witness's replies, which seemed to me then, and still do so, very striking from their directness and manliness, were delivered with the same humble boldness of tone and manner that characterized the words.

Judge. "You are a witness for the prisoner, an unsummoned witness?"

"I am, my lord. I heard that he was to be tried to-day, and have walked twenty miles to speak the truth of him, as one poor man may do of another."

"What is your situation in life?"

"A laborer, my lord; nothing but a day-laborer."

"How long have you known the prisoner?"

"As long as I have known any thing. We were playmates together, went to the same school, have lived in the same parish. I have known him all my life."

"And what character has he borne?"

"As good a character, my lord, as a man need work under."

It is pleasant to add, that this poor man's humble testimony was read from the judge's notes, and mentioned in the judge's charge, with full as much respect, perhaps a little more, than the evidence of clergymen and magistrates for the rest of the accused; and that principally from this direct and simple tribute to his character, the prisoner in question was acquitted.*

To return, however, from my evil habit of digressing (if I may use an Irish phrase) before I begin, and making my introduction longer than my story, a simple sin to which in many instances, and especially in this, I am fain to plead guilty—to come back to my title and my subject—I must inform my courteous readers, that the case of arson, which attracted most attention and excited most interest in this part of the country, was the conflagration of certain ricks, barns, and farm-buildings, in the occupation of Richard Mayne; and that, not so much from the value of the property consumed, (though that value was considerable,) as on account of the character and situation of the prisoner, whom, after a long examination, the magistrates found themselves compelled to commit for the offence. I did not hear the trial, the affair having occurred in the neighboring county; and do not, therefore, vouch for "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," as one does when an ear-witness; but the general outline of the story will suffice for our purpose.

Richard Mayne was a wealthy yeoman of the old school, sturdy, boisterous, bold, and kind, always generous, and generally good-natured, but cross-grained and obstinate by fits, and sometimes puer-proud—after the fashion of men who have made money by their own industry and shrewdness. He had married late in life, and above him in station, and had now been for two or three years a widower with one only daughter, a girl of nineteen, of whom he was almost as fond as of his grayhound Mayfly, and for pretty much the same reason—that both were beautiful and gentle, and his own, and both admired and coveted by others—that Mayfly had won three cups, and that Lucy had refused four offers.

A sweet and graceful creature was Lucy Mayne. Her mother, a refined and cultivated woman, the daughter of an unbefricated clergyman, had communicated, perhaps unconsciously, much of her own taste to her daughter. It is true, that most young ladies, even of her own station, would have looked with great contempt on Lucy's acquirements, who neither played nor drew, and was wholly, in the phrase of the day, unaccomplished; but then she read Shak-spear; and Milton, and the poets and prose writers of the James' and Charles' times, with a perception and relish of their beauty very uncommon in a damsel under twenty; and when her father boasted of his Lucy as the cleverest as well as the prettiest lass within ten miles, he was not so far wrong as many of his hearers were apt to think of him.

After all, the person to whom Lucy's education owed most, was a relation of her mother's, a poor relation, who, being left a widow with two children almost totally destitute, was permitted by Richard Mayne to occupy one end of a small farm-house, about a mile from the old substantial manorial residence which he himself inhabited, whilst he farmed the land belonging to both. Nothing could exceed his kindness to the widow and her family; and Mrs. Owen, a delicate and broken-spirited woman who had known better days, and was now left with a sickly daughter and a promising son dependent on the precarious charity of relatives and friends, found in the free-handed and open-hearted farmer and his charming little girl her only comfort. He even restored to her the blessing of her son's society, who had hitherto earned his living by writing for an attorney in the neighboring town, but whom her wealthy kinsman now brought home to her, and established as the present assistant and future successor of the master of a well-endowed grammar-school in the parish, farmer Mayne being one of the trustees, and all-powerful with the other functionaries, joined in the trust, and the then schoolmaster was in so wretched a state of health as almost to ensure a speedy vacancy.

In most instances, such an exertion of an assumed rather than a legitimate authority, would have occasioned no small prejudice against the party protected; but George Owen was not to be made unpopular, even by the unpopularity of his patron. Gentle, amiable, true, and kind—kind both in word and deed—it was found absolutely impossible to dislike him. He was clever, too, very clever, with a remarkable aptitude for teaching, as both parents and boys soon found to their mutual satisfaction; for the progress of one half-

* This anecdote speaks strongly for the misled part of the laborers—by very far the larger part. The fact that follows makes against their deluders. It came before the grand jury; but owing to the merciful plan of the counsel for the crown of trying only for the minor offence of machine-breaking, instead of the capital one of collecting money, was not brought into court, and of course escaped the newspapers. A large party of rioters, some two or three hundred, met a clergyman riding at some distance from his own house. They surrounded his horse, caused him to dismount, and made their usual demand of five pounds. The clergyman offered them his purse, containing some silver, declaring he had no more money about him.

"Fahaw!" answered the ringleader, "don't think to put us off with beggarly shillings! Here's a bit of paper and an inkhorn; write us a draft for the sum on the N. bank. Stop," added he, as the prisoner was perforce preparing to obey him; "stop! you seem to be out of cash; so if you had rather write an order for ten pounds, do it; it may save you trouble, and I'll hand you the balance here on the spot."

Of course the accommodation was not accepted; but this was a cool way of transacting business, and affords one proof, among many, that the leaders in this affair could not have been common laborers.

year of his instruction equalled that made in a twelvemonth under the old regime. He must also, one should think, have been fond of teaching, for after a hard day's fagging at Latin and English, and writing and accounts, and all the drudgery of a boy's school, he would make a circuit of a mile and a half home in order to give Lucy Mayne a lesson in French or Italian. For a certainty, George Owen must have had a strong natural turn for playing the pedagogue, or he never would have gone so far out of his way just to read Fenelon and Alfieri with Lucy Mayne.

So for two happy years matters continued. At the expiration of that time, just as the old schoolmaster, who declared that nothing but George's attention had kept him alive so long, was evidently on his death-bed, farmer Mayne suddenly turned Mrs. Owen, her son, and her sick daughter out of the house, which by his permission they had hitherto occupied; and declared publicly, that whilst he held an acre of land in the parish, George Owen should never be elected master of the grammar-school—a threat which there was no doubt of his being able to carry into effect. The young man, however, stood his ground; and sending off his mother and sister to an uncle in Wales, who had lately written kindly to them, hired a room at a cottage in the village, determined to try the event of an election, which the languishing state of the incumbent rendered inevitable.

The cause of farmer Mayne's inveterate dislike to one whom he had so warmly protected, and whose conduct, manners, and temper, had procured him friends wherever he was known, nobody could assign with any certainty. Perhaps he had unwittingly trodden on Mayfly's toe, or on a prejudice of her master's—but his general carefulness not to hurt any thing, or offend any body, rendered either of those conjectures equally impossible—perhaps he had been found only too amiable by the farmer's other pet—those lessons in languages were dangerous things!—and when Lucy was seen at church with a pale face and red eyes, and when his landlord Squire Hawkins's blood hunter was seen every day at farmer Mayne's door, it became currently reported and confidently believed that the cause of the quarrel was a love affair between the cousins, which the farmer was determined to break off, in order to bestow his daughter on the young lord of the manor.

Affairs had been in this posture for about a fortnight, and the old schoolmaster was just dead, when a fire broke out in the rick-yard of Farley Court, and George Owen was apprehended and committed as the incendiary! The astonishment of the neighborhood was excessive; the rector and half the farmers of the place offered to become bail; but the offence was not bailable; and the only consolation left for the friends of the unhappy young man, was the knowledge that the trial would speedily come on, and their internal conviction that an acquittal was certain.

As time wore on, however, their confidence diminished. The evidence against him was terribly strong. He had been observed lurking about the rick-yard with a lantern, in which a light was burning, by a lad in the employ of farmer Mayne, who had gone thither for hay to fodder his cattle about an hour before the fire broke out. At eleven o'clock the hay-stack was on fire, and at ten Robert Doyle had mentioned to James White, another boy in farmer Mayne's service, that he had seen Mr. George Owen behind the great rick. Farmer Mayne himself had met him at half-past ten (as he was returning from the B. market) in the lane leading from the rick-yard towards the village, and had observed him throw something he held in his hand into the ditch. Hepton Harris, a constable employed to seek for evidence, had found the next morning a lantern, answering to that described by Robert Doyle, in the part of the ditch indicated by farmer Mayne, which Thomas Brown, the village shopkeeper, in whose house Owen slept, identified as having lent to his lodger in the early part of the evening. A silver pencil, given to Owen by the mother of one of his pupils, and bearing his full name on the seal at the end, was found close to where the fire was discovered; and to crown all, the curate of the village, with whom the young man's talents and character had rendered him a deserved favorite, had unwillingly deposed that he had said, "it might be in his power to take a great revenge on farmer Mayne," or words to that effect; whilst a letter was produced from the accused to the farmer himself, intimating that one day he would be sorry for the oppression which he had exercised towards him and his. These two last facts were much relied upon as evincing malice, and implying a purpose of revenge from the accused towards the prosecutor; yet there were many who thought that the previous circumstances might well account for them without reference to the present occurrence, and that the conflagration of the ricks and farm-buildings might, under the spirit of the time (for fires were raging every night in the surrounding villages) be merely a remarkable coincidence. The young man himself simply denied the fact of setting fire to any part of the property or premises; inquired earnestly whether any lives had been lost, and still more earnestly after the health of Miss Lucy; and on finding that she had been confined to her bed by fever and delirium, occasioned, as was supposed, by the fright, ever since that unhappy occurrence, relapsed into a gloomy silence, and seemed to feel no concern or interest in the issue of the trial.

His friends, nevertheless, took kind and zealous measures for his defence—engaged counsel, sifted testimony, and used every possible means, in the assurance of his innocence, to trace out the true incendiary. Nothing, however, could be discovered to weaken the strong chain of circumstantial evidence, or to impeach the credit of the witnesses, who, with the exception of the farmer himself, seemed all friendly to the accused, and most distressed at being obliged to bear testimony against him. On the eve of the trial the most zealous of his friends could find no ground of hope except in the chances of the day; Lucy, for whom alone the prisoner asked, being still confined by severe illness.

The judges arrived, the whole terrible array of the special commission; the introductory ceremonies were gone through; the cause was called on, and the case proceeded with little or no deviation from the evidence already cited. When called upon for his defence, the prisoner again asked if Lucy Mayne were in court! and hearing that she was ill in her father's house, declined entering into any defence whatsoever. Witnesses to character, however, pressed forward—his old master, the attorney, the rector and curate of the parish, half the farmers of the village, everybody, in short, who ever had an opportunity of knowing him, even his reputed rival, Mr. Hawkins, who, speaking, he said, on the authority of one who knew him well, professed himself confident that he could not be guilty of a bad action—a piece of testimony that seemed to strike and affect the prisoner more than any thing that had passed—evidence to character crowded into court; but all was of no avail against the strong chain of concurrent facts; and the judge was preparing to sum up, and the jury looking as if they had condemned, when suddenly a piercing shriek was heard in the court, and, pale, tottering, dishevelled, Lucy Mayne rushed into her father's arms, and cried out with a shrill despairing voice, that "she was the only guilty; that she had set fire to the rick; and that if they killed George Owen for her crime, they would be guilty of murder."

The general consternation may be imagined, especially that of the farmer, who had left his daughter almost insensible with illness, and still thought her light-headed. Medical assistance, however, was immediately summoned, and it then appeared that what she said was most true; that the lovers, for such they were, had been accustomed to deposit letters in one corner of that unlucky hay-rick; that having seen from her chamber-window George Owen leaving the yard, she had flown with a taper in her hand to secure the expected letter, and, alarmed at her father's voice, had run away so hastily, that she had, as she now remembered, left the lighted taper amidst the hay; that then the fire came, and all was a blank to her, until, recovering that morning from the stupor succeeding to delirium, she had heard that George Owen was to be tried for his life for the effect of her carelessness, and had flown to save him she knew not how!

The sequel may be guessed: George was of course acquitted: every body, even the very judge, pleaded for the lovers; the young landlord and generous rival added his good word; and the schoolmaster of Farley and his pretty wife are at this moment one of the happiest couples in his majesty's dominions. Friendship's Offering.

FINE ARTS.

ORATORIO OF THE MESSIAH.

This splendid composition of the immortal Handel was performed on Friday the eighteenth instant, at St. Paul's church. Expectation had been highly excited among our amateurs of music, from the circumstance that the Sacred Music Society of this city have long had this work in preparation. The Messiah, from the beauty of the passages selected from the scriptures, the fidelity of the adaptation of the music to the sentiment, the majestic power of the choruses and the able disposition of counterpoint throughout has never been equalled by a similar composition from the pen of any master. We quote with pleasure from the preface of the book of the evening's performance, distributed in the church, the following passage, as applicable to this unique oratorio:

"It has fed the hungry, clothed the naked, and fostered the orphan; it has been heard in all parts of the world with unceasing reverence and delight, and never fails whenever it is performed to draw the most crowded houses."

That it has fed and does feed the hungry and clothe the naked, is strikingly proved among numerous instances by its annual public rehearsal in the morning and performance at night at the Hanover-square rooms in London, for the benefit of decayed musicians and their families. In attending these performances persons receive a deep impression on entering the doors of the fine music saloon, in reading the names of the early benefactors of the charity, at the head of which stands that of George Frederic Handel, donor of one thousand pounds sterling. Few pass by that touching record, after hearing the divine and almost inspired compositions of the great master finely executed without feeling that music is capable "of elevating the sentiments." The German masters have universally allowed Handel to be superior to them all; and Mozart, in retouching the Messiah, and adding to it the instrumentation of the day, has manifested extreme delicacy in interfering with the harmony; indeed wherever he has ventured to make an alteration, he has given with it a duplicate of Handel's original version. We need scarcely add, that what Mozart has added is beautiful, and a decided improvement.

On the present occasion the following performers were announced:

Vocal.

MRS. AUSTIN,	MR. JONES,
MADAME BRICHTA,	MR. KYLE,
MRS. SINGLETON,	MR. PEARSON,
MR. THORNTON.

Instrumental.

Leader of the band, MR. HILL,	Organ, MR. BLONDEL,
First violin, MR. W. TAYLOR,	Principal trumpet, MR. NORTON.
Conductor, MR. COLLE.

In addition to these performers we observed Mr. Widdell, first horn; Mr. Boocock, first violoncello; Mr. P. Taylor, first flute; and Messrs. Herwig and Cioffi; the clarinet and the trombones of the Park theatre, with a numerous band. Mr. Jones opened the Messiah chastely, and with excellent intonation, and throughout gave good effect to the music. The recitative, so descriptive of suffering, "Thy rebuke hath broken his heart," was rendered with a touching and subdued tenderness, and a silvery tremor of voice, which proved that the vocalist had well studied the subject. Previous to the overture an apology on account of indisposition was made for Madame Brichta, who had undertaken the contra-alto songs, and to whom also had been allotted the fine air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Mrs. Austin, it was stated, in addition to her own share of the music, had kindly consented on the instant to sing this song; and that Mr. Pearson would undertake the contra-alto business. The accompanied recitative, commencing, "There were shepherds abiding in the fields," and concluding with, "And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host," was given by Mrs. Austin with an even quality of voice and a power which filled the church from end to end; the song, "Rejoice greatly," was executed with great rapidity and neatness; and few bravuras contain more difficulties; but the song in which Mrs. Austin most delighted us was that pleasing melody, "But thou didst not leave his soul in hell." "I know that my Redeemer liveth," malgré the shortness of the notice, was executed perfectly, and with strict propriety.

Mr. Kyle was afflicted with an unfortunate hoarseness, but acquitted himself creditably, and impressed us with an idea that he would have executed the music extremely well if he had not been indisposed. Pearson—what shall we say of this versatile personage—first singing bass, then counter-tenor, with lungs of adamant and voice of thunder. We really felt much indebted to his interposition. The song, "O thou that tellest," was tolerably given. The choruses were really beautiful. The soprano department consisted of nearly forty ladies, dressed neatly and in white, with voices strictly in tune, and many of them of fine quality. They took the leading points of the figures up with a spirit and vigor which we have seldom if ever heard surpassed. The alti and tenors were also good, the bassi correct, but weaker than either of the foregoing. We observed that Mrs. Austin, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Kyle exerted themselves in nearly every chorus, and might distinctly be heard with the soprano, tenor, and bass.

It gives us sincere pleasure to compliment the society on this oratorio, which may be repeated, we doubt not, with increased effect. The church was crowded from aisle to gallery with as attentive an audience as ever graced the Messiah in any country. In conclusion we have only a few suggestions to offer. It is customary in Europe for the audience to hear Handel's Hallelujah Chorus standing, and it would be desirable that the society should in future request this mark of respect to be paid, by intimating the same in the books of performance—it would be unhesitatingly complied with—for who would not be proud to pay such a tribute to departed genius? After the overture Mr. Hill should have led off the symphony of the opening recitative without delay; the transmission from E minor to E major forms a bright contrast, admirably suited to the nature of the composition; it is usually so played, and with decided effect. On the contrary, after the chorus, "Glory to God," a pause should take place previous to the song "Rejoice greatly," which is otherwise liable to suffer detriment from a comparison with a full chorus in a more brilliant key.

By the way, in justice to Mr. Pearson, we must not omit to expose the carelessness of some inexcusably negligent person in handing to him and Mr. Jones, in the duet "Oh death, where is thy sting? oh, grave, where is thy victory?" two differently arranged copies of the music, in one of which there were twenty bars less than in the other; the consequence was, that they were brought to a stand before it was half finished, and the audience were left to form their own conclusions upon the subject. We admire the good temper with which Mr. Pearson bore this awkward piece of negligence.

The exertions of the performers would also have probably been even yet more effective in a hall constructed properly for conveying sound to the auditory, and something should be allowed, especially in the solos, for the voice, which is lost among the lofty galleries and passages of this spacious church, and broken up by its numerous arches and columns. It may also not be unnecessary to remind some of our readers, that they must not be too hasty in forming a judgment upon the execution of this great work. It is a species of music not certain to be at first attractive to the youthful amateur. It has not the superficial glitter and flash which in many compositions instantly arrest the attention and fascinate the soul, but it is imbued throughout with a pervading sober grandeur that gradually gains on the taste, and arouses the imagination. There is too much extent of deep power and musical richness in its various parts for the conception to take them all in at once. You must hear it in different moods of mind, and have time to measure and dwell upon its magnificent choruses—its inexpressibly sweet and melancholy airs—its splendid and thrilling recitatives, and the numerous passages in each, redolent of hope or fear—pain or pleasure—sorrow or joy; and all these must be studied carefully and understandingly, and the hearer, besides a soul for music, must bring at least a slight familiarity with the best masters before he will be able to appreciate this divine composition—before (if we may so speak) the beauty and perfection of its architecture, and the extent of its colossal dimensions break upon his comprehension as a great whole, and strike him according to the intention of the author; for so far above the ordinary level of mankind was that immortal composer raised in his art, that it requires, in many, a great study, and a straining and labouring of the mind and the imagination to get where they can catch a glimpse of his genius.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

NOTES OF A TRAVELER.

"My tables; meet it is I set it down."

November 10th.—I am nearly fifteen hundred miles from home. Every thing and every body around me are strange. There is a fine excitement to me in traveling—in passing through distant places I have heard of frequently. I dined to-day at a town, the name of which I recollect getting a flogging for when I was eight years old, at school, from my mistress. What a host of associations came swarming in my mind of the spot and the people. That retired country place would be sacred ground to me now. I wonder if the old school-house is standing yet, with its low mossy roof, and its narrow green lane, and the tavern-keeper, with his lordly person, and the beautiful Lavinia. I always loved that fellow, for two reasons. He had the most magnificent apples and the prettiest daughter in the whole country round. Duty compels me to confess, that my moral perceptions were then in so uncultivated a state that, with other urchins equally blind to their eternal interests, I did draw on that old gentleman's fruit most unmercifully. Poor Saunders! I have heard nothing of him for many a long year, but doubtless he is under the sod; and if those blue eyes of the little plump damsel whose rustic charms yet live in my memory, are not also dark in the dust, most probably they are dimly shedding the remnant of their early lustre from under a crimped cap upon some dozen of youthful representatives, who rob the orchards of the present generation. Well, peace be with them. I will one of these days revisit, and expound unto the world what has become of the trusty guides of my infant years.

November 17th.—It is a gloomy day. There is a natural grandeur sometimes in the genuine feeling of hypochondria. There are moments when the light of my every hope and feeling dies. My soul is enwrapped in a Cimmerian darkness. I am filled with a bold, angry, reckless, horrid despair. A something towering and gigantic. It must have been with somewhat of a similar feeling that the prisoner of Chillon bared his breast to the lightning, and frowned more fiercely when the bolt passed by. Horrible blue devils! Spare me! Spare me! I would rally my spirits, and laugh at your fury; but the smile freezes on my lip, a cold solitude is at my heart. Life seems all a mockery. This everlasting throng of men and women going about me with so much eagerness and apparent indifference, some bent on business, and some on pleasure—do they not know their fate? Do they forget what brief things they are; that they are all rushing, by different roads, to the graveyard? These are the kind of moments when a man takes a cigar, and feels the fragrant blessing fall like oil upon the waters of his troubled mind. No matter. I have reached a decent hotel to-night, and have a bed here of the most tempting rotundity and softness. Thou bitter, dismal world, farewell!

November 18th.—Not the smallest trace of my yesterday's misery remains in my mind. I have been riding under the pleasantest sky I ever saw. Everywhere around me are the branches of these dying woods. Beautiful autumn, with thy emblems! The reveries conjured up by thee are rich and yet melancholy, like thy own fading and many-colored foliage. To me there is no pleasanter place for reflection than a stage-coach. My mind always then feeds upon a thousand fantastic fancies, lives over again the past, builds up rich prospects for the future, imagines what may be the present in the several distant places where, alas! only imagination can fly. Then the persons we love or dislike—what a luxury for a lover to lounge luxuriantly on the back seat in utter impenetrable incognito, to hear the tramp of the horse's hoofs along the moist road, and see the tossing of their beautiful heads and manes. Then the driver's cheering exclamations, and the ready crack of his long elastic whip, and the whirling of the wheels, and the constant succession of bright new images. I should compose my poems in a stage, if I were a poet; indeed the only thing of the kind of which I ever was, and Deo volente ever mean to be guilty, was constructed in this identical situation, with a noble German friend, nearly seven feet high, asleep on one of my shoulders, (I am a small man myself,) and a full-sized young lawyer's head, (where were his quiddets then?) nodding and bobbing on the other.

I have traveled thousands of miles in stages, and would cheerfully repeat the journey. How delightful to have a dainty reverie broken suddenly by an angle in the road, and a romantic old bridge over a gleaming river, or a picturesque cottage and fence, or a giant oak, or a distant ridge of mountains, that look dreamy and blue like clouds or the ocean, and then the little mental struggle to regain the scattered visions. I have sat for hours and compressed half the incidents of my life within the time taken by the four fine coursers to pass from one mile-stone to the other. Then there are the clouds, beautiful things! changing like thought. Here a stupendous mass of snowy banks piled up, and stretching away in dense volumes till lost in the circling horizon. Here a long sweep, like a slab of white marble; and again a portion curled into waves and ripples, or melting into floating islands, or forming into monstrous shapes, till imagination peoples the sky with dragons and sea-serpents. The sunset to-night from the stage window was splendid. What a pity any thing so superb should fade. The fine, radiant, burning crimson glowed away up to the middle heaven, bathing the quiet clouds with rosy colors, and lighting up all the western woods into a magnificent illumination. Then it gradually cooled and darkened, and left the scene to the cold still crescent that grew slowly visible, and soon also disappeared. We rode several hours in the evening, and frequently passed groups of rough-looking men, with their enormous cotton-waggons, and sometimes families of them encamped on the ground in the woods by the road-side. On these occasions they build large fires, and tying their ferocious dogs to a tree, they sleep at their ease.

The groups that we passed here had a fine, romantic, and at the same time a happy look. The deep red light of their fire streaming through the trees, revealing the rough forms of the travelers, painting the ground and the surrounding branches, and then the whole enveloped in darkness, doubly black from the contrast, imparted to the scene a highly picturesque character. I envied the reckless indifference of those people. How much happier were they than princes or kings. These are the creatures that enjoy existence. Cultivated minds refine themselves till they lose the faculty of appreciating nature's ordinary blessings, and expose themselves to innumerable miseries which these honest rude fellows would laugh at.

I met this afternoon a waggon, in which a whole family were transporting their property into one of the western states. It was a mild balmy day, and every thing in nature wore a most lovely look. The travelers were on foot at the base of a high hill, watering their team by the small branch of a southern river that empties into the Atlantic. I was in one of these fine humors one gets worked up into sometimes among pleasant scenes, and in that delicious weather. It may, perhaps, be partially ascribed to this temporary propensity to catch the bright side of every thing, that these humble pilgrims struck me as being extremely beautiful. They all displayed such healthy faces and finely-moulded forms, such clear complexions, heightened by exercise and excitement. The sturdy parents, with their sunburnt good-humored countenances, the mother with an infant in her arms; a tall modest girl, with such lips and teeth, and when she caught my full gaze resting on her, a crimson came over her features, that many a belle in her proud drawing-room might envy. There were two or three miniature faces, cast in the same mould; and two boys, full of irrepressible merriment, who had been walking into the stream, and as the stage stopped they came up towards me, with their clean bare feet, and shoes in their hands, and showed such a natural grace in every motion, and innocent happiness in every look, that I would have positively bid farewell to the bright shifting images of fame and fortune, which I was chasing through the future, to have been one of these simple travelers, sheltered and contented in their lowly vale of life. I had scarcely indulged myself with five minutes' observation, when the driver sprang upon his seat, and made the woods resound with the crack of his whip. The horses dashed onward at a full gallop, striking fire with their hoofs from the flinty road; and so we parted.

Among the amusements by which time is beguiled in a stage, is watching the gradual death of the day and birth of the night. The glare of the noon softens, the shadows grow long and gigantic, with an imperceptible increase. Then come all the brilliant pageantry and pomp which attend the god of day in his dying moments; and afterwards the yellow stars, that peep tremblingly forth, and shed a bolder beam as the darkness thickens. Campbell has some good lines to the evening star:

"Star that bringest home the bee,
And sett'st the weary laborer free!
If any star shed peace, 'tis thou,
That send'st it from above,
Appearing when heaven's breath and brow
Are sweet as hers we love.

"Come to the luxuriant skies,
Whilst the landscape's odors rise,
Whilst far-off lowing herds are heard,
And songs, when toil is done,
From cottages whose smoke unstirr'd,
Curls yellow in the sun.

"Star of love's soft interview,
Parted lovers on thee muse;
Their remembrance in heaven
Of thrilling vows thou art
Too delicious to be riven
By absence from the heart."

I have mentioned the stage as a place where one may be worked up into an inspiration favorable to poetic composition; I may add, you can scarcely any where remember a choice stanza with more force and effect. It is one of the tests of true poetry that it grows more beautiful the more it is examined and dwelt on, while the specious effusions of merely superficial writers, by being revolved in the mind, lose their brightness and charm, and discover little inconsistencies, improbabilities, and chasms in the meaning, which plainly betray the absence of a master-hand. In a stage-coach we are in possession of leisure to trace all these little distinctions. As I repeated even the verses of the accomplished author of the "Pleasures of Hope," however beautiful they were as they first flowed through my memory, I could gradually perceive several little roughnesses and inaccuracies, notwithstanding the richness and tenderness of the poet's ideas. Of these a part may be attributed to the harshness of our vernacular. How the organs of pronunciation labor to give those awkward words, "bringest home," and "sett'st the," "that send'st it." What an unmusical line is this, "Whilst the landscape's odors rise." What a hissing among the Ss! And then the "lowing herds are heard," is bad.

"From cottages whose smoke unstirr'd,
Curls yellow in the sun."

very prettily conjures up the picture of a richly lighted, clear, and still afternoon; as do also the songs from the cottages, when the labors of the day are over:

"Star of love's soft interview,
Parted lovers on thee muse;"

is good; but the word "riven" is inappropriate in the line before the last. "Absence" does not rise the memory of any thing from the heart; treachery may rive our affections from an object—that is, tear or rend them apart; but absence erases gradually, so that they fade almost imperceptibly away under its influence. How comparatively few productions are there sufficiently matured and perfect to stand the test of this kind of stage-coach criticism.

SDBREY.

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

TO A BRIDE.

BY NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

FAREWELL! sweet cousin! ever thus
Drop from us treasures, one by one,
They who have been from youth with us,
Whose very look, whose very tone
Are linked to us like leaves to flowers—
They who have shared our pleasant hours—
Whose voices, so familiar grown,
They almost seem to us our own,
The echoes, as it were, of ours—
They who have even been our pride,
Yet in their hours of triumph dearest—
They whom we may have known and tried,
And loved the most when tried the nearest—
They pass from us like stars that wane,
The brightest still before,
Or gold links broken from a chain
That can be join'd no more.

What can we wish thee? Gifts hast thou,
Richer than wishes ever give—
Gifts of the heart, and lip, and brow,
Gifts that thou couldst not lose and live—
Better are these than aught that we,
This side of heaven, can wish for thee.
Well then—ever may these increase—
Deeper thy heart—richer thy tone—
Still on thy brow be written peace,
Still be thine eye's kind spell its own—
Still may the spirit of thy smile
Have power, as now, all cares to lighten,
And may thine own heart feel, the while,
The sunshine in which others brighten.
Life be to thee the summer tide
'Twill seem to others by thy side!

THE ELOPEMENT.

BY THE SAME.

One sauntering, sunshiny summer's day, soon after the introduction of Berlin iron ornaments and sleeves a la gilet, (I like to date by great epochs,) there stood at Fontaine's counter, No. — Broadway, (you know the shop, lady, I dare swear,) a gentleman in whiskers, (then a little ultra,) and a lady in French slippers, (then a rare article.) They were tossing over together, with looks of profound attention, a heap of some thousand gloves of every description, which had been accumulating from every quarter of the store for the last half hour, without any approach, which the astonished shopman could discover, to the satisfaction of the lady's taste, or the gentleman's approval. An immense piece of damaged barege, hanging in a festoon across the corner in which they stood, screened them from the notice of the passing customers; and when at last they had rejected every glove in the shop, and the imperturbable little fellow in a bandanna cravat stood leaning with his two hands on the counter, and looking silently on the three hours' work they had made him, they quietly turned their backs upon him, and drawing farther into their sheltered position, continued their discussion of colors, (or some other equally interesting topic,) with increased earnestness. They had been thus occupied twenty minutes, (perhaps longer, for Irish watches and certain people lose half an hour in that time,) when a conversation arising between two gentlemen, who had just entered, respecting the identity of the small foot that was patting the floor violently within the curtain, they fell to tossing over the gloves again, and selecting a pair hastily, the lady took the gentleman's arm, and left the shop.

Miss — (I wish I dare tell you the pretty name those two black lines stand for—but it's a true story, and of course you know I can't; so, till I see you where I can whisper it in your ear, we'll call her, if you please, Cecile.) Cecile, then, was a belle of some two winters' standing. I hate description in a real story, and so I'll just say, that she was a sort of Aurora-Raby-looking beauty, (don't look for the description, Miss, it's a naughty book, Don Juan;) dark eyed, dark haired, and with the foot and hand of a Peri. She was a glorious little creature, a real angel by candle-light, and by day-light something between Honor O'Hara, Fenella, and Di Vernon, but twice as lovely as either. The men adored her, and the women (nothing hates like a woman) were eating their hearts up about her. They abused her tout-a-tout. They said she was not stylish, (that's the word, since genteel is exploded,) but, like other angels, she was a sort of witch, and knew the fashions a month before the milliners. They said she was proud, but pride is bewitching in a woman whose lip is pretty. They said she was a flirt, and sarcastic, and couldn't read without spelling, but on these points tout le monde et sa sœur had a different opinion. Nothing would do; she was a belle in spite of them—and that reminds me to go on with my story.

Cecile, I was saying, had been a belle for two winters—that is to say, within that number of seasons she had refused the three "fine men," (there are never more at a time,) and provoked, beyond endurance, the three hundred fine women, (of whom there may be any quantity.) She had worn what she fancied, and the milliners had not resented it—said what she chose, and visited where she pleased, and cut all stupid people, authentic or not—and still the men swore (and the women admitted because they swore) that she was divine. Like another great conqueror, however, she soon exhausted her material, and wept for new worlds. The same eternal beaux kept at the same eternal distance—the same eternal vows from the same eternal whiskers—the same eternal day-light and candle-light, with their same eternal walks, suppers, and dances—

it was too much for even angelic patience—Cecile was ennuyée à mort!

And who wonders? Who, that has made a campaign of fashion in the city of Gotham, wonders at a feeling of toujours perdrix, at the very sound of its name, forever after? Broadway is well enough, but who loves to look all day at a panorama? The parties are brilliant—but who loves to make one of a belle's cordon, composed of every nation, and speaking every language under heaven? or, to maintain a monologue to a pale, exhausted, over-dressed creature, who would rather die than be at the trouble of a sentence? Then the eternal oysters, pickled and stewed, stewed and pickled, (the only variety seen at a party through the season,) with a salad concocted à la Goth, rolled into the rooms upon round tables, and rolled out again, before he who eats like a christian could select and transfix one of proper proportions; and the pink champagne, sweet and sickish; and the short, ill-curved, indigenous beaux, and the tall, discontented-looking exotics—stereotyped Manuel heads crowding upon the eye like the multiplication of an incubus, and the slavish similarity of every article of dress to its neighbor—Bennett fast asleep over his cremona, and cotillions dancing upon two feet square—who, we again ask, in the name of the foul fiend, would not, of such a routine, tire and sicken?

Far be it from me, however, to indite an unqualified philippic against the metropolis of our land. There is no place this side the water which gathers so much of the rich and rare—no place where the feet of the women are smaller, or the enterprises of the men more laudable—none where the paré is so brilliantly thronged, the simple more dexterously enlightened, and the plethora of the pocket more speedily relieved—none, in short, where there are united such a foci of people and things, or where one may learn faster the necessity of combining, in his individual person, the accomplishments of Briareus and Argus. It is London diminished. No place like it "to take the nonsense out of you." The first person singular is, to all but itself, a very indifferent pronoun. Nobody cares whether you "cock your thumb" or no. Fanny Wright is no lion in Broadway, and the Frugal Housewife might eat her "hard gingerbread," and swear that it was "nice," uncontradicted.

How different from Boston! Here, every body knows every body, and his business. You cannot stir without feeling your importance. A very little stranger makes a "very splendid tiger," and a peculiar tie in a cravat gives you a three months' immortality. Your birth, religion, early history, finances, and probabilities of distinction transpire with your arrival. "Good society," at the same time, doubts while it discusses you; and though you are the cynosure of all eyes, you are suspected to be a rogue till you are known, by better than nature's authority, to be a gentleman. The shopkeepers are professedly honest, street smoking is disreputable, small feet and French slippers are not much worn, and the Tremont is the finest hotel, and Dudley the daintiest friseur in the known world. For society, the belles are slightly blue, the suppers exquisite as a dream, and the beaux honest gentlemen traders, innocent of puns and neckcloths, and good subjects for matrimony. Literary people die of the digito monstrari. Fanny Wright is held profane, and lady editors beat the — at Billingsgate. Virtue here deprives no man of "cakes and ale." Whiskers are no letters of introduction. Good English is preferred to bad French, and the pale of Unitarianism is the limit of gentility.

We have a great mind, since we are "i'the vein, to show up Philadelphia, with its comical contradictions—its rectangular streets, and its graceful women—its excessively dressed dandies, and its decent quakers—its strict religion, and its European luxury. We should like to sketch Baltimore, gay and wicked; and Charleston, learned and aristocratic; and all the places and people in this salmagundi of a nation—but—we were talking of Cecile.

She was, as I said before, tired of every thing about her. She got up in the morning, and could not think why she should be at the trouble of dressing. She walked, dined, dressed again, dissipated, and went to bed, wondering, with the naïveté of a seraph, why such a stupid world should have been created. It was at this crisis of things that Mr. Hyperion St. John, the very eidolon of a cravat, joined her one morning, as usual, in Broadway. He was the best specimen of his class, and, having borne the caprices of my lady with more constant bienséance than his fellows, stood rather the first in her graces. She took his arm very much as one leans upon a fence in June, and lounged down towards the Battery, listening to his exquisites as one, in the same idle month, listens to the running by of a stream. Mr. Hyperion had never seen her in so inoffensive a mood. He laid his forefinger against his dickey, to preserve its integrity, while he should look round at her face; and Cecile, at that moment having dropped her head to watch, for want of better amusement, the gliding in and out of her own lovely feet, it suddenly occurred to him that it was very like what he had heard called "a symptom"—his curlicue to a jarvey, the lady was in love with him! With a silent blessing on Wheeler, (he had the grace to remember who made him,) he rallied his brains, (which, having rarely been rallied before, did not readily obey,) and remembering, that in all the stories he had read the next thing to love was elopement, he coolly, as if it was a matter in course, begged to know whether she would prefer his bays or his grays on the first stage of the journey. The diversion of this subject startled Cecile from her castle-building. She looked up, and seeing the unwonted smile of satisfaction on the face of her admirer, repeated his question twice over to herself before she quite comprehended him. Her first thought was "how absurd!"—her second, "how refreshing!" Here was novelty! The world had not quite come to an end. She could do something she had never done before. Run away!—the thought was heavenly. She thanked the gods, as she turned on her heel, and retracing their steps up Broadway, they stopped to arrange matters more conveniently at Fontaine's—where our story found them.

Cecile rose from the table at six o'clock that afternoon, leaving her papa dosing over his Moselle and snuff-box, and ringing for her maid, ordered a trunk and bandboxes into her dressing-room. She then turned the key, and laying her dresses all out upon chairs, sofa, and fauteuil, selected two or three of the prettiest, (a plain white one among them,) and folded them in the trunk. She threw in next two or three handfuls of cameos, coral necklaces, and other ornaments—some indefinite articles of dress, a muslin night-cap, and a vinagrette to be used in the fainting scene—next a pair of French slippers and a Bible—and last, a lovely French apron of a new pattern, with which she intended to astonish her lord at the first breakfast subsequent to the ceremony. Having chosen her prettiest hat, and laid it aside, every thing was complete, and she threw herself upon the sofa to dream away the time till the arrival of the note from Mr. St. John, announcing the hour when his bays would be at the door.

I shall not attempt to describe the dream, because the lady did not attempt it herself in telling me the story. It was, no doubt, like all city visions of matrimony, a long vista, closed in the blue distance by a four-story brick house and iron railings, a servant in livery cleaning the door-plate, and a child in a pink frock and white pantalettes, playing in the verandah. The arrival of the note, whatever it was, put a stop to it very effectually. It was written on rose paper, and, being June, sealed with a cameo wafer. The first sentence or two, being sentiment, Cecile passed over till the second perusal. The essential part of it was the naming of the hour, and glancing her eye down, she read, "I shall be at the door in my kurrikle"—it was quite enough. To run away with a man that could not spell!—oh, no! She took her pen and wrote a note declining the honor, rang for her maid, dressed and went to a party.

Six months after, she took matrimony (as the doctors phrase it) "the natural way;" and when I saw her last, was the loveliest of Madonnas, in an oiled silk apron, getting very learned in corals and teeth-cutting.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDINBURGH REVIEW.

THE approaching visit of Washington Irving to this country will be a source of gratification to immense numbers who are as yet only acquainted with him through his works. This fascinating writer has indeed run a brilliant career, and deservedly enjoys a popularity among the writers of his age to which it is the fortune of but few to attain. In looking over, the other day, some of the back numbers of the Edinburgh Review, we lighted upon a very well written article upon the subject of his life of Columbus, which may be acceptable to many who do not receive this able journal, and would be pleased with the opinion of foreign and once proverbially prejudiced critics respecting their favorite and distinguished countrymen.

This, on the whole, is an excellent book; and we venture to anticipate that it will be an enduring one. Neither do we hazard this prediction lightly, or without a full consciousness of all that it implies. We are perfectly aware that there are but few modern works that are likely to verify it; and that it probably could not be extended with safety to so many as one in a hundred even of those which we praise. For we mean, not merely that the book will be familiarly known and referred to some twenty or thirty years hence, and will pass in solid binding into every considerable collection; but that it will supersede all former works on the same subject, and never be itself superseded. The first stage of triumph, indeed, over past or existing competitors, may often be predicted securely of works of no very extraordinary merit, which, treating of a progressive science, merely embody, with some small additions, a judicious digest of all that was formerly known; and are for the time the best works on the subject, merely because they are the last. But the second stage of literary beatitude, in which an author not only eclipses all existing rivals, but obtains an immunity from the effects of all future competition, certainly is not to be so cheaply won; and can seldom, indeed, be secured to any one, unless the intrinsic merit of his production is assisted by the concurrence of some such circumstances as we think now hold out the promise of this felicity to the biographer of Columbus.

Though the event to which his work relates is one which can never sink into insignificance or oblivion, but, on the contrary, will probably excite more interest with every succeeding generation, till the very end of the world, yet its importance has been already long enough apparent to have attracted the most eager attention to every thing connected with its details; and we think we may safely say that all the documents which relate to it have now been carefully examined, and all the channels explored through which any authentic information was likely to be derived. In addition to the very copious, but rambling and somewhat garrulous and extravagant accounts which were published soon after the discovery, and have since been methodized and arranged, Don F. M. Navarrete, a Spanish gentleman of great learning and industry, and secretary to the Royal Academy of History, at Madrid, has lately given to the world a very extensive collection of papers, relating to the history and voyages of Columbus; a very considerable portion of which appears not to have been known to any of those who had formerly written on the subject. Mr. Irving's first design was merely to publish a translation of this collection, with occasional remarks; but having during his residence at Madrid, had access, by the kindness of the Duke of Veraguas, the descendant of the great admiral, to the archives of his family, and to various other documents, still remaining in manuscript, which had escaped the research even of Navarrete, he fortunately turned his thoughts to the compilation of the more comprehensive and original work now before us—in which, by those ready helps, he has been enabled, not only to supply many defects, but to correct many errors, and reconcile some apparent contradictions in the earlier accounts.

It was evidently very desirable that such a work should at length be completed; and we think it peculiarly fortunate that the means of completing it should have fallen into such hands as Mr. Irving's. The materials, it was obvious, were only to be found in Spain, and were not perhaps very likely to be intrusted without reserve to a stranger; while there was reason to fear that a Spaniard might not have courage to speak of the errors and crimes of his countrymen in the tone which the truth of history might require, or might not think it safe, even yet, to expose the impolicy, or canvass the pretensions of the government. By a happy concurrence of circumstances, an elegant writer, altogether unconnected either with Spain or her rivals and enemies, and known all over the civilized world as a man of intelligence and principle, of sound judgment, and a calm and indulgent temper, repaired to Madrid, at a time when the publication of Navarrete had turned the public attention in an extraordinary degree to the memorable era of Columbus; and, by the force of his literary and personal character, obtained the fullest disclosure of every thing that bore upon his history that was ever made, to native or foreigner, at the same time that he had the means of discussing personally with the best informed individuals of the nation, all the points on which the written documents might be expected to leave room for doubt or explanation.

Of these rare advantages Mr. Irving has availed himself, we think, with singular judgment and ability. He has written the history of the greatest event in the annals of mankind, with the fullness and the feeling it deserved; and has presented us with a flowing and continuous narrative of the events he had to record, far more luminous and comprehensive than any which previously existed, and yet much less diffuse and discursive than the earlier accounts, from which it is mainly derived: while, without sacrificing in any degree the intense interest of personal adventure and individual sympathy, he has brought the lights of a more cultivated age to bear on the obscure places of the story; and touched skilfully on the errors and prejudices of the times—at once to enliven his picture by their singularity and to instruct us by their explanation or apology. Above all, he has composed the whole work in a temper that is beyond all praise. It breathes throughout a genuine spirit of humanity; and, embellished as it is with beautiful descriptions and wonderful tales, its principal attraction in our eyes consists in its soft-hearted sympathy with suffering, its fearless reprobation of injustice and oppression, and the magnanimous candor of its judgments, even on the delinquent.

But though we think all this of Mr. Irving's work, we suspect it may not be altogether unnecessary to caution our more sensitive and sanguine readers against giving way to certain feelings of disappointment, which it is not impossible they may encounter at the outset of their task; and to which two or three very innocent causes are likely enough to expose them. In the first place, many great admirers of Mr. Irving's former works will probably miss the brilliant, highly finished, and rhythmical style, which attracted them so much in those performances, and may find the less artificial and elaborate diction of this history comparatively weak and careless. In this judgment, however, we can by no means agree. Mr. Irving's former style, though unquestionably very elegant and harmonious, always struck us as somewhat too labored and exquisite—and, at all events, but ill fitted for an extensive work, where the interest turned too much on the weight of the matter, to be safely divided with the mere polish of the diction, or the balance of the periods. He has done well, therefore, we think, to discard it on this occasion, for the more varied, careless, and natural style, which distinguishes the volumes before us—a style not only without sententious pretensions, or antithetical prettiness, but even in some degree loose and unequal—flowing easily on, with something of the fullness and clearness of Herodotus or Boccaccio—sometimes languid, and often inexact, but furnishing in its very freshness and variety, the very best mirror, perhaps, in which the romantic adventures, the sweet descriptions, or the soft humanities, with which the author had to deal, could have been displayed.

Another, and perhaps a more general source of disappointment to impatient readers is likely to be found in the extent and minuteness of the prefatory details, with which Mr. Irving has crowded the foreground of his picture, and detained us, apparently without necessity, from its principal features. The genealogy and education of Columbus—his early love of adventure—his long and vain solicitations at the different European courts—the intrigues and jealousies by which he was baffled—the prejudices against which he had to contend, and the lofty spirit and doubtful logic by which they were opposed, are all given with a fullness for which, however instructive it may be, the reader, who knows already what it is to end in, feels any thing but grateful. His mind, from the very title-page, is among the billows of the Atlantic and the islands of the Carib; and he does not submit without impatience to be informed of all the energy that was to be exerted, and all the obstacles to be overcome, before he can get there. It is only after we have perused the whole work that we perceive the fitness of the introductory chapters; and then, when the whole grand series of sufferings and exploits has been unfolded, and the greatness of the event, and of the character with which it is inseparably blended, have been impressed on our minds, we feel how necessary it was to tell, and how grateful it is to know, all that can now be known of the causes by which both were prepared; and instead of murmuring at the length of these precious details, feel nothing but regret that time should have so grievously abridged them.

The last disappointment, for which the reader should be prepared, will probably fall upon those who expect much new information as to the first great voyage of discovery, or suppose that the chief interest of the work must be exhausted by its completion. That portion of the story of Columbus has always, from obvious causes, been given with more amplitude and fidelity than any other; and Mr. Irving, accordingly, has been able to add but few additional traits of any considerable importance. But it is not there, we think, that the great interest or the true character of the work is to be found. The mere geographical discovery, sublime as it undoubtedly is, is far less impressive, to our minds, than the moral elements to which it opens the scene. The whole history of the settlement of Hispaniola, and the sufferings of its gentle people—the daring progress of the great discoverer, through unheard-of forms of peril, and the overwhelming disasters that seem at last to weigh him down, constitute the real business of the piece, and are what truly bring out, not only the character of the man, but that of the events with which his memory is identified. It is here, too, that both the power and the beauty of the author's style chiefly display themselves—in his account of the innocence and gentleness of the simple races that were then first introduced to their elder brethren of Europe, and his glowing pictures of the lovely land, which ministered to their primitive luxury—or in his many sketches of the great commander himself, now towering in paternal majesty in the midst of his newly-found children—now invested with the dark gorgeousness of deep and superstitious devotion, and burning thirst of fame—or, still more sublime, in his silent struggles with malevolence and misfortune, and his steadfast reliance on the justice of posterity.

The work before us embodies all these, and many other touching representations; and in the vivacity of its coloring, and the novelty of its scene, possesses all the interest of a novel of invention, with the startling and thrilling assurance of its actual truth and exactness—a sentiment which enhances and every moment presses home to our hearts the deep pity and resentment inspired by the sufferings of the confiding beings it introduces to our knowledge—mingled with a feeling of something like envy and delighted wonder, at the story of their child-like innocence, and humble apparatus of enjoyment. No savages certainly ever were so engaging and loveable as those savages. Affectionate, sociable, and without cunning, sullenness, inconstancy, or any of the savage vices; but an aversion from toil, which their happy climate at once inspired and rendered innocuous, they seem to have passed their days in a blissful ignorance of all that human intellect has contrived for human misery, and almost to have enjoyed an exemption from the doom that followed man's first unhallowed appetite for knowledge of good and evil. It is appalling to think with what tremendous rapidity the whole of these happy races were swept away! How soon, after the feet of civilized Christians had touched their shores, those shores were desolate, or filled only with mourning! How soon, how frightfully soon, the swarming myriads of idle and light-hearted creatures, who came trooping from their fragrant woods to receive them with smiles of welcome and gestures of worship, and whose songs and shoutings first hailed them so sweetly over their fresh and sunny bays, were plunged, by the hands of those fatal visitants, into all the agonies of despair!—how soon released from them by a bloody extermination! it humbles and almost crushes the heart, even at this distance of time, to think of such a catastrophe, brought about by such instruments. The learned, the educated, the refined, the champions of chivalry, the messengers of the gospel of peace, come to the land of the ignorant, the savage, the heathen. They find them docile in their ignorance, submissive in their rudeness, and grateful and affectionate in their darkness; and the result of the mission is mutual corruption, misery, desolation! The experience or remorse of four centuries has not yet been able to expiate the crime, or to reverse the spell. Those once smiling and swarming shores are still silent and mournful; or resound only to the groans of the slave and the lash of the slave-driver—or to the strange industry of another race, dragged by a yet deeper guilt from a distant land, and now calmly establishing themselves on the graves of their oppressors.

The Fall of the Indian, with other poems. By Isaac McLellan, jun. 12mo. p. 99. Boston: Carter & Hendee. 1830.

How perfectly full the world is of fine subjects for poetry. The principal, or rather spirit of it, lies hidden every where under commonplace objects like the electric fluid until it flashes out in lightning streaks to the eye of genius. We must do the author of this little volume the justice to say that he has chosen his subjects well. Besides the first, which is not new, he has several, the mere mention of which conjures up some soft, mournful, or grand idea. Among them are, "The notes of the birds," "The decayed chapel," "The haunted wood," "The death of Napoleon," as described by Scott. "The fifth of May came amid wind and rain. Napoleon's passing spirit was deliciously engaged in a strife more terrible than the elements around. The words, 'tête d'armée,' (head of the army) the last which escaped from his lips, intimated that his thoughts were watching the current of a heady fight." Another is "The Swedish miner," and is as follows:

"The body of a young Swedish miner was once discovered in one of the mines of Dalecarlia, in a state of perfect preservation from the action of the mineral waters in which he had been immersed. No one could recognise the body except a very old woman, who knew it to be that of her lover, and embraced it with the most lively demonstrations of grief. He had perished fifty years before.

"They've born him from his ghastly tomb
Up to the blessed light of day;
And from his cheek the transient bloom
Of life, hath scarcely past away.
Upon the stripling's tranquil cheek
The bloom of life doth glow,
Like twilight's rich and rosy streak
Upon the winter snow.

"There came an aged dame; and put away
The dark hair from his pallid brow,
And look! how mournfully she doth lay
Her lips to his pale features now.
Methinks some pleasant dream of years
Long gone, comes o'er her memory;
For smiles gleam o'er her face, then tears
Gush to her aged eye,
And mournfully and low,
These words from her full heart o'erflow.

"And art thou lying here?
Beautiful as thou wast, when side by side
Our wayward feet ranged all the woodlands wide,
In childhood's thoughtless glee!
Yes, my beloved, though gone hath many a year,
I well remember thee!

"Here is the same white brow
That won my simple heart, when life's green path
Was all a paradise; methinks it hath
Its same calm beauty yet,
That cheek! though death hath somewhat changed it now
I never might forget!

"Thou wearest the red rose
I gave thee, on that gentle summer's eve,
When thou, all bloom and manliness, didst leave
Me, blushing at the door—
Alas! I little dreamed at that day's mellow close,
My love would come no more.

"After the rapid flight
Of fifty years, 'tis pleasant, in old age
To see thee, ere I end my pilgrimage.
And now we part! Thy cell,
The awful tomb, must shut thee from my sight,
I join thee soon. Farewell."

"The last night of the year" is also well done. It is headed by a verse from an old ballad, which we deem exquisite:

"Iceicles clink in the milk-maid's pail,
Youkners skate in the pool below,
Blackbirds perch on the garden rail,
And hark! how the cold winds blow."

"To a rivulet" should have been omitted. It approaches too closely the similar effusion of Mr. Bryant, "To Green river"—particularly the terminating verse.

"Favorite brook!
I love even now to pace thy grassy brink!
Upon the innocent sports of youth to think
—And on thee look.

We have other faults to allege against Mr. McLellan's present offering, viz., instances of unpardonable carelessness in the rhythm. It is provoking to see a decent composition marred by defects that might have been so easily avoided. This results from the fact that we have scarcely any regular critics in this country, and authors lounge into the presence of the great public in dishabille as familiarly as they would call upon Tom, Dick, or Harry. Here are lines all taken from page eleventh of "The fall of the Indian":

"In many a bright cascade: and his garb," &c.
"And from his o'erflowing beaker showered down," &c.
"Distaining the maple's leaf in scarlet dye," &c.
"From the maze-planted glade, or the ear," &c.
"And the rich black grape, whose clusters bend," &c.
"And happy on the last bright journey to depart," &c.

and numbers of similar imperfect lines are scattered through the leading poem. This we are more frank in noticing, because the pieces themselves are much above mediocrity, and contain passages really beautiful. For instance, what a graphic description of the Indian race and a landscape:

"No more their step is heard along the vale,
Nor shout upon the mountains, nor the songs
Of their triumphant battles. Their large bow,
And the long, feathered arrow, have been broken;
The eagle plume into the dust is cast;
The sharp canoe that rocked upon the stream
Is rotting at the river's lonely marge;
And the rude huts of their forefathers lie
A ruin in the valley; and the graves
Of their dead ancestors have been profaned.*
Oh! happy were thy people, Indian king!
When these dark woods that stand like giants round,
In their eternal grandeur, were thine own,
And the everlasting hills were thine,
Those wild, magnificent mountains, whose bright peaks,
And vapory cones, forever in the sky
Frown in majestic pomp. Thine were the lakes!
Those lonely worlds of waters! beautiful!
When the old trees that fringe their sedgy marge
Were imaged in the motionless abyss."

What a bold poetic thought is here nearly spoiled by the false metre of the second and third lines:

"How could his heart
Partake not of the deep religion of the woods,
And in the gloomy wilderness worship not!
For like a great cathedral, were their depths,
Awful and dim, and in the gloom of night
Peopled with spectres of their ancient kings
And chieftains long-departed."

Another admirable passage:

"How solemn in such wilderness, the voice
Of human worship! There no empty pomp,
Nor blaze of jewelry, nor flash of plumes,
Nor glitter of gay equipage, nor sound
Of idle laughter, ever led away
The worshiper's affections from his God.
"There only came the savage, to build up
His rude and simple altar, and there place
His offerings, the simple fruits of earth,
And kneel to the great spirit of his tribe.
There all was still, save bubbling of the brook
That gaily o'er its stony channel leaped;
Or when the mighty organ of the wind
Raised up that tuneful anthem, which has rung
Since the creation day: or when the hoof
Of the unwieldy buffalo shook the earth!
Or the wild fawn tripped through the shadowy glade,
Or passed from tree to tree, the lonely bird.
"Happy those golden days, no more to be!
The years of Indian freedom. Then he walked
A king, upon his native hills; unawed
Save by the God of thunders."

And another:

"He loved his children then; and when the God
Of the resplendent morning reached his throne
Above the mountains, clad in robes of light,
Then would he lead his boy to the sea shore,
Where the smooth beach stretched far its shelly road,
And strengthen his young sinews, in the race,
Or in rude buffets with the ruffian wave.
And well he loved to teach him how to bend
His stripling bow, and aim his mimic shaft.
And when the curling smoke above his roof,
Glowed in the yellow twilight, he would sit
Before his cabin door to watch his sports,
And hear his innocent and merry laugh.
All the gay glee of childhood's mirthful day!"

Here is poetry good enough to redeem many faults:

"A hundred hills
Are gathered round in many a gloomy group
O'erlooking with their great eternal brows,
A hundred hollow valleys, rich with herds,
Or clothed with the autumnal wealth of grain.
Proudly they lift their bare and gloomy peaks,
Their gray and tempest-beaten summits up
High in the twilight shadows—hurling back
The subtle light from all their splintered cliffs.
Methinks they stand like armed champions
Clad in the iron panoply of war,
And eager for the desolating rush
Of the mad battle!

A sepulchral gloom
Dwells in these mossy woods! there's scarce a beam
Of the far-travelled sunlight, that may pierce
This deep and massy canopy of leaves;
Or brighten the green floor that slopes beneath.
And how profound the hush! save when a gust
Of the sweet south whispers its mournful sigh
Far in their dim arcades. Oft times that sad
And desolate sobbing of the uneasy wind
In these old woods and awful solitudes,
Falls on the ear like some strange melody
Of the departed tribes, who long ago
Made here their dwelling in the savage wild."

We conclude our notice of this little volume by extracting "The notes to birds." It is charmingly written, particularly the robin, the blackbird, and the heron. We premise it by the assurance that the work is by far too good not to deserve a place in the libraries of all who take interest in the progress of American literature.

"Well do I love those various harmonies
That ring so gaily in spring's budding woods,
And in the thickets, and green, quiet haunts,
And lonely copses of the summer-time,
And in red autumn's ancient solitudes.

"If thou art pained with the world's noisy stir,
Or crazed with its mad tumults, and weighed down
With any of the ills of human life;
If thou art sick and weak, or mournest the loss
Of brethren gone to that far-distant land
To which we all do pass, gentle and poor,
The gayest and the gravest, all alike—
Then turn into the peaceful woods, and hear
The thrilling music of the forest birds.

"How rich the varied choir! the unquiet finch
Calls from the distant hollows, and the wren
Utters her sweet and mellow plaint at times,
And the thrush mourneth where the kalmia hangs
Its crimson-spotted cups, or chirps half hid
Amid the lowly dog-wood's snowy flowers,
And the blue jay flits by, from tree to tree;
And spreading its rich pinions, fills the air
With its shrill-sounding and unsteady cry.

"With the sweet airs of spring, the robin comes
And in her simple song there seems to gush
A strain of sorrow when she visiteth
Her last year's withered nest. But when the gloom
Of the deep twilight falls, she takes her perch
Upon the red-stemmed hazel's slender twig
That overhangs the brook, and suits her song
To the slow rivulet's inconstant chime.

"In the last days of autumn, when the corn
Lies sweet and yellow in the harvest field,
And the gay company of reapers bind
The bearded wheat in sheaves, then peals abroad
The blackbird's merry chant. I love to hear,
Bold plunderer, thy mellow burst of song
Float from thy watch-place on the mossy tree
Close at the corn-field edge.

Lone whippoorwill!
There is much sweetness in thy fitful hymn,
Heard in the drowsy watches of the night.
Ofttimes when all the village lights are out
And the wide air is still, I hear thee chant
Thy hollow dirge, like some recluse who takes
His lodging in the wilderness of woods,
And lifts his anthem when the world is still:
And the dim, solemn night, that brings to man
And to the herds, deep slumber, and sweet dews
To the red roses and the herbs, doth find
No eye save thine a watcher in her halls.
I hear thee oft at midnight, when the thrush
And the green, roving linnet are at rest,
And the blithe, twittering swallows have long ceased
Their noisy notes, and folded up their wings.

"Far up some brook's still course, whose current mines
The forest's blackened roots, and whose green marge
Is seldom visited by human foot,
The lonely heron sits, and harshly breaks
The sabbath silence of the wilderness:
And you may find her by some reedy pool,
Or brooding gloomily on the time-stained rock,
Beside some misty and far-reaching lake.
"Most awful is thy deep and heavy boom,
Gray watcher of the waters; thou art king
Of the blue lake; and all the winged kind
Do fear the echo of thine angry cry.
How bright thy savage eye. Thou lookest down,
And seest the shining fishes as they glide;
And poising thy gray wing, thy glossy beak
Swift as an arrow strikes its roving prey.
Ofttimes I see thee through the curling mist
Dart, like a spectre of the night, and hear
Thy strange, bewildering call, like the wild scream
Of one whose life is perishing in the sea.
"And now wouldst thou, O man, delight the ear
With earth's delicious sounds, or charm the eye
With beautiful creations? Then pass forth
And find them midst those many-colored birds
That fill the glowing woods. The richest hues
Lie in their splendid plumage, and their tones
Are sweeter than the music of the lute,
Or the harp's melody, or the notes that gush
So thrillingly from beauty's ruby lip."

Views of New-York and its Environs. No. III. Quarto. Peabody & Co. 1831.

The third number of "Views of New-York and its Environs," has recently appeared, and we must do the artist the justice to say that the engravings are beautiful, and quite superior to any of their predecessors. There are four, viz. "The Elysian Fields at Hoboken;" "The City Hotel," with a distant view of Grace and Trinity churches; "The Lunatic Asylum, at Manhattanville;" and "The interior of the Merchant's Exchange, Wall-street." An apology is made by the publisher for the delay in the appearance of the present number, which is quite pardonable if it has contributed to the excellence of the plates. The cheapness of this publication renders it accessible to all classes of society, and will probably conduce to its extensive circulation through the United States. Strangers passing through the city, or those who reside in distant parts of the Union, would find an interest in possessing such really good views of the commercial metropolis of their country and its environs, at so moderate a cost. It will make a pretty volume at the end of the year, and we are pleased to learn it commands a ready sale. Each plate is accompanied by an appropriate description.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

THE performances at the two old theatres have been generally repetitions of what we have already noticed. Miss Hughes and Mr. Sinclair, at the Park, have been going round in a small circle of operas. With Mr. Sinclair, upon further acquaintance, we are more pleased, in several instances, although the defects which struck us at first are still apparent. The precise intonation of his song, "The anchor's weighed," the other evening, was really fine. He occasionally surprises you with a passage that is delightful. His ballad called "Spring time is coming," is a pretty trifle, and exceedingly well given. We do not know who is the author, as no name appeared in the bills, nor whether it was composed before or since

Mr. Rodwell's "Draw the sword, Scotland;" whoever was the first, has the merit of originality, as they are almost literally the same. "The bird in yonder cage," by Mr. Sinclair and Miss Hughes, was exceedingly sweet. During her engagement, this young lady has shown herself a delightful singer. We were charmed with her translation of Rossini's "Di Piacere," from the "Gazza Ladra." Through inadvertence we omitted to notice at the time, that the finale to the first act of "John of Paris" has been curtailed at least twenty bars since we last heard it; it is a splendid composition, and every note should be given. The beautiful Troubadour air was admirably sung by Mrs. Sharpe, who introduced a very appropriate contra alto cadence. Jones followed, and was, as usual, chaste and good, and Miss Hughes also excellent. We regret to find Mr. Barnes persists in making faces, without reference to time or place, and is as great an enemy to the music on certain occasions, as those admirers who eat pea-nuts, and talk aloud from the front. It is shameful to see a fine melody destroyed by a hoarse laugh from the pit, at some buffoonery of a comedian, equally rude to the audience and the vocalist. Mr. Taylor, as Dandie Dinmont, at the American theatre, was guilty of the same, and spoilt Mr. Spencer's prettiest song in Henry Bertram, by several superfluous displays of his comic ability. It is to be hoped that the gentlemen of the theatres will hereafter, at least in operas, be contented to "imitate humanity" without violating the courtesy due to the audience and each other. Mr. Sinclair and Miss Hughes have closed their engagements, and taken their benefits. Mr. Hackett has made a fine hit with his "Lion of the West." We do not consider this piece as professing to illustrate the character of a Kentucky gentleman, but merely as presenting a rather exaggerated likeness of a certain class who do exist, and as not out of the legitimate range of dramatic-probability, any more than the snuff-taking Frenchman—the fine dandies—the one-legged German, and the surly Englishmen, who crowd the stage, and contribute to the mirth of the public. Most of the jokes introduced in it are really ludicrous, and the audience seem heartily pleased.

Miss Clifton at the American theatre appeared as Lady Macbeth. We regret our absence, as we are told her efforts in that character are quite successful. We, however, give her one word, as a spell to lead her onward in the difficult path she has chosen—it is study. She has the material, and a face of rare loveliness. A Mr. Keppel has attempted Richard, Hamlet, and Othello: they were complete failures in every respect. We really thought we saw Shakespeare's ghost looking exceedingly angry over the shoulders of Henry, Ann, and the rest of the spirituals in the tent scene of Richard.

The Richmond Hill theatre has been very generally admired. They have several attractive performers there, and we have had nothing better than Mrs. Duff. The address is more poetic than declamatory, and reads beautifully. We close this article by copying it as a scrap from the workshop of the author of Fanny.

Where dwells the drama's spirit?—not alone
Beneath the palace-roof, beside the throne,
In learning's cloisters, friendship's festal bowers,
Arts' pictured halls, or triumph's laurel'd towers.
Where'er man's pulses beat, or passions play,
She joys to smile or sigh his thoughts away,
Crowd times and scenes within her ring of power,
And teach a life's experience in an hour.
To-night she greets, for the first time, our donee,
Her latest, may it prove her lasting home,
And we, her messengers, delighted stand,
The summon'd Ariels of her mystic wand,
To ask your welcome. Be it yours to give
Bliss to her coming hours, and bid her live
Within these walls, new-hallowed in her cause,
Long in the nurturing warmth of your applause.
'Tis in the public smiles, the public loves,
His dearest home, the actor breathes and moves:
Your plaudits are, to us, and to our art,
As is the life-blood to the human heart;
And every power that bids the leaf be green
In nature, acts on this her mimic scene.
Our sunbeams are the sparklings of glad eyes,
Our winds, the whisper of applause that flies
From lip to lip, the heart-born laugh of glee,
And sounds of cordial hands that ring out merrily;
And heaven's own dew falls on us in the tear,
That woman weeps o'er sorrows pictured here,
When crowded feelings have no words to tell
The might, the magic of the actor's spell.

These have been ours, and do we hope in vain,
Here, oft and deep, to feel them ours again?
No—while the weary heart can find repose
From its own pains in fiction's joys or woes;
While there are open lips and dimpled cheeks
When music breathes, or wit, or humor speaks;
While Shakespeare's master-spirit can call up
Noblest and holiest thoughts, and brim the cup
Of life with bubbles bright as happiness,
Cheating the willing bosom into bliss!
So long will those who, in their spring of youth,
Have listened to the drama's voice of truth,
Marked in her scenes the manners of their age,
And gathered knowledge for a wider stage,
Come here to speed with smiles life's summer years,
And melt its winter snow with pleasant tears;
And younger hearts, when ours are hushed and cold,
Be happy here, as we have been of old.

Friends of the stage! who hail it as the shrine
Where music, painting, poetry entwine
Their wedded garlands, whence their blended power
Refines, exalts, ennoble, hour by hour,
The spirit of the land; and, like the wind,
Unseen, but felt, bears on the bark of mind;

To you, the hour that consecrates this dome
Will call up dreams of prouder hours to come,
When some creating poet, born your own,
May waken here the drama's loftiest tone,
Through after-years to echo loud and long,
A Shakespeare of the west, a star of song:
Brightening your own blue skies with living fire,
All times to gladden, and all tongues inspire,
Far as beneath the heaven, by sea-winds fanned,
Floats the free banner of your native land.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. PAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1831.

New Custom-house.—A new custom-house, adapted to the extensive and rapidly increasing commerce of New-York, has become a matter of general concern. It has long been wanted, and is now, we believe, judging from many circumstances which have come within our knowledge, imperatively called for. The building occupied for this purpose was made choice of when the revenue scarcely equalled half the present amount. It was erected for mere ordinary purposes—is not even a quarter of the size required for the convenient accommodation of the business daily transacted—and, what ought to awaken deep solicitude, is exceedingly unsafe. There is not in the whole structure a single fire-proof apartment. And when we take into view the heavy and complicated duties performed, the numerous apartments to be warmed, and that the clerks are often compelled to trim the nightly lamp, the wonder is that no accident has yet taken place. There is necessarily connected with a common brick building a considerable mass of combustible materials; there can, therefore, be no security, because a fire originating in any one of the rooms, would not only endanger, but would probably lead to the destruction of the whole edifice. This would be a misfortune of a most serious nature. Nothing could ever restore the loss, and its ruinous effects would never cease to be felt and deplored. It is not in the power of any one even to imagine the derangement, and ruin, and consequent confusion that would ensue. All the records of the department from its commencement, and all the nameless evidences of more recent transactions, involving matters of infinite importance, would be subjected to the same fatal consequences. It would entail upon the government the most aggravated mischiefs. The loss of ten times as much money as would be wanted to construct a building of ample dimensions, and of solid and indestructible materials, would be felt as a small affair, when compared with the evils that would result from the utter destruction of all the vouchers and documents now existing in the custom-house.

At the last session of congress an effort was made to obtain an appropriation that should be the means of laying the foundation of a structure which should be adequate to the complete accommodation of the customs, to grant facilities to the numerous body of respectable merchants, and be commensurate with the growing wants of this great commercial metropolis. To the surprise of not a few, and the regret of many, the scheme proved abortive. This seems the more extraordinary, when we take into view the prodigious sums which the government annually derives from this port. We might rationally suppose, that calculations of interest alone would induce congress to make a liberal grant for the preservation of property purely national, and for the greater comfort of those whose faithful services are so instrumental in adding to the increasing riches of the nation, and who, in many instances, we believe, receive very moderate compensations. But, without any reference to liberality, for we should not suspect congress of this virtue, we might still think they would be led to do it from motives of sheer selfishness, especially when so intimately connected with that of safety. It happens, unfortunately, that some members of that body have very imperfect conceptions of the extent of the business transacted in the New-York custom-house. They keep a vigilant eye upon the emoluments only, without ever looking for a moment to plans that are wise and useful, and in the end most economical. They are shocked at the idea of expending a few hundred thousand dollars for the more advantageous use of that branch of the public service, from which the government receives such bountiful support. Moreover, some of them affect to think that an appropriation for such a purpose would be a species of bonus to New-York, and for her individual aggrandizement and benefit. Nothing can be more unfair than such a suggestion. The object is in itself purely national, and every other state in the Union, whether it be Maine, Louisiana, Missouri, or any other distant member, would have an equal interest in it with the state of New-York. And beside, a large portion of the money designed for such a purpose would be expended in some of the other states; and for a very good reason, many of the materials would come from those states. We would fain hope, then, since the revenue of the present year is likely to exceed that of any other, and to go far beyond the estimates of the secretary of the treasury, that all petty calculations of temporary economy or expediency will be discarded, and a policy characterized by liberality and wisdom, such as shall be honorable and beneficial to the country, and at the same time gratifying to the citizens of New-York, will be frankly and cheerfully adopted and pursued.

To correspondents.—A friend is thanked for his information respecting the article by Mr. Paulding, published in our last number. We were already aware of the truth of the facts therein mentioned, many of which live in the recollections of a great number of our fellow-citizens.

Editor's study.—We have received an anonymous communication, purporting to be an answer to a few brief remarks which we made on the valuable little school-book, called Miss Oram's First Lessons, in which we took occasion to allude to the work in terms of approbation. We regret that any one should have so far mistaken our meaning as to think such an answer necessary. So far from disputing the axiom, "that words alone cannot convey ideas" to the uninstructed, we said, in plain terms, that our objections (to children repeating the usual definitions like so many parrots) were "not applicable to Miss Oram's book," because she had illustrated the meaning of words by pictures; "which, (we added,) being the representations of objects that are generally familiar to children, supply the place of more simple and particular definitions." But, we now say, how much better she might have succeeded in her laudable undertaking, had she accompanied those pictures with simple definitions, adapted to the humblest juvenile capacity.

We need not be told how "naturalists have classed animals," or how the great Samuel Johnson defines words. It should be remembered that they did not write for children. Miss Oram is an ardent friend, as well as an experienced and successful teacher of the little race. All instructors, however, especially those who make their own books, ought to bear in mind, that dictionaries were made for adults, and not for infants; and that, consequently, the standard definitions are not adapted to the juvenile capacity. Teachers should endeavor to discard the pride of superior learning, and let themselves down to the very lowest intellectual level of their pupils, then take them gently by the hand, and lead them gradually up the slope of knowledge.

As respects the words house, lamp, pail, &c. we have no objection to Miss Oram's definitions, as far as they go. We merely said, that without her pictures her definitions would convey no adequate idea to the pupil's mind; and we still think that her lamp, even as now trimmed by our correspondent, throws very little additional light on the subject.

Our object in noticing this little work was to recommend it to our readers; for although the authoress has not done all that we could wish, she has done much for the benefit of the rising generation, and we agree with our correspondent, that "since the work has been thus brought before the public, it is but just that its peculiarities and the design of the authoress should be fairly represented."

It offers such an arrangement of pictures as will give the sounds of the English language, by the child's being simply taught the pronunciation of their names. Instead of pursuing the usual uninteresting method of teaching alone those hieroglyphics, called letters they are associated with pictures which give ideas; and, thus losing their unintelligible nature, they become objects of interest, even to young children, because they can understand their use.

"In Hazen's Primer the words are arranged in classes, denoting animate and inanimate objects. This arrangement appears to be useless, for a child will know at once, on hearing the definition of a word, whether the thing defined have life or not."

"This system of classing words has led Mr. Hazen into many errors; for instance, he has classed the eye, ear, leg, foot, face, nose, &c. and nearly all the parts of the human body with inanimate objects, while he has classed man with animate objects. Many other absurdities and defects might be shown in Hazen's "Symbolical Primer," and in other primers, which are wholly avoided or remedied in Miss Oram's little work."

"If I had not thought," concludes our correspondent, "that primers must have influence on the infant mind, an apology might be necessary for my desiring that the principles of this little book should be properly presented."

While upon this subject, perhaps, we may be excused for printing a letter received the other day, purporting to be from a boy, at one of the academies of this city, only reminding the reader that in one of our late numbers we ventured a few remarks upon the severity and carelessness with which pupils are sometimes treated by their instructors.

GENTLEMEN,—You must know I am a young boy who have been all my life at school, and am naturally fond of study, but have quarrelled with my parents, and am very wretched by the tyranny of a master, who is "fitting me for college," as he calls it. I am beaten at school nearly every day. I am not quick at learning, although I am sure to remember what I have acquired, when I am not frightened. My master is so impatient and passionate, that even when I have sat up late in the night to conquer a hard lesson, and think I have succeeded, I find the next morning that all my knowledge is dispersed, when I am ordered like a dog to take my place and feel a pair of angry eyes glancing over me, and know that as soon as I miss a word I shall receive a brutal blow with a strap, or have my hand blistered with a ruler. The consequence is, that I hate school and teacher most heartily, and go to my class as a slave or criminal to a dungeon. As for Virgil, I hear you critics talk of his beauties, alas, they are to me only mementos of tears and agonies. I have been flogged worse than the Trojans in the battle of Troy, and am always more frightened in the tempest than Æneas and his friends. I never hear the names of Venus, Æolus, Juno, or Queen Dido, without thinking of the dinners I have lost, and the lashes that have been laid on my shoulders; and am tomorrow in expectation of having some of my bones broken at the Trojan sports. The reading your strictures in favor of what you call your young friends, the school-boys, made me feel such a love for you, and such a confidence that you would listen to my complaints, which every body else scoffs at, that I have stolen half-an-hour from my algebra to compose this. My default will make but little difference, as I am resigned to have my ears boxed immediately after breakfast in the morning, let me study ever so hard. With my best wishes for your welfare, and my cordial congratulations that you have escaped the dangerous and unhappy period of boyhood, I am, gratefully and respectfully, but very sorrowfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT JONES.

I'LL BID THIS HEART BE STILL.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS PRINGLE—MUSIC COMPOSED BY JOHN THOMSON.

I'll bid this heart be still, And check each struggling sigh, And there's none e'er shall know My soul's cherish'd woe, When the first tears of sorrow are dry.

When the first tears of sorrow are dry.

dim. pp

SECOND VERSE.

They bid me cease to weep—
For glory gilds his name;
But the deeper I mourn,
Since he ne'er can return
To enjoy the bright noon of his fame!

THIRD VERSE.

My cheek has lost its hue,
My eye grows faint and dim;
But 'tis sweeter to fade
In grief's gloomy shade,
Than to bloom for another than him!

THE BALL.

Emily to Marguerite.

Oh 'twas a brilliant ball last night!
I really cannot tell the reason
Why 'twas so charming, gay, and bright;
So far the pleasantest this season.
I wore a white crape dress and pearls,
(My whole appearance light and airy)
My soft brown hair in angel curls—
Tom said I looked a perfect fairy.
And Helen wore a satin dress,
(From grandmamma a birth-day present)
Trimmed deep with flounces of blonde lace,
And in her hair a diamond crescent.
We entered late; the room was full,
And all the world was busy dancing;
Helen looked really beautiful,
Her eyes so bright, her diamonds glancing.
And then, her tall mustachio'd beau
Attracted gazers by the dozens;
For half the people didn't know
That Tom and she were only cousins.
Oh, by the way, I'd quite forgot
To tell you Tom's arrived from Dover;
And oh, such whiskers as he's got!
He'd make a most distingué lover.
He wears a cloak deplined with furs,
Mustachios—dans le style farouche;
A pair of splendid golden spurs,
And sports an elegant barouche:
His gold repeater, diamond rings,
And smile, there seems a perfect spell in;
He flirts divinely, and he sings!
But then, he always sings to Helen.
Well, I went next on Benson's arm—
The stupid creature made me take it;
Though while I smiled, and looked so calm,
I really felt inclined to break it;
For just in front of us I saw
The colonel at a little distance,
Leaning beside the folding door,
Waiting to lend me his assistance.

Just then, my miseries to crown,
My cup of grievances to fill,
That stupid animal, young Brown,
Asked me to dance the next quadrille.
As you may think, I was enraged,
And—it was wrong to tell a story—
I faltered—that I was "engaged
To—Colonel Lancer—very sorry."

"To Colonel Lancer—on my word
He seems the fact to have forgotten;
For just now as I passed I heard
Him ask the fortune—rich Miss Cotton."
I blushed with spite, and in a pet
Was led away to the cotillion,
Where in the very self-same set
Lancer was dancing with "the million."

To punish him I would not frown,
But seemed delighted with my capture,
And flirted so with Mr. Brown
The little man was quite in rapture;
Yet still my heartless vis à vis
Stood playing with his partner's flowers;
Alas! he could too plainly see
What a one sided "case" was ours.

My changing color showed how false
My acting was—I turned to dash a
Tear from my cheek—just then a waltz
Was called, and the young French Attaché,
Count Mollineux, the famous shot
Who fought those duels at Gibraltar,
Asked me to waltz with him—I'd not
One moment's time to pause or falter.

The ring was formed—I cast one look—
Miss Cotton's arm was still in Lancer's;
It was a sight I could not brook;
I murmured "yes," and joined the dancers.
The waltz began its dizzy whirl,
And though its circling seemed eternal,
Still, when I paused, the forward girl
Was flirting with my faithless colonel.

He had not seen me join the dance—
But suddenly he ceased to fan her;

'Twas fixed on mine! that lightning glance!
In such a sad, reproving manner,
I felt, I blushed a burning red,
As if my cheeks with fire were painted;
One moment more—my color fled,
And in the Attaché's arms—I fainted!

What followed next, I cannot tell;
I know that when I did recover,
I found that broken was the spell
Wreathed round my too capricious lover;
He hung about the sofa, where
I lay reclined, with looks so tender,
As if he longed, but did not dare,
His own attentive cares to render.
The ladies called for salts, cologne,
They feared my sense again was fleeting;
One instant—I was left alone
With Lancer—how my heart was beating!
I spoke not, moved not; he called up a
Desperate look—I did not stir,
But coolly said, "pray go to supper,
Miss Cotton's waiting for you, sir."

He sighed; I took no notice; he Then seized my hand with animation,
And wildly said, "Oh, Emily!
Drive me not thus to desperation;
You know my feelings, though my true
Devoted passion never moved you,
But till this hour I never knew
How fondly, fervently I loved you!
"They say I must your presence fly,
And that I must these feelings smother;
Yet when you blushed to meet my eye,
Could I believe you loved another?
Oh no! Miss Cotton must have heard
A false report—and I—was jealous."
"Miss Cotton!" cried I—"on my word,
I think that lady's over zealous."

I know not what reply he made,
But presently I felt much better;
And when my sister Helen said
She'd call the coach, I would not let her;

But took my smiling colonel's arm
And once again the ball room entered,
Where now it seemed as every charm
Of mirth, and joy, and pleasure centred.

The lamps burned brighter than before,
And sweeter far the music sounded;
While as I trod the springing floor
My very heart with rapture bounded.
We laughed, and flirted, waltzed, and walked,
And sentimentalized together:
At last—of—something else we talked,
Beside the party and the weather.

He whispered something very sweet,
And—but I will not tell my answer;
Pray don't you think, dear Marguerite,
The name's a pretty one, of Lancer?
Well—that gay crowd dispersed at last,
All earthly pleasures pass so fleetly!
I saw Miss Cotton as we past,
And bowed to her, and smiled so sweetly!

We bade "good night," were cloaked and shawl'd,
And all so naturally it fell in,
That when the man our carriage called,
Lancer took me, while Tom took Helen.
The night was clear, and calm, and bright,
The crescent moon was gaily glancing;
The sleepy coachman cried, "all's right,"
The steps were up—the horses prancing.

Still Lancer lingered—bade good-by;
(He had not yet my hand relinquished)
I whispered, rather saucily,
"Pray, is the 'Cotton flame' extinguished?"
He laughed—bid Alphonse close the door,
Then pressed my hand, and said, "remember!"
I haven't room, my dear, for more,
But—be in town by next December.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

WE are gratified to be able to lay before our readers this week the introductory lecture delivered by Mr. G. C. Verplanck, on Tuesday evening, the twenty-second instant, before the Mercantile Library Association, at Clinton-hall. The gentlemen of this institution have organized a course of lectures for the ensuing season, likely to be generally interesting, especially as among those who have lent their assistance to Mr. Verplanck are Chancellor Kent, Albert Gallatin, William C. Bryant, J. Augustine Smith, William B. Lawrence, William Dunlap, H. E. Dwight, H. R. Storrs, and Dr. Griscom. Among the subjects to be treated on are—"The causes of European Civilization," "Political Economy," "Currency," "Commercial Law," "The Arts," "Mythology," "Natural Philosophy," and "Chemistry." This society is a noble example of the intelligence and enterprise of the commercial part of our population. The large and increasing library which has already been collected, is honorable as it is useful, especially to the youthful portion, reflects great credit on all concerned, and is well calculated to raise the character of the city. The annexed discourse was listened to by a large and attentive auditory, with every mark of interest and admiration. We take this occasion to acknowledge our obligation to the writer for permitting us to offer it for the perusal of such as were absent.

A LECTURE,

Introductory to the several courses to be delivered before the Mercantile Association of the city of New-York, during the winter of 1831-2.

BY JULIAN C. VERPLANCK.

[Published at the request of the association.]

I CONGRATULATE you, gentlemen of the Mercantile Association, on the occasion which brings us together. Your institution, founded for the moral and intellectual improvement of the commercial youth of this city, has long been eminently useful. Its judiciously selected library and well supplied reading-rooms, with the excellent lectures and addresses heretofore delivered in this hall, have proved not less honorable to the zeal and public spirit of its founders than important in their effects on the character of an immense body of young men full of ardor, intelligence, and enterprise, who are, year after year, carrying into active life the deep and lasting influences of their present pursuits and amusements.

Surrounded as they are on all sides, in this gay and opulent city, with temptations to idle dissipation or vicious indulgence, exposed to the contagion of the worst and most alluring examples, freed, as many of them are, from the salutary restraint imposed by the sanctity of the parental home, and deprived of its resources of domestic fire-side pleasures, they have discovered in these halls amusements, ever new and fascinating, innocent and intellectual. Here they have met associates and found friends eager in the same pure enjoyments. Here they have been led from harmless entertainment to useful reading, and thence onward to the most noble and invigorating exercises of the mind in the study and contemplation of physical and moral truth.

But the course of lectures which has been arranged for this winter forms a new epoch in the progress of this association. It is not merely that a fresh and valuable source of information will now be opened. That is much. But I cannot but regard the number, the talent, and the well-earned reputation of those public-spirited citizens who have volunteered to deliver the several courses, as giving a most flattering testimony to the value of this institution. It is a proof of the deep public interest taken in the character and welfare of our commercial youth, whilst at the same time it must furnish to them motives of kindling excitement in the pursuit of all that can exalt and dignify the character of an American merchant.

These gentlemen, severally and honorably distinguished in the law, science, fine arts, literature, politics, and public eloquence of the country, divided in many points of opinion, but uniting in a generous zeal for the public good, have, amidst the pressure of private avocations, found or made time to devote a portion of their talents and acquirements to the instruction of those whom I now address. It will not be invidious to distinguish amongst them two venerable and patriotic men, one of whom, for years, administered, with masterly ability, our national finances, or was engaged in the negotiation of treaties involving our dearest interests; whilst the other presided, for nearly as long a period, in the highest courts of common law and of equity in this rich and populous state, with a reputation that cannot be increased by any praise of mine.† Such are the men who now delight to unfold to the young inquirer the elements of those sciences on which their own fame was founded. It is an example worthy of republican antiquity, honorable to our state of society, and especially honorable to you, for whom the labor was undertaken. Let it be also to us and to you an aniinating example of unceasing and unflagging devotion to the common good, and the welfare of others.

I cannot but feel it as a high compliment to have been invited to deliver an introductory lecture to such a course of instruction, and for this I tender my most grateful acknowledgments.

The course of lectures intended to be delivered here, though by men intimately and extensively conversant with the subjects they have selected, must yet, from the narrow compass to which they must be confined, be but sketches, or outlines, of those several subjects.

These will stimulate the mind to inquiry, furnish broad views and leading principles, as well as point out the sources of more minute and accurate knowledge; but they will not, nor do they profess to make you masters of any of those extensive walks of science, of art, of taste, or of speculation.

To become a proficient in any one of these requires the labor of years; to become skillful in all of them must demand the constant toil of a long and studious life. Of what use then to those who can give to such pursuits little more than hasty and broken intervals of time, and minds distracted by other duties, and other cares—of what real use is that general and superficial information gained by these and similar aids?

The question is natural, and it is important. I have, therefore, thought that the reply to it, showing the true advantages of general knowledge to men engaged in active business, would be no inappropriate or unfruitful subject for this introductory lecture.

Upon this head the pedantry of erudition, and the pedantry of worldly wisdom are for once agreed in uniting to despise and degrade such acquirements, the one, viewing them as leading only to vanity and self conceit, and the other, as a trifling waste of time for no practical purpose.

Pope, a poet distinguished above his brethren for sagacity and shrewdness of observation upon men and manners, has said—

*"A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring:
There, shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
And drinking largely sobers us again."*

This opinion, so agreeable to the pride of learning, has been echoed by thousands with whom no poet would be an authority on any other question, until it has almost become an adage. Like all remarks of acute observers, and like all maxims obtaining any currency, this too has its share of truth; had it not so, it would never have been received as true. But it is true only of the smatterer in every thing; it is true only of him who has never disciplined himself to any regular pursuit whatever; of him whose superficial acquirements are not the recreations of an active and useful life, nor the decorations of a mind exercised in other and solid avocations.

Of the vague knowledge of such a man, pride and conceit may well be the result, but they are much more frequently its cause. All human knowledge, however learned arrogance may strive to disguise it, is but little. This then is truly but a question of more or less. The profoundest scholar—the man of the rarest and the loftiest science, who loses sight of this truth, and forgets the immensity of the Unknown, in gazing fondly upon his own little treasure of fancied science, may be as truly intoxicated by such comparatively shallow draughts, as the most superficial sciolist, whom he scorns. And this intoxication, too, if we can trust to frequent observation, is far more likely to befall the professed, but trifling scholar, than the accurate man of business, who seeks in books a refreshment from toil, or who flies to science to satisfy the craving desire of knowledge. But all knowledge is in itself valuable. It was made for man, and his mind was formed to covet and grasp at its attainment. It is an innate desire, springing from the highest appetencies of his nature, the desire and the object of it being alike the kind gifts of his Creator.

Let us, for a moment pause, and cast a rapid glance at the means of intellectual accomplishment which in this age and country, nay, in this very institution, are within the reach of any young man, who, without defrauding his daily calling of a single duty, or a single thought due to it, will yet devote to better objects those hours which might be passed in indolence or folly.

Let us suppose these hours faithfully and judiciously employed for a few years, and then estimate fairly the amount and the value of the information thus accumulated. Let us see whether the knowledge thus rewarding his liberal curiosity, and which must confessedly fall short of the accuracy and extent of that science, won by the exclusive votary of learning, is yet in any sense worthless or little.

It has been justly remarked by more than one philosophical observer, that there is in the nature of our mental operations and of language, in the power of classifying insulated facts and discoveries under general terms and wide laws of universal application, in the corresponding power of again deducing individual truths from these general laws, a provision for the gradual and progressive improvement of mankind. As knowledge is extended it becomes more easy of acquisition; for as the magnitude and the variety of known truths are augmented, in the same proportion the processes of study necessary to acquire them have been abridged and simplified.

An eloquent French mathematician, in a frequently quoted passage,* has admirably illustrated this truth by the history of mathematics, from the elementary propositions of geometry, reared up by the Egyptian priesthood down to the conclusions which have limited the last inquiries of the modern calculus. He has shown throughout the whole, how every discovery of genius has been accompanied or followed by a simplification of science, making these discoveries level to the comprehension of all.

Thus it is, to apply this truth to our own case, that the leisure hours of the modern merchant, should he give that direction to his studies, will soon place him far beyond the mathematical attainments of the most skillful of the doctors or professors of Padua or Paris two centuries ago. That acquaintance with the branches of mathematics, entering into the familiar uses of life, such as to the mere mathematician of our own day may seem "a little learning" indeed, was but two or three generations ago the proudest boast of those who had drunk longest and deepest at the head springs and fountains of the severer sciences. Now, surely, the knowledge so valuable then can have lost nothing of its real value in use by losing much of its rarity, and becoming more easy of access.

Nor is it alone in this rigid methodical science that the progressive accumulation of knowledge has brought with it a proportional, or more than proportional increase of facility in acquisition.

Let us select from among the illustrious dead of past ages some great man ardent in the search of philosophy, and crowned with all its honors, a man who wasted no labor on the mere curiosities of learning; whose talent, character, and station led him to apply his powerful intellect to such studies only as had a direct bearing on the uses of society or the conduct of life. Let us then estimate, at their real worth, the attainments of such a man. Let us, for example, take CICERO. He was a man of wealth, rank, and genius, whose eloquence was the rich fruit of many a midnight study, and who by that eloquence became the savior of his country. Nations were his clients, wealth and power were the reward of his talents; but, though he neglected no duty, and shrunk from no toil, he fled gladly from the tumultuous applause of the forum and the sway of the senate to the silence of his library. "Who has a right to blame me," said this model of brilliant and successful literary application, "who has a right to blame me if that time which other men are wont to bestow upon festivals and shows, upon grosser and meaner pleasures, or even upon the rest and relaxation of body and mind; if as much time as they give to convivial feasts, to their sports, or to the gaming-table, so much have I given to letters and philosophy?"

"Other studies," said this ardent and accomplished student, then in the height of his fame and the noon-day of life, "other studies belong to particular times, or places or callings, or periods of life alone; but these nourish and strengthen the youthful mind, they please and sooth old age. They adorn prosperity, they afford a refuge and consolation in adversity. They delight at home, they are useful abroad. They are with us and about us, by day and by night, on the road and in the fields."

Such was the ardent eulogy which the most accomplished man of antiquity poured forth on his favorite studies in one of the most magnificent effusions of his genius. It was doubtless just, and yet the amount of useful acquirement and elegant accomplishment, deserving, as it did, all his toils and all his praise, that this great man could attain, not only by diligent study, but by travel extensive as the then known world, and by wealth and power, devoted to the collection of books and works of art—all this was far inferior to that within the reach of any one who now listens to me.

This assertion may seem absurd. Its apparent extravagance may provoke a smile, yet the slightest analysis will convince us of its substantial truth. The orator, philosopher, and statesman of the Roman republic's last age had studied under the first teachers of Athens, then still "the mother of arts and school of sages," all that the age knew of physical philosophy. He had become intimately acquainted with the theories and conjectures of the most celebrated teachers; but he soon learned that theory and conjecture were all that they had to teach, and "finding no end, in wandering mazes lost," concluded that it was impossible for a wise man to form any definite opinion on the laws of nature. He turned away from the study of the material world, dissatisfied, declaring, with Socrates, that such inquiries were rather curious than profitable.

Let us now look upon our own times and country, and mark what are the opportunities of knowledge afforded to those who can employ the hours not engrossed by real business, in attending the lectures of some competent teacher of physical science. Here, a learned and able professor, with the aid of an apparatus in which the most recondite discoveries of science are experimentally illustrated by some of the most ingenious and delicate productions of mechanical skill, can unfold to the attentive pupil the great laws of attraction and repulsion, of motion, of mechanics, and of light. These are laws generalized from thousands of observations and experiments, perhaps destined hereafter to be more accurately ascertained, or resolved into even still more universal rules, but never to be contradicted or unsettled by any future system. He can guide you to an acquaintance with truths beyond the reach of mere observation, but learnt from the demonstration of pure reason; those mathematical laws of matter and motion, which, when once apprehended, are felt to be beyond the power of time or change; to reach far beyond the bounds of our little earth, to extend throughout all actual or possible creation, to be infinite and eternal as the Omnipotent himself, and, as it were, a natural revelation of his immutable and all-wise government.

In the kindred science of chemistry he will exhibit to you the boldest achievements of science and her humblest and most useful tools; now analyzing the atmosphere, or resolving the globe into its constituent elements; and now descending, with patient industry, to the aid of the dyer at his vat, or the metallist at his furnace; or to throw the friendly light of her safety-lamp over the perilous path of the miner in the dark bowels of the earth.

Now then, let me ask, is such knowledge, be it but general, be it comparatively superficial, can such knowledge be worthless? Had antiquity obtained a prophetic glimpse of that science now laid open to your inquiries, it would have been

"The prophet's prayer, the glad diviner's theme,
The old man's vision, and the young man's dream."

Must not such knowledge give new interest to all that we see about us? Must it not fill the soul with kindling and ennobling thoughts? Must it not give juster conceptions of the wisdom and benevolence of the Creator, of the powers, the duties, and the destinies of man?

If from natural and chemical we turn to moral philosophy, the same parallel holds good. In that most favorite study of Cicero's, the science of mind and morals, how feeble is the light that glimmered amidst the darkness of ancient discussions and systems. How rough that road to knowledge, how uncertain its attainment! But the youth who is now incited by a generous desire to know himself and his duties, can travel in a smoother road, and follow surer guides. Here he will be directed to seek light from those who have kindled the torch of science at a consecrated flame, writers who, like Fenelon and Addison and Johnson, have "given ardor to virtue and confidence to truth;" or who, like Paley or Butler, have made logic and metaphysics the handmaids of sober piety.

Of history, literature, poetry, the elegant arts, of all that by example unfolds the mysteries of the heart, of all those fair illusions which spread their charms over life, and soothe its pains or anguish, how ample is the treasure contained in any well selected English library of original and translated authors! How far superior in amount, in variety, and (with a very few rare exceptions) in excellence to the treasured volumes of Cicero's much-loved collection!

Even in jurisprudence, Cicero's own and peculiar department, the brief and elementary, but able course of commercial law to be delivered here, will afford to you information which, could it have been offered to the illustrious Roman advocate, would have filled him with delight and astonishment. I need not speak of the value of that information to you as men of business or men of the world; but independently of its immediate and personal uses, it is in itself admirable. This is not like some parts of jurisprudence, the fruit of blind usage or arbitrary enactment. It is the happy result of the energies, intelligence, enterprise, and ingenuity of the whole civilized commercial world, applied to legal purposes by a succession of the strongest and most acute judicial minds of France, Holland, test of England, and America—much the greater part of it, bearing the Cicero's own definition of rational and equitable law, being alike good law at London, Paris, Amsterdam, and New-York. Classical latinity does not even contain a name for the contract of insurance. Commerce the Romans left to be carried on by the slaves, or freedmen, of their patrician senators; and navigation was pursued only with a view to war and conquest. But in our law of insurance, that of shipping, and of exchange and negotiable paper, those sound and clear principles of reason and natural equity which the old Roman law always asserted in theory, are applied to the most ingenious inventions of modern times, for giving circulation to capital, and facility and safety to commerce.

I know not, then, why you may not with equal, and more than equal justice, apply to your own studies the eulogy of the eloquent ancient upon his. These our studies, may you say, snatched as they are amidst the calls of business, and in hours given by others to indolence or vice, "will nourish and strengthen the youthful mind, and soothe and gladden old age; they will adorn prosperity, and furnish a refuge and consolation in adversity."

The present state of society, thus abounding in the means of instruction, has one marked point of contrast to that of former ages; and it is one which is the evident tendency of some of the most important improvements of society in wealth, and skill constantly to augment. It is, that as mankind advances in art and power, the division of labor grows greater and greater. As the aggregate power of society thus increases, the danger is that that of each individual may be narrowed to the limits of his personal occupations. The ancient, like the savage, was called upon to know and to do all that could be known or done by any man of the times and nation. The member of a modern civilized state has frequently but one part to perform. He is but a single wheel or cog in a huge and complicated machine. The inevitable tendency of this is to enfeeble and dwarf the mind of every individual. The mere scholar, the mere lawyer, the mere merchant, the mere artisan, cannot attain the full perfection of his nature, or his full capacity for happiness. But it is an admirable and benevolent provision of Providence, that this very advance of the aggregate wisdom and power of society, thus swallowing up the strength of individuals, carries with it its own corrective, in those very facilities of acquirement of which I have spoken. Thus he who is confined by the order or duties of society to a single round of occupations, can yet find, in the leisure left at his own disposal, the opportunity of liberal inquiry, and that variety of contemplation which exercises and disciplines the whole intellectual man.

In this wide survey of knowledge, the pride natural to those who have successfully exerted themselves in some limited sphere, is rebuked by comparison with acquirements beyond their reach; and thus, whilst general knowledge makes man more respectable, more useful, and more happy, it cannot fail, unless in minds singularly ill constituted, to produce that rational humility, so finely called by Burke, "the deep and broad foundation of every virtue."

In addition to these considerations of the benefits of an acquaintance with science to man, in his personal and individual interests alone, there are others, touching the common interests of society. In proportion as knowledge is widely diffused, morals are secured and liberty protected. If there is any circumstance wherein the present age bears an advantageous comparison with preceding times, such as to authorize a rational and confident expectation of the extension and permanence of free institutions, it is to be found here. Probably France and England a century ago contained as many men profoundly skilled in their several departments of science, learning, and art as they now do; but how different was the state of the general mass.

It was, I believe, Steele who, in describing the learned lawyer of his day, makes his whole conversation begin and end with the great case of Grimgriber. This was, of course, a caricature, but still from the hand of such a master it was probably a likeness, though broad and distorted. But it was also in some degree the portrait of every other class. Civilization had then divided society into its several occupations, but general information had not yet corrected the narrowness which accompanied that division. The man of letters was then a mere man of the closet, or else a mere author about town, the dependant of the great and of the theatres; and, in either case, equally ignorant of the substantial business of the world. Their Grimgriber was, as it might happen, the slang of the town, or the pedantry of ancient metres and philological trifling. The merchant was proud of knowing nothing beyond his counting-house, and the country gentleman led a life of vulgar enjoyment and boisterous ignorance. Below these there was no public, who read or who reasoned. In France this state of things was varied only by the more effeminate profligacy of the great, and those who imitated them, and the still lower degradation of the peasantry. Commerce, that enlightener of nations, has, during the last hundred years, done much in England in breaking down those party-walls which penned in knowledge among the classes of its immediate professors. Much still remains to be done; but the effect has been already seen in liberalizing and improving the law, the literature, and the science of England. They have come forth from their cloisters, and fitted themselves to the society of men. It has been felt among England's merchants, her farmers, and her mechanics. They have studied their own interests, they claim their own rights, they instruct those who were heretofore their teachers. In France this state of society continued until the revolution. It was from this cause mainly that the French revolution, after dawning so brightly, was so soon and so long overcast with dark and bloody clouds. That liberty it then promised did not come until two generations had been successively thinned by the guillotine and the bayonet, by battle and massacre, in the streets of Paris and the woods of La Vendée, on the sands of Egypt and the snows of Russia, and the blood-drenched plains of Flanders.

I need scarcely say that it was to a contrary state of society here that our own revolution was chiefly indebted for its calm and prosperous issue.

Here was a public fitted by reading and reflection to comprehend, and to feel the reasoning of the patriots who called upon them to withstand the aggressions of their rulers. Here was a people upon whom the wisdom and argument of the founders of our constitution could not be wasted. Therefore it was, that America alone, of all the nations of the earth, has passed tranquilly from a warlike revolution to a peaceful and stable republic. This glorious possession of regulated liberty it is for us to preserve by the same means that enabled our fathers to achieve it. The member of an ignorant community must hold his liberties and his property by a precarious tenure. It is only in an enlightened republic that the people know all their rights, and feel all their duties. Above all, it is there only that the rage of faction, which in ignorant democracies has always broken out into bloodshed and violent revolution, is mitigated into the fair contests of parties, who strive for victory through the press and at the polls, according to the rules prescribed by the constitution and laws of their country.

But these exalted duties of guarding our civil liberties and watching on the bulwarks of our constitution, though the most precious are not the most constant, often not the most useful privileges of the well-informed and patriotic citizen.

There are numerous subjects of internal legislation, of municipal administration, of the management of the ordinary machinery of society, forcing themselves upon the attention of the most careless, and the most selfish, and affecting the interests and happiness of every man. The questions of currency and banking, the laws of taxation, and public debt, alike applicable to the finances of an empire, and those of a town, the administration of poor laws, of charities, of schools, of prisons, of markets, even of pawnbroker's shops—all these are subjects involving the welfare and comforts of thousands. Upon all of them we may have the assistance of a long-continued and a broad experience, and of the reasoning of good and wise men, so that he who presumes to decide upon them from his own first impressions, without consulting those aids, is in his way but a rash theorist. On all these subjects, quackery, under the disguise of plain common-sense, self-interest, masked as philanthropy or public spirit, are constantly at work. All these questions require in such a government as ours a large and intelligent public, some of them prepared to reason and investigate for themselves, and many well fitted to comprehend and judge.

Considerations of the same nature give a similar value to the general cultivation of literature and of taste in the arts. Most powerful is the sway exercised by those mighty agents over the morals of the community. Whether or no you choose to belong to it, they will form for themselves a public, and they will influence and govern it. Of that public your friends and neighbors, your wives and sisters and children, will be a part.

This influence is every where. It pervades the myriads of books which the prolific press pours forth, the daily sheet, the light periodical, the popular exhibition, the ornaments of our houses, the conversation of our firesides.

The author or artist who has the power of pleasing, has committed to his charge a vast control over the tastes, feelings, and sentiments of all within his reach. But he is himself re-acted upon by those whom he influences. He that hopes to please must accommodate his talent to the tastes and habits of those whom he addresses. "Unhappy Dryden—" said the great ethical poet of England, with a touching brevity, as he mourned over the fatal prostitution of his master's genius dragged down from the pure elevation whither his nature gave him to soar, and forced to grovel in the filth his patrons loved. In the words of another man of genius*, kindred to his own, but of happier fortune and unspotted fame, lamenting over the failure of that poem of epic chivalry which Dryden had planned, in the hope of rearing a monument worthy of his own fame, and that of his country—

"Dryden in immortal strain
Had raised the Table Round, again,
But that a ribbald king and court,
Bade him toil on to make them sport;
Demanded for their niggard pay,
Fit for their souls, a looser lay,
Licentious satire, song, and play.

The world defrauded of the high design,
Profaned the God-given strength, and marr'd the lofty line."

Our authors, artists, editors, and publishers may have a ribbald public to deal with as well as Dryden his ribbald king and court. If your ingenious minds revolt with disgust at that thought, you will feel it to be your duty to aid in averting such an event by acquainting yourselves with a sound, an undefiled, and wholesome literature, and thus becoming a part—and if a part, then certainly an influential and ruling part of that reading public. Thus it is that the literature which now serves to amuse your youthful hours may hereafter be the means of guarding the morality of your own homes from contamination, or of cheering, animating, and aiding the literary talent of your country when directed to its best and only true end,

"To raise the genius, and to mend the heart."

I have thus far considered the advantages of a liberal curiosity as confined to the opening of new sources of happiness within yourselves, or as diffusing light and truth over the wide surface of a well-informed public. But it would be unjust to the native talent of my country did I omit one other, and not the least happy of its effects.

I will not meddle with the controversy on the existence, or the causes of peculiar original genius—the inquiry whence it comes, that certain individuals are peculiarly fitted for excellence in certain walks of speculation or of art. It is enough that this difference among men does exist. There are minds whose best powers seem to slumber until the excitement of some occupation or study congenial to their faculties rouses them into gigantic vigor. Now the acquisition of varied, though it be not profound knowledge, is precisely the most efficient mode of presenting to every ardent and stirring mind the subject best fitted to its powers and tastes. Then it is that natural talent feels its strength. It expands and dilates itself. The attention is roused, the curiosity vividly excited, the faculties sharpened. The duties of life need not be neglected, for that would be unworthy of a mind capable of such energies. It tries its strength in solitude and silence; but society, perhaps the civilized world, at last gathers the fruits of those solitary efforts.

Such were the studies and experiments of Benjamin Franklin. I need not dilate on his character, or the incidents of his life, for they are doubtless familiar to you. His unrivaled sagacity and common sense must have given the printer of Philadelphia wealth and distinction anywhere. The revolution calling out as it did the whole talent of the nation, would have made him a legislator and a statesman. But it was his taste for general knowledge and love of scientific information, turning his mind to observation and experiment upon nature, that made him the discoverer of the laws of heat and of the principle of electricity. This added dignity and influence to his character and opinion, in his own time, whilst in the present day, the patriot whom we honor as one of the founders of our independence and our constitution, is revered by every other civilized people as the sage who has given protection to their dwellings against the lightning of heaven and comfort amidst the blasts of winter.

In the same manner it has happened with our own age that some of the most splendid works of literary genius and the most admirable discoveries of scientific investigation have been produced by the leisure studies of men engaged in commercial business or professional labor.

There is scarce a single science among those to be explained to you by the eminent lecturers who are to succeed me, which will not furnish some striking example of this fact. Look, for instance, at chemistry. Sixty years ago it was a compound of wild hypotheses, and insulated facts or unexplained processes. The common consent of the scientific world ascribes its elevation to the rank of a science to Priestley. He was by profession and preference throughout life a teacher of religion and of learning, and an unwearied and prolific theological and metaphysical author. He was not—at least in my judgment, for it may be that in this respect I wrong his memory—he was not possessed of any remarkable force as a moral reasoner. But he had to an uncommon degree that thirst for information, that liberal curiosity to which no knowledge appears indifferent. An accidental circumstance of his life, his living in the neighborhood of a great brewery, directed his attention to the examination of the gas, then known under the name of fixed air. There, at once, his inquisitive spirit found a field ample enough for its exercise.

To chemistry he devoted his leisure time reserved from the faithful discharge of numerous other duties—and that time only. No man could be more patient, more industrious, or more ingenious in inventing and applying those experiments so happily termed by Bacon, "the judicious interrogation of nature." His interrogations followed each other with restless rapidity, and nature replied by the revelation of mystery after mystery.

Thus did Priestley win for himself the proud title of the father of modern chemistry. This science has since been wonderfully augmented in its power over nature, as well as improved in the philosophical accuracy of its arrangement and nomenclature; but the brilliant discoveries and labors of subsequent chemists, from Lavoisier to Davy, who have devoted their whole lives to this study, so far from eclipsing the glories of those of Priestley's leisure, may in fact be considered as being but their development and consequences.

Turning from the material to the moral sciences, we may observe a precisely similar instance in the history of political economy.

It is with the reverence due to an intellect, of which I can never enough admire the penetration, the order, the comprehensiveness, and the strength, with the gratitude due to one whom I view as a public benefactor, and to whom I feel deeply indebted for the discipline and improvement of my own mind, that I pronounce the name of David Ricardo.

He was, as many of my readers know, a London banker, and acquired in that business a most ample fortune. He was also many years a member of the British parliament, where he was very prominent and efficient on all subjects of finance and currency. Yet, amidst the daily pressure of such employments, he was able to concentrate his mind to one favorite investigation, that of the principles of political economy. The French and Italian economists had been fertile in ingenious theories, which, though they had not the merit of truth, had the utility of affording a convenient basis for reasoning. Stewart had collected many facts, and explained some of them. Galliani, Turgot, and, above all, Adam Smith, had gone further. They had arranged and analyzed, and given to political economy the method and clearness, but neither the precision nor the certainty of a science. What the statesmen and philosophers of Europe had failed to achieve, whether in the learned ease of universities, or aided by the experience of the bureau, was effected by the English banker in hours borrowed from the turmoil of the exchange and the stock-market.

He it was, who, when the governments, the capitalists, and the talent of Great Britain, during the suspension of specie payment, after deceiving themselves, had combined to delude the people on the depreciation of bank paper, dissipated that delusion by the clear evidence of reason and fact, proved the mischief it was producing, and pointed out the remedy. His other and more elaborate writings, on the fundamental principles of political economy, are full of the most original and the severest reasoning, but always leading to the most practical conclusions. His masterly analysis of the manner in which labor governs the exchangeable value of the products of human industry, his discovery of the ruling principle of the laws regulating the rates of profit and interest, his development of the true doctrine of agricultural rent, and his application of the whole to the theory of the operation of taxes, appear to me to be the most admirable intellectual exploits of the present age. They have formed a new era in the science of enlightened political administration; and unless my admiration of his genius deceive me, Ricardo is destined to be the guide and instructor of future statesmen, and the legislator of all well-governed nations.

I have trespassed too long upon your patience, but I cannot refrain from adding to these memorable examples in the two most modern of the sciences, another of eminence in literature, gained under similar circumstances. It is one that, whilst it illustrates my argument, affords me a most fitting occasion to pay a passing tribute to the memory of a venerable friend, the late William Roscoe of Liverpool. He has long ago received the richest offerings of American eulogy. The praise which Washington Irving* has bestowed upon him, as a scholar and a gentleman, must be familiar to most of you. With his accustomed graceful and polished eloquence of style, he has painted Roscoe as having almost created his own mind, springing up and forcing its way through a thousand obstacles, as self-prompted, self-sustained, and almost self-educated; conquering every obstacle, and making his own road to fame and fortune, and after becoming one of the ornaments of the nation, turning the whole force of his talents and influence to advance and embellish his native town. He has pointed out "his private life as peculiarly worthy the attention of the citizens of our young and busy country, where literature and the elegant arts must grow up side by side with the coarse plants of daily necessity, and must depend for their culture, not on the exclusive devotion of time or wealth, but on hours and seasons snatched from the pursuits of worldly interests by intelligent and public-spirited individuals." He has alluded to the dignity with which Roscoe sustained the reverses of fortune in his old age, and the solace he then found in the company of those mute loved associates, whom his muse has hailed as the "teachers of wisdom, chiefs of elder art."

To the justice or the beauty of Irving's eulogy in these regards, I could add nothing; but it was my own good fortune to have viewed Roscoe under yet another aspect.

The circumstance of my having, as a member of the legislature of this state, been officially engaged upon the improvement of the penitentiary system, which subject had attracted much of Mr. Roscoe's attention, led to the renewal of a slight personal acquaintance that I had formed with him several years before, and to a correspondence that lasted till his death. I can bear testimony to the philanthropic zeal with which he entered into the examination of that and of every question of improvement on this side of the Atlantic—to the warm interest he took in every thing that concerned the cause of civil or religious liberty, of education, or of humanity; to his zeal, his courage, and his unwearied efforts in promoting the success of all of them.

As teaching by his own example and by his writings the value of a union of commerce with intellectual pursuits; as showing, by his life, how they may be made to harmonize and benefit each other, as the founder of the Athenaeum, of Liverpool, upon which this and similar establishments in America were modelled, we may justly regard him as one of the fathers of this institution. Such, I am sure, would have been his own feeling toward it. He would have joyed over the advantages that it now affords to the youth of New-York with a truly paternal fondness.

He died during the last summer, at the venerable age of eighty years, retaining, to the very last, his activity of mind, his love of letters, and his zeal for the service of mankind. His death was mourned by the intelligent and the good of Great Britain, as a public loss. Upon us, too, his memory has claims. I have therefore thought that this place, and the occasion of opening a course of varied instruction before a commercial audience of New-York, demanded this public tribute to the talents and worth of WILLIAM ROSCOE.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

La Muette de Portici, opera en cinq actes, musique de D. F. E. Auber, has probably created more sensation throughout Europe than any other opera. The existing discontents in France against bigotry and the Bourbons, the extraordinary nature of the piece, which is susceptible of great dramatic interest and scenic effect, added to the superb music of the composer, and the talents of the vocalists, caused an enthusiasm in Paris amounting to mania; and the same feeling, if possible, more exaggerated, attended its representation at Brussels, and, in a more modified form, in its progress throughout the German states. In England it was produced with great splendor at the Theatre-royal, Drury-lane; but its nature was materially altered, it being converted from recitative, judiciously enough, into dialogue, and from five acts cut into three—Mr. Braham was engaged as first tenor, Mr. Cooke second tenor—Mr. Bedford the bass singer, and Mr. Bland, were also in the piece. Miss Betts, a bravura singer, was the prima donna. If we were to compliment the London musical director of this piece highly for his arrangement of the music, we should write contrary to our judgment. Much miserable trash has been introduced, composed by some individual of the name of Livius. Mr. Cooke, likewise, has undertaken to insert a song for himself, and which is published as the composition of Cooke and Auber; and he has inserted a ballad, adapted from Auber, but not found in the score of this opera; it is, however, very beautiful, and one of the principal features in the English piece—we allude to the aria, "My sister dear"—but although we make every allowance for introduction, and even alteration, in the production of foreign works, because the idiom of the languages and the discrepancy of manners between a French and English audience, render such alterations necessary to insure success, yet we should be inclined to supply deficiencies from standard works of the same class, and to introduce every practicable piece of the original. This has not been done by the London director; indeed he has been shamefully remiss. The most beautiful and effective morceau in the opera has been omitted. We mean the duet between Masaniello and Pietro, "Mieux vaut mourir;" and all those who heard the effect produced by Monsieur St. Aubin, who was not extraordinary as a singer, and Monsieur Bivat, of the New-Orleans company, especially in that spirited portion of it which conveys this sentiment,

"Amour sacré de la patrie,
Rends nous l'audace et la fierté,
A mon pays je dois la vie,
Il me devra sa liberté."

will feel at once that the omission in the English version was an abominable oversight. However, the fine singing and acting of Braham, the vocal talents of Messrs. T. Cooke, Bedford, Bland, and Yarnold, with Miss Betts, and the naïvete of a young French actress, who originally played Fenella, and was succeeded by Mrs.

W. Barrymore, caused the opera to be highly successful. The version submitted to our citizens by the management of the Park theatre, is that which was adopted at Drury-lane, after the part of Masaniello had been entrusted to Mr. Sinclair, and when it was played as an after-piece—in short, as a musical melo-drama. Great expense has been incurred in the scenery, which is beautiful; also in the dresses and decorations; and the chorus has been well drilled; but the cast of the characters, considering the weight and consequence of the piece, has been shamefully neglected, and proves that no musical director of any tact has been occupied in the details. For instance, the music of the princess, written for a high soprano, is fixed upon Mrs. Sharpe, a lady who has, unluckily, a very low contra-alto voice. The Prince Alfonso, a remarkably high tenor part, is given to Mr. Thorne, who, unfortunately, is a bass singer, and, consequently, the whole of their music is completely ruined. This is a very inexcusably short-sighted arrangement. If an opera be worthy of great expense in dresses and scenery, at least the musical part, of which such things are but the ornaments, ought to have some little attention. But if it is to be produced as a melo-drama, we have already seen it performed at the Park with a quantum sufficit of ranting and red fire. To enchain the attention of the best portion of the public, as in the case of Cinderella, by which class alone opera is supported, good music will go further than anything else; and Masaniello, properly sustained, would be heard with pleasure long after waltzes, volcanos, dances, and devilry had ceased to attract. As it respects Cinderella, we know that numerous professors of music in this city continually paid to hear it, and recommended their pupils to go for improvement. We doubt that, unless it be to hear Mr. Sinclair, and see the spectacle once, any great musical attractions will be here found to induce such an exertion on their parts. Why, we ask, did not Mr. Jones appear as Alfonso, with Mrs. Austin, or Miss Hughes, as the princess? One or the other could surely have been procured. The forcing Mrs. Sharpe, with a low contra-alto voice, to follow Madame St. Clair, who is a well-instructed soprano singer, is an act of great injustice.

We must not omit to observe the fine effect of the organ in the chorus in the chapel. We compliment Mr. Sinclair on his general appearance, acting, and singing. His barcarole, at the commencement of the second act, "Behold, how brightly breaks the morning," was delightfully executed, as was also "My sister dear;" and the concluding mad scene gave him an opportunity to display himself to the audience more advantageously than on any former occasion. Two very prominent objects in the piece, also, were Mr. Bisset's whiskers, which were altogether too heavy for a chorus singer. Is there not an impropriety in Fenella's participating so cordially in the dance, considering all circumstances? We have had but a single opportunity to hear this opera, but that was sufficient to excite regret that such a noble opportunity as is even yet within the manager's reach of repaying the lavish liberality of the public with a strong cast of the piece, should be neglected. Indeed, we were not singular in our opinion, for a cry was raised from various quarters at the conclusion, evincing a dissatisfaction in this particular on the part of the audience. We can give our unmusical readers an idea of the cause of our censure in no better way than by supposing a tragedy, with the different characters of which they are familiar, should be marred in this manner by a similar transposition of the performers:—Macbeth, Mr. Jones, Lady Macbeth, Miss Hughes; or, Hamlet, Mr. Sinclair, Ophelia, Mrs. Austin, will afford an idea of the bad arrangement of which we complain in the present representation of Masaniello. We trust it will yet be rectified.

FINE ARTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

I WAS much pleased to learn, by a notice in the Mirror of week before last, that a prospectus had been issued for publishing a National Portrait Gallery. In common with every lover of the fine arts, I wish Mr. Herring abundant success. As an object of taste merely, the project is worthy of patronage, and may be made to do honor to the country. We have, certainly, artists among us, whose works will bear honorable comparison with those of other countries; witness the decorations of a late number of the Mirror. But there are other, and higher objects to be attained by such a publication. If the biographical notices are ably executed, compendious, graphic, and spirited, as they should be, it will furnish a very desirable text-book for reference, useful alike to the politician, the historical and the general reader. To the young, the work could not fail of being an acquisition of no small importance. It would excite curiosity, lead to inquiry, and stimulate to emulation. As a help to the memory, the plates would be of eminent service. The power of association in this way is wonderful. I remember to have read, when young, a work on biography, containing portraits of a part only of the subjects; and the result is strikingly in point. My recollection of every face in the book is fresh and vivid, after a lapse of some twenty years; and the image of the person as distinctly calls to mind the character, and most important incidents in the life of the individual portrayed. On the contrary, those sketches which were not thus illustrated, have either faded entirely from the memory, or left impressions more confused and indistinct.

With these hints on the utility of the proposed work, I beg leave to express my earnest wishes that it may be brought forward, and in a style to merit liberal patronage. N.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

ADVERTISING FOR A WIFE.

It is said to be quite customary in Paris for large numbers of the lower orders to fit themselves with matrimonial companions by advertising for them in the newspapers. In the midst of such an immense population, where several families live in the same house for years without knowing each other's names, there is doubtless an advantage in breaking at once through the ordinary ceremonials, and in each party frankly disclosing what they want and have to offer. In a society where this is not sanctioned by fashion, nothing can appear more ridiculous. Fancy a young girl gravely appealing to the bachelor portion of her fellow-citizens as follows: "Wanted a husband, of good health, mind, and figure, with a decent property and respectable connections. He must not be testy nor ugly, nor be given to late hours, but must be possessed of a domestic disposition, and be willing to love his wife with all his heart. The undersigned is just turned of nineteen, and is allowed to be very pretty and amiable. She has light blue eyes, a fair complexion, graceful figure, and pretty foot. Her features generally are good, her expression intelligent; there is to be found no disposition better than hers. She is an excellent housewife, and is well calculated to make a sensible man happy. As she will be entirely dependent upon him for fortune, she will be more likely to look up to him as her natural protector and best friend, from whom must flow all her comforts, and whom she is by gratitude, as well as love, bound to reverence and make happy. The most satisfactory reference can be given as to respectability, character, &c." SUSAN HOPEFUL."

Some fling their descriptions into the form of an advertisement of a horse, as, "To be married, within a few months, Eloise La Rose, aged eighteen, of beautiful form, and warranted amiable, affectionate, and skilful. Her elegance attracts the notice of every beholder; and what her beauty excites of expectation her mental qualities realize and surpass. For further particulars, and all the necessary references, apply at No. 19 Love-lane, near Lavender-square, up stairs in the seventh story."

The gentlemen write thus:—"A bachelor, in affluent circumstances, but rather advanced in years, is desirous of procuring a cheerful, robust, and affectionate wife. She must have received a tolerable education, and be of a good person, and no fortune is required. The subscriber keeps a coach and two servants, and she who answers his wishes will find an agreeable life, and shall be heir to all his property. He is not graceful and stirring enough to undertake to find such an one by the ordinary embarrassing and sometimes humiliating preliminaries of courtship. HENRY FABRE. "Address him at this office."

A friend of mine, now in France, in looking over a late Paris journal, discovered one, which I shall endeavour to translate, and afterwards mention the circumstances added by my informant.

"To pretty and amiable young unmarried females. Highly advantageous. The young gentleman whose name stands at the termination of this advertisement is desirous of uniting himself to some one whose tastes are similar to his own, and indeed he will be satisfied with no less than one of very superior attainments and personal attractions. She must be young, for as a man endures much longer than one of the other sex, and is in his prime, both of mind and body, when she begins to dim her lustre of both, it is proper he should be at least several years her senior. She must be pretty, for although beauty by itself is valueless, and may soon become tiresome and disagreeable, yet when the understanding of the husband is pleased, it is better if possible that his eye and fancy should be so too. The subscriber is not tall, and hates to walk with a lady who can look over his shoulder, therefore would prefer one under the middle height; and she must have a soft, small, white hand, a pretty foot, a graceful form, and a face that expresses well grief and joy, and particularly love. He would not wish a wife, though more beautiful than Venus, if she had not the natural gift of casting an affectionate look, so as to communicate to the soul of her adorer, at a single glance, all that was passing in her own. She must have some talent for music, and be able to dance and sing when required. She must enjoy a rich stanza, a sweet song, a merry tale, and a wise essay; and in listening to a pathetic story the tears must spring into her eyes. No sensible man need despair of living happily with her who has a clear perception of the ludicrous as well as of the sentimental. She must be an excellent housewife, and the prime object of her education must have been to comprehend all the infinite artifices of women to make home neat, cheerful, and happy. Her religion must be calm and holy, but not bigoted. She must love nature, and be contented to submit when her husband requires submission, and that without remonstrance, whether he be right or wrong. The writer of this has seen much of the sex, and often met all the qualities above-mentioned in separate persons, and sometimes with additional ones of a very dazzling kind, but never a combination of the whole in one. Sappho is beautiful in person, but a fool. Marie affectionate, amiable, and talented, but would never do for a picture. Rosalie has both loveliness and intelligence, but no heart, and sheds her favors on all alike. There are two others whom, although not exactly the thing, he would willingly receive, but one loves him not, and the other is—married. The person putting forth this advertisement is rich, young, handsome, and accomplished. Every thing is his that could be bestowed by nature or fortune. If he is not famous it is because he prefers happiness to celebrity; if not already married, because as he looks to that event as one on which his whole earthly bliss will be staked, he is resolved never to enter it but under the most favorable circumstances. LOUIS BERNARD," &c. &c.

The person from whom I obtained this singular notice informed me, that led on by curiosity he was induced to seek his acquaintance, and straightforth struck into a friendship with him of a confidential nature. He was one day sitting with him in his residence, when a letter was handed to Monsieur Bernard, from a gentleman in a distant part of the kingdom, representing himself as the father of a young lady exactly answering his description. The communication was written in an agreeable style, and an extract may please the reader, as a curious instance of the great changes which may be wrought in our habits and feelings by living in the midst of an immense population, and by the character of our society:

"She is," continued the father, "without exception, the most charming, attractive, and beautiful young girl in the whole country, and as modest as she is lovely. She possesses a heart strongly prone to fall in love, but as I have been unfortunate in life, and am reduced to a sphere much beneath that in which I originally moved, I am unwilling to waste so much worth upon any one within the circle of our acquaintance, and have, therefore, guarded her actions, her looks, and even her thoughts with a never sleeping watchfulness. If you are what you represent yourself, of which, of course, you have it in your power to satisfy me, I am bold to assure you that you will have no difficulty in winning a heart that hangs in her bosom like a ripe piece of fruit ready to fall. JOSEPH MURAT."

"P. S. Of course my daughter does not know of my writing this."

"As I was traveling merely for amusement and to see the world," says my correspondent, "and this was an adventure which promised me both amusement and instruction, I accepted the invitation of this 'Celebs,' and we sat off together to pay the little incognito Hebe a visit. We found her living, as her father had stated, in an humble cottage in the south of France. Her parents were both alive, and she had a whole host of beautiful young brothers and sisters, fresh as so many cherubs in a picture. For herself, she was more than even the partial pen of her fond father could describe her. The young man was immediately enraptured, and the girl, by some well thrown in obstacles, managed by her parents, was soon as much in love as he. They were actually married in less than a month, and I have since heard from him that he is so completely happy in his choice, that he fears he might have searched all his life in the ordinary way and not found one so well suited to his wishes."

It is true that this seems rather a joke to us plain people this side the water, but I am of opinion that in the course of the next several hundred years, our posterity will be familiar with this method of ending their matrimonial speculations. For my part, courtship, as it is carried on at present, seems almost as ridiculous, if not more so, than the device of Mr. Louis Bernard, and I fear sadly that it is seldom sanctioned by the same successful results. Besides offering to the young man a much narrower field of observation, it is not so likely to place him in the possession of the facts, some of which he sees, perhaps, too late for redress. There must be even in our own country many a gay belle, who beneath her light, fashionable exterior, and apparent merriment, conceals certain reflections upon the society about her, and a feeling that she must soon end her brilliant career in some kind of matrimony, and plunge into the irreparable thralldom with a consciousness that she might have been happier. She may have secured rank—splendor—fashion—but how many tender and noble qualities she will look for in vain in the person she has sworn at the altar to obey? I can fancy in what form one of these would publish her wishes—perhaps veiled under an assumed name. It would be something as follows:

"A young girl who is called beautiful, and believes herself amiable and intelligent, is sick of the trifling and heartlessness of fashion, and desirous of uniting herself to a gentleman and an honest man. He must be one whom she can love less for the nobleness of his person, than that of his mind and heart. He must be of such an education and turn of mind, that he may conduct her into any circle of society without disgracing her by his ignorance, and can, if necessary, remain with her at home without wounding her by ill-nature. He must have acquired already the love of his family and friends, for the good treatment of those with whom he has been accustomed to live, will be the best pledge of his gentleness to his wife. His habits must be regular—his manners frank—his person prepossessing—his talents acknowledged—his character unstained. He must be neither soldier, sailor, nor politician, nor be in any way touched with ambition; but although he might be great abroad, were he so to choose, he must be content with peace and happiness at home. Let such an one present himself to A. L. and if love and other circumstances permit, she will devote herself to him as a wife should."

My fair readers cannot conceive the possibility of their ever resorting to such a method, but let them reflect upon the usual one. Two young persons are acquainted perhaps several months, perhaps so many years, by bowing to each other in the street, or meeting in the parlor or the ball-room. They are pleased with each other's appearance and superficial accompaniments; sing, dance, flirt together, and then—marry. What do they know of each other's temper and general habits of life? What dark surprises and disappointments too frequently follow! In what way will they beguile the time when removed, as they often must be, from all artificial excitement, they are flung into each other's society, where the slightest roughness of manner, or selfishness and coldness of heart, cannot fail to be betrayed? When plunged together into calamity, (for who can hope to escape it, even among the highest and the greatest?) how little do they understand what strength of character and nobleness of soul are possessed by the other to bear up cheerfully in trouble, and be as kind and gentle in adversity as they were in prosperity? FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

ON THE DEATH OF MISS FANNY V. APTHORP.

BY NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

'Tis difficult to feel that she is dead.
Her presence, like the shadow of a wing
That is just given to the upward sky,
Lingers upon us. We can hear her voice,
And for her step we listen, and the eye
Looks for her wonted coming with a strange
Forgetful earnestness. We cannot feel
That she will no more come—that from her cheek
The delicate flush has faded, and the light
Dead on her soft dark eye, and on her lip,
That was so exquisitely pure, the dew
Of the damp grave has fallen! Who, so loved,
Is left among the living? Who hath walk'd
The world with such a winning loveliness,
And on its bright, brief journey, gather'd up
Such treasures of affection? She was lov'd
Only as idols are. She was the pride
Of her familiar sphere—the daily joy
Of all who on her gracefulness might gaze,
And, in the light and music of her way,
Have a companion's portion. Who could feel,
While looking upon beauty such as hers,
That it would ever perish! It is like
The melting of a star into the sky
While you are gazing on it, or a dream
In its most ravishing sweetness rudely broken.

MR. P. CALAMUS.

BY THE SAME.

P. (qu. patience) Calamus, Esq., editor of a weekly paper devoted to manufactures, commerce, agriculture, the arts, poetry, politics, and religion, sat one bright morning in the gown of his vocation, (a jaunty calico with a yellow sprig, that had hung as a curtain over the bed in which he was born) reading through his horn-rimmed spectacles, a new novel that had been laid that morning upon his table. A chair in which Washington had once sat, (so averred the veracious auctioneer who knocked it down to him at a sale of tri-legged furniture in Ann-street) had the honor to sustain his somewhat attenuated proportions, and beneath his elbow stood a structure of deal, called by courtesy in the inventory which last enrolled it, a table. Some fifty unopened weeklies, dailies, and other ephemera were tossed into one of its corners, a pair of scissors, some curiously cut and blotted scraps, and a pen redolent of unwiped antiquity, occupied the other, and in the centre stood the three necessities—inkstand, wafer, and sand box—clotted and sodden together by the sprinklings of innumerable inspirations. His room, a corner divided by a rough partition from the upper story, whence his enlivened hebdomadal issued, was pasted over with heads of Franklin, Washington, and other heroes and sages, with here and there a stock anecdote, and a maxim from "Poor Richard," and in the corner, upon a type-box for a pedestal, by way of elegance, stood a noseless bust of Voltaire—its infernal grin reduced by the excision to a most comical expression of ferocity. A triangular shelf across one of the angles of the room, supported a much thumb'd Johnson, a lamp-filler, and an imperfect copy of the "Loves of the angels." On a peg near it hung a well-brushed hat of domestic fabric, and under it a black coat with flaps of a most generous amplitude and length. A box upon the floor, containing a fresh sod, (the editor chewed) and a curtail dog sleeping on the bad poetry under the table, completed his "whereabout."

To describe an editor's physiognomy would be "telling." Jupiter and all great characters prefer having that left to the imagination. A nose is a nose, though you call it a large one, and to describe that of an editor!—you see the absurdity at once. Passing that over then—Mr. P. Calamus had enlightened this world some thirty years (by the parish register forty—but that, as beau Shatterly says, is a—impertinent invention, and no authority.) All that time, as they say at the boarding-houses, he had lived single! whether it was from choice or necessity, is a fact that can only be settled by his posthumous papers. Probably, however, from choice, for there is no accounting for taste, and a woman doubtless might have been found who would call his anatomy spirituel. I have noted fancies as strange in my time. He was a bachelor, however—that is certain—and, in evidence, slept with a soft newspaper about his head, wiped into a cap, with a sleight of hand acquired during his apprenticeship as a devil (the printer's)—a practice which the kindly neighborhood of matrimony must, as you know, have corrected. The only presumption against his bachelorship is in the fact that he did not, like the most of that unfortunate class, grow "melancholy and gentleman-like." His habits of temper were eminently matrimonial—either diabolically savage, or most unctuously good-natured. In medio tutissimus was bad Latin to him. He satirized in a passion—he puffed with the horrid merriment of a satyr.

The editor had just laid one of his nether limbs carefully over the other, (bones are brittle) when a note was handed in to him, which, with the eloquent nonchalance of his profession, he received between his thumb and finger, without suffering his attention to be diverted. The messenger departed, and he still sat reading, and turning the billet over carelessly in his feelers, with the spider-like instinct of all sedentary people. Presently he became conscious of an unusual smoothness in the paper, and, wondering at the extravagance of an advertisement upon gilt edge, he raised it to the near-sighted focus, and discovered—a billet-doux! Yes—folded three-corner-wise, and smelling of essences like a valentine, there it was—palpable as your palm, and beautiful as any constellation in the zodiac. The editor pulled up his dickey, and plumed back the bulbous excrescence upon his long neck, as if the billet had eyes. He read on like a man in a dream:

"Dear sir—call—sign of the Lamb—a lady—twelve o'clock—Yours." It was a new sensation. He darted from his chair to a polyangular fragment of looking-glass, set like mosaic in the partition, and passed the features of his face, (its circumference admitted but one at a time) singly before it. "It was a good nose," he said to himself—"a very good nose!—there was a certain je ne sais quoi about it, certainly—something recherché and classic. The eye—he had been in the habit of thinking modestly of it—was a good eye; a tinge of green in the iris, it could not be denied—but green was a fair color. The mouth—um!—that was more unpromising, but it stopped short of the ear, and the chin—sharp to be sure, but expressive—after all the beau idéal must be taken with license—and there were worse faces than that the gods had given him. He would think well of it, he swore inwardly, henceforth." Having taken himself into favor, he felt inclined to make his toilet, but there were two eternal hours before the time of appointment, and with the amiable nervousness of genius, (to say nothing of thrift) he never could abide, when at work, the feeling of his better habiliments. So he sat down again in the calico, and, to while away the time, took up his scissors, and slashed valorously away at the paragraph.

I am a great enemy to the liberties taken by story-tellers. A fellow will drop you a year in narration, with no more ceremony than an old wife makes in dropping a stitch. If that isn't impertinent, I'm no judge. Is a man to be called upon to forget nine years, and nothing thought of it? Shall a gentleman keep an imagination for every base quill-driver to draw upon at will? Shall I—reading a book for my pleasure—pass my eye from one line to another, and find myself jumping a chasm of twenty years, whether I will or no? By the mass! I think not. I would as lief, when asked to dine with a friend, hear his tragedy before dinner—or if invited into his garden, be compelled to leap his ditches at peril of my neck. It is not courteous, as I read courtesy. "Having slipped," therefore, as the mirror of chivalry says, "I know not by what mischance, into the unselected vocation of a writer," I shall make myself an example on this point. I will have no dodging. You shall know what my hero does in the betweenities of the story.

Mr. P. Calamus had two mortal hours lying like two self-devouring dragons between him and happiness. They made slow work of it. He dissected paper after paper, nibbled the edges of all the "horrid murders" and "melancholy accidents," and kept his familiar, to that abused person's simple astonishment, running down and up four flights of stairs to look at the clock in State-street, and still the hours lingered. It is said, however, that, "the longest day comes to the vesper hour." Thirty minutes, in the course of time, were all that remained of the interval, and that, the editor, with a somewhat prodigal calculation, devoted to dressing. He had just risen and laid aside the wispy Barcelona that, being of a dark color, was assailed of its sins but once in a calendar year, when a tall, cadaverous-looking person walked into his sanctuary with a solemn "good morning," and seated himself in the vacated chair.

"Mr. Editor!"

"Sir!" (the editor was not usually so crisp, but he began to be alarmed; long-winded visitors are diseases to which the profession is subject.)

"I have called!"

"Yes, sir, I see you have!" (Mr. P. C. began to strap his razor violently.)

"I have called, sir, as I said before, to request you to publish an account of my!"

"Death?"

"No, sir!"

"Abduction?"

"S'death! no, sir!"

"Narrow escape?"

"No, sir! no, sir!" and the gentleman in black started up impatiently, and taking the single stride necessary to traverse the editor's sanctuary, sat down again. The editor went on shaving. The visitor went on with his story. His lady had presented him four little blooming responsibilities that morning, and he wished the fact communicated to the world. Mr. Calamus stopped in the centre of his cheek, cast a look of compassion on his visitor, took up his pen and noted, "unfortunate man—four wives—sympathy of the public," and resumed his razor.

As the sufferer departed, a rakish, bedevilled-looking fellow, half mustachio and half cravat, entered and laid something that looked very like a cowskin across his table. He then threw himself into the chair with a violence which threatened its dislocation, and contemplated the editor's six feet two with an ominous particularity. The editor shaved on.

"Is your name Calamus?"

"P. Calamus, esq.—so christened."

"Well, Mr. P. Calamus, will you be flogged as you are, or do you prefer having your coat on during the operation?"

The editor turned on his visitor with a stare of ghastly astonishment. He looked first at the cowskin and then at the owner, and then he drew in his eyes, and ran hastily over in his mind all the offensive articles he had lately inserted.

"May I inquire," said he, with the tone of a man who had no right to ask the question, "what claim I have on the honor you propose me?"

Mustache pulled the last paper from his pocket, and pointed to one of the editor's own brilliant emanations, in which he had assailed the political integrity of a candidate for the office of constable.

"That man, sir," said he, "is an own cousin to a cousin of an intimate friend of your humble servant, who proposes to flog you as deputy, unless you instantly!"

"Write an acknowledgment? With the greatest pleasure in life," interrupted the editor—too happy by such a simple operation to rid himself at once of his guest, and the awkward alternative. He seized his pen, therefore, and with the elegant facility of a practised writer, indited, currente calamo, the following apology.

"In a late paper, I, P. Calamus, asserted that Jeremiah —, esq. was a dishonest man—I can't prove it, and I'm sorry for it."

It was quite sufficient. Mustache pocketed his wrath and his cowskin, paid a merited compliment to the placable temper of the apologist, and took his leave. The editor lathered anew and shaved on. His beard had profited by the delay, and cut softly and freely. He felt as if his troubles were over. His toilet proceeded, and one limb was just fairly extracted from his week-day integuments, when the door again opened. The editor reinstated himself, and swore. It was a gentleman in brown, come to get an authentic opinion upon a "poor poem" of his. He sat down, and, without looking at the disastrous expression of his auditor's countenance, commenced reading to him a jeremiad upon the times. What was to be done? If he could go on dressing at the same time—but, alas! propriety and the state of his sub-tegmentals alike forbade. He could not expose, even to a poet, the humble arrangements by which his outer man was held together. He strided across the room, and strided back again. His very sanctuary began to look disagreeable to him. The light grew dim, to his eye, the furniture twisted into fiends, and the gentleman in brown was the devil in solemn mockery, tormenting him upon a refined system. And there was the clock—it struck just as the reader commenced a second canto! It was too much. The editor snatched down his felt, took his better integuments in his hand, with an indefinite idea of changing them somewhere upon the way, and evaporated like a skeleton in a dream.

The cool air refreshed him. He walked along Washington-street, with many a tender reminiscence crowding upon his memory, of times when he had nursed the tender passion in his youth, and of his disappointments, which, he now felt as he fingered the billet-doux in his waistcoat pocket, were owing more to a mistaken modesty, than to any want of personal attraction. In the midst of his sentimental dream, he stepped into the shop of an apothecary (of whom he bought his annual doses of Glauber) and changed his unmentionables, and then, with the pair from which he had extracted himself, wrapped in a brown paper, under his arm, he proceeded to his appointment.

The Lamb Tavern, in those days, was an inn of great repute among plain people who loved short reckonings, and preferred buttoning their own vests, and doing such like personal services for themselves, instead of having it done, as at more ambitious hotels, at a shilling a button, by the servants. The entrance was by a narrow passage, a central point between the kitchen and bar-room; and the stable, being directly opposite, the entry was a favorite lounge of nasal connoisseurs, who might stand against the wall and have the united odors of alcohol, gravies, and wet straw, mingled in equal proportions with the common air. It is said that when the stable was burnt, in 1812, and rebuilt further back, the change in the atmosphere was so perceptible, that the half dozen old guzzlers who frequented the spot, began to languish from that date, and the cook and oster at the same time pining for their accustomed atmosphere, the place grew melancholy, and the tavern began to decline. It is affecting, and yet pleasant, to look back through the vista of its decay, and imagine Mr. P. Calamus insinuating himself between the protuberant persons of those venerable martyrs, to inquire for "Miss A. R."—the initials of the document at that moment pressed tenderly between his finger and thumb.

A knock at a door in the second story, introduced the editor to a darkened room, in one corner of which sat a lady, whose face, in the dim light, he could not distinctly see.

"My dear editor!" exclaimed a voice with a slight crack in it (probably from a cold) "this is so kind of you!"

"My dear madam!" replied the editor, hitching up his indescribables, and trying to look tenderly in the dark, "this is so condescending of you!"

The dialogue of civilities went on. The editor bowed. The lady flattered. The editor complimented. The lady drew up her chair, and lowered her tone. The editor sighed. The lady looked at him a moment, yielded to his pressing request for a disclosure of her name, and pronounced—

I cannot go on! I call upon Mr. Noah, of the Enquirer, for sympathy. The catastrophe is too affecting. A rush was heard in the "blue parlor"—a figure hurried down the stairs, called for water, and—tears blind my vision!

A coroner's inquest was held that night at the Lamb Tavern, on the body of a suddenly deceased gentleman. The jury, after a slight consultation, returned as a verdict—"That the deceased came to his death in consequence of excessive A—e R—y—l!"

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Club-Book: being Original Tales, &c. by various authors. Edited by the author of the "Dominie's Legacy." Two vols. 12mo. pp. 263. New-York: J. & J. Harper. 1831.

AMONG the writers who have united to fill these volumes are G. P. James, John Galt, William Jerdan, and Lord Francis Leveson. The first is known to the public as the author of "Rielieu," "Darnley," "De L'Orme," and "Philip Augustus." We can promise our readers much entertainment from a perusal of this work. The names of the contributors, however, give it an impulse which will send it far and wide, as we learn that it is already in great demand. It forms the thirteenth and fourteenth numbers of the Library of Select Novels. We extract an article by Mr. Galt:

"Many proverbial expressions are founded on experience. 'The unguarded hour' is one of them; and it has become so common, that few of those who oftentimes employ it are aware of the mystery to which it alludes. It conveys the belief that mankind are each protected by a supernatural guardian. It implies also, that the angel at times quits his post, and that in the interim, 'the unguarded hour,' the defenceless mortal is liable to be assailed by the insidious temptations of the universal adversary. Whether this impressive thesis be an hypothesis, or an apocalypse, it baffles the human understanding. It cannot be rejected as altogether earthly and of mortal imagination, nor accepted as divine and of celestial descent. But it is not my present purpose to examine the evidence on either side; I have only to describe a series of seeming accidents, calculated to enforce the doctrine by the circumstances in which their advent took place, and to awaken at once solemnity, wonder, and dread.

"Many years ago," said a friend, "when detained by indisposition in a small village in Hungary, a discovery was one morning made, by which the superstition of the simple inhabitants was greatly excited. It had been a custom from time immemorial, when the judge in office travelled through the country to dispense justice, that as often as he came to Panigstein, and I believe it was only once in a course of the cycle of the moon, every nineteen years, and at the change, that he held a free assize in the open air, near the Martyr's Cross, an ancient monument which stands alone on the solitude of the moor, at the distance of a bow-shot or more from the church. The cause of this venerable ceremony being held at that particular spot, was never satisfactorily explained, but it originated either in a prediction which had been delivered by the martyr, or on some incident connected with his doom. On every occasion, when the court was held at this spot, the inhabitants were summoned, in the name of heaven, to hearken to the list of offenders which the magistrate of the district openly placed in the hands of the judge, and all such as could bear witness to aught regarding them were commanded to come forward and do so.

"Although then but in shattered health, this remarkable ceremony, which chanced while I was at Panigstein, induced me to be present among the crowd of spectators when the judge was expected to arrive. The day was gray and silent; the sun was not invisible, but his dim orb hung in the firmament with an obscure lack-lustre sickliness, and all the landscape and every living thing, seemed overcast and dejected. The ensigns of judgment which marked the place of administration added to the solemnity of the scene; and the magistrate, to augment the gloom, had ordered a lofty new and black gallows to be raised at a little distance from where the benches and table for the court had been constructed.

"Among other impressive customs connected with the free assize, is one of unknown antiquity. The magistrate, in preparing the list of offenders for the judge, is not allowed to divulge to any person the names of the criminals intended to be accused; and it is alleged that this has a religious influence on the morals of the people, no one being aware how his conduct may have been noted, nor of what he may be found charged with in the list. The crisis is, in consequence, very awful to all. On the occasion when I was there, it was not anticipated that any particular crime would be divulged, and it was thought rather odd that the magistrate should have ordered the gallows to be erected; indeed, in the opinion of the people, the calendar was clear, so peaceful and free from all violence had been the country from the former assize, nineteen years previous.

"The magistrate I knew very well; he had sometimes invited me to his house; was a gentleman in great esteem with the immediate villagers. From small beginnings he had raised an ample fortune, was famed for the strictest integrity, and distinguished for great benevolence and a holy purity of life. It was thought by many that there was some degree of affectation in his singular piety, for in his youth he had been less austere, and he had put on his sanctity somewhat suddenly, in consequence of an event which, though distressing in itself, could not be said to affect him more than any other in the town.

"It was a murder committed exactly nineteen years before the very morning when the assize was held. No trace of the assassin had been discovered, and that circumstance, together with the worth of the victim, had produced a strong impression on every one; but on none more than this magistrate, whose faithful servant the victim had long been. The crime was mysterious, for the man was poor, and it excited universal surprise that one who in his condition had been so much respected should have provoked a doom so sudden and inexplicable. Time had greatly mitigated the recollection of the occurrence; it was almost forgotten by every body but by the widow and the charitable master, who, with his family, constantly endeavored to soften, with unavailing sympathy, her grief. She, however, became old and crazed, and when pointed out to me was a spectacle of extreme misery. She was standing near the Martyr's Cross, against which, owing to my weakness, I was then leaning, and, although she appeared sullen, and perusing the ground, I observed her eyes vividly glancing with supernatural vigilance. She was as something wild and fierce, ready to leap upon its prey, and watching for the moment. But I had not much time to notice her, for the sound of trumpets proclaimed the approach of the magistrate, attended by his officers, and soon after a movement in the multitude also announced the coming of the judge.

"When he had taken his seat on the judicial bench, and the lawyers had placed themselves at the table, the trumpet sounded a solemn peal three times, and the magistrate, with a roll in his hand, advanced. At the same instant the widow rushed, with a shriek like the oracular Pythia in her ecstasy, and placed herself at the side of the magistrate, as he presented the roll to the judge. The multitude was silent, and I felt as if the functions of my breathing were suspended.

"The judge rose, and standing up, unrolled the paper, which, with an audible voice, and religious thankfulness, he declared was clear.

"No, no," cried the impassioned and vehement widow, 'it is not so, it has not my husband's death.'

"True!" exclaimed the magistrate, 'I had forgotten it, the deed was done so long ago, nineteen years ago—how was it possible I could forget the unguarded hour?'

"The words were repeated by every voice, I believe, in the multitude in succession, and the sound was fearful. 'The unguarded hour?" said the judge to himself, looking towards the magistrate calmly, as if the question had scarcely more meaning than when uttered in echo by the crowd.

"Yes," cried the widow aloud, "his guardian angel was then away," and she concluded by accusing the magistrate, her own benefactor, and the gracious master of her deceased husband, as the murderer.

"She has been long, almost ever since the fatal event, in a state of insanity," said the magistrate to the judge; and turning to his officers, bade them take the helpless creature away.

"I will not go—I will have justice," she exclaimed, wrestling with the officers as they attempted to remove her. The crowd remained as if frozen into silence.

"Good woman," said the judge, compassionately, "you know not what you say."

"I do, I do: let me be heard," was her wild reply; and the multitude in the same instant cried out, "Let her be heard, let her be heard!"

"This is a vexatious business," said the judge to the magistrate, "for the charter by which the assize is held at this place obliges me to receive the charge, and I cannot depart from its ordinances, nor is her evident insanity a valid reason to reject the accusation. Good woman, why do you persist in this extravagance? there is no evidence to sustain the charge."

"There is, if you will listen," she impatiently again cried, and with earnest gestures and surprising eloquence, endeavored by innumerable coincidences, that she had remarked in the conduct of the magistrate, to show the grounds of her sudden suspicion.

"During the whole time that she continued speaking, the spectators listened with the greediest ears, and before she had finished her impassioned appeal, it was manifest that they were all convinced that the magistrate was indeed the murderer. The judge listened to all she said with intense attention, but the accused maintained his wonted equanimity. I was astonished that he could do so, for some of her reasons, though far from probability, were of the most touching and pathetic kind; doubtless all she said was void of evidence; still, however, it was fearfully impressive, and I could not myself withstand its energy. When she had rather exhausted her strength than finished what she had to say, the judge replied solemnly—

"Protect us, heaven, from having aught to conceal from such vigilance—this is thy work, and comes not within the possibilities of human law! There is reason, according to the charter, that a regular trial should be proceeded with, and therefore let the indictment be prepared."

"The feelings of the multitude were excited to the utmost, and took utterance in a loud shout, not of joy or of gladness, but a deep, solemn, and awful sound, whose might and majesty were portentously increased by the distant low hollow echo of the hills. The accused stood a statue of consternation for a moment. I looked at him with indescribable emotion, but the paleness which overspread his complexion vanished, and he appeared as serene and self-collected as before.

"While the papers were being written, I observed the judge speaking to the poor woman, and I heard him sympathizingly inquire respecting the age of her husband, his general appearance, and the manner in which he was dressed; to which she gave brief but distinct answers, as if the living presence of the murdered man had been seen actually before her. She was, however, impatient at the judge's questions, and answered him peevishly, forgetting the respect due to his dignity; indeed the questions, at the time, seemed to me frivolous; I could not discern their propriety, nor why so grave an officer, the representative of the emperor and king, should so far lose all consciousness of the place and the occasion as to speak to her in the manner he was doing. He asked, for example, the color of her husband's hair, and she answered black, and that he wore his cap gallantly doffed; then, after some other inquiries equally insignificant, he spoke of his coat, and the color of it, but she lost temper; and after telling him it was blue, and his vest red, intreated he would not probe her wounded remembrance with matters of that kind.

"In the mean time the magistrate was engaged with an advocate who was perfectly convinced, and so expressed himself, that the trial would soon be safely over. Altogether the scene was most singular, but the passion of the crowd was become appalling, and I was fearful lest the magistrate should be made the victim of some outrage. Himself calm, and certain that no evidence could sully him, he was yet visibly disturbed; and I saw him once or twice start and shudder, no doubt amazed that such a delirious accusation should have been so strangely imagined against him.

"When all the requisite forms were completed, he was directed to place himself at the bar; and the judge, according to the charter, called him by name to answer to God, who was there present, for the crime of which he was accused. At that moment, and before he could reply, the sun darted a bright and golden ray upon the forehead of the judge, and made it shine as if it had been crowned with a halo. All the spectators were witnesses to this glorious symbol; and I could scarcely control my trembling limbs, so much did it shake my whole frame.

"The accused was evidently affected, but he had such mastery of himself, that he answered with firmness, 'Not guilty.'

"A pause of some time ensued, and then the widow was requested to come forward with her evidence. She advanced, and suddenly cried, 'I have but these tears.'

"The advocate with whom the accused had been consulting, rose, and animadverting on the insanity of the charge, demanded an acquittal.

"Stop," said the judge, solemnly, "the order and provisions of the charter have not yet been all fulfilled—bid the trumpets sound thrice."

"The silence of the multitude was dreadful; the trumpets sounded, and the judge, rising from his seat, reverentially uncovered his hoary head, and said with a voice of the lowest humility:

"Heaven, send forth thy witness."

"I looked at the dismayed prisoner; he was pale, but serene. The judge then resumed his seat, and the advocate again rose.

"I demand," said he, "the acquittal of the accused."

"Another short pause ensued, and the judge rising, cast his sight to a distance, and said,

"Make way for the witness."

"What witness?" cried the prisoner, in visible trepidation.

"That man in the blue coat—he with his cap on the one side—make way for him—he with the red waistcoat."

"It is himself that comes," cried the widow, with an exulting about; and all the spectators looked back towards the spot where they expected to behold the witness, but they saw no one; and when they had again turned their eyes to the bar, the accused had fainted. This confirmed the amazed spectators, and the judge kneeled down with devotion, and, raising his hands to heaven, prayed and did homage to divine justice. The wretched criminal was left lying on the ground, for all present, at the same moment, uncovered their heads, and with tears and awe joined in worship with the judge. A more affecting scene was never witnessed; and when the adoration was ended, the guilty man awaked from his trance, rose, and confessed the crime.

"I seek not mercy," said he, "I have enjoyed it too long—yet my offence is not of an atrocious die—it was but a hasty blow. Yes, the hand of heaven is so visible here that I dare not ask remission, even if my hidden misery were not punishment enough—there, take me—be now no more delay. The gallows is ready, and mercy dare not in this place contend with justice."

Advice to Young Men, and (Incidentally) to Young Women, in the middle and higher ranks of life. In a series of Letters, addressed to a Youth, a Bachelor, a Lover, a Husband, a Citizen, or a Subject. By William Cobbett. One vol. 18mo. New-York: John Doyle.

The political writings of William Cobbett are well known in this country. Many of them first saw the light on this side the Atlantic, and all are characterized by a reckless boldness, a nervous volubility, and an egotistical eccentricity, peculiar to the man. In the character of a moral philosopher the American reader is less intimately acquainted with Cobbett, though he evidently graduated in the Franklin school; without ever acquiring, however, that chaste simplicity, that elegant purity of style, which charms us in every essay of its immortal founder. Franklin's pen was always guided by reason, Cobbett's too often by passion, when the coarsest words of the language are put in requisition to express the force of his feelings. This renders his style very unequal, and sometimes even disgusting.

Such is the case, in several instances, in the work before us. It is generally original, sensible, and interesting; often eloquent, chaste, and amusing, but occasionally unpardonably coarse and vulgar. It is true, these letters were intended chiefly for what is called the middle class of society in England: tradesmen, mechanics, farmers, &c. There are maxims of general utility in Chesterfield's letters to his son, to which those of Cobbett might, in many respects, be termed the antipodes. The morals they inculcate, however, are sound, the end laudable, and the execution, for the most part, highly respectable. Whatever rank this work may occupy as a literary production, it is certainly entitled to an elevated one as a book of useful instruction; abounding in personal anecdote, shrewd remark, and practical aphorisms, the result of the author's own experience, through a long, laborious, and useful life—the whole plentifully sprinkled over and seasoned with the same amusing egotism which characterizes every production of this extraordinary and eccentric person. Without extending these remarks, we had better illustrate them by an extract from the book itself. In advising a lover as to the choice of a partner for life, he thus speaks of a good temper as one of the requisites of an amiable wife:

"Good temper is a very difficult thing to ascertain beforehand. Smiles are so cheap; they are so easily put on for the occasion; and, besides, the frowns are, according to the lover's whim, interpreted into the contrary. By 'good temper,' I do not mean easy temper, a serenity which nothing disturbs, for that is a mark of laziness. Sulkeness, if you be not too blind to perceive it, is a temper to be avoided by all means. A sulky man is bad enough; what, then, must be a sulky woman, and that woman a wife; a constant inmate, a companion day and night! Only think of the delight of sitting at the same table for a week, and not exchanging a word all the while! Very bad to be scolding for such a length of time; but this is far better than the sulks. If you have your eyes, and look sharp, you will discover symptoms of this, if it unhappily exist. She will, at some time or other, show it towards some one or other of the family; or, perhaps, towards yourself; and you may be quite sure that, in this respect, marriage will not mend her. Sulkeness arises from capricious displeasure not founded in reason. The party takes offence unjustifiably; is unable to frame a complaint, and therefore expresses displeasure by silence. The remedy for sulkeness is, to suffer it to take its full swing; but it is better not to have the disease in your house; and to be married to it is little short of madness.

"Querulousness is a great fault. No man, and especially no woman, likes to hear eternal plaintiveness. That she complain, and roundly complain, of your want of punctuality, of your coolness, of your neglect, of your liking the company of others: these are all very well, more especially as they are frequently but too just. But an everlasting complaining, without rhyme or reason, is a bad sign. It shows want of patience, and, indeed, a want of sense. But, the contrary of this, a cold indifference, is still worse. 'When will you come again? You can never find time to come here. You like my company better than mine.' These, when groundless, are very teasing, and demonstrate a disposition too full of anxiousness; but, from a girl who always receives you with the same civil smile, lets you, at your own good pleasure, depart with the same; and who, when you take her by the hand, holds her cold fingers as straight as sticks, I say (or should, if I were young,) heaven, in its mercy, preserve me!

"Pertinacity is a very bad thing in any body, and especially in a young woman; and it is sure to increase in force with the age of the party. To have the last word is a poor triumph; but with some people it is a species of disease of the mind. In a wife it must be extremely troublesome; and, if you find an ounce of it in the maid, it will become a pound in the wife. An eternal disputer is a most disagreeable companion; and where young women thrust their say into conversations carried on by older persons, give their opinions in a positive manner, and court a contest of the tongue, those must be very bold men who will encounter them as wives.

"Still, of all the faults as to temper, your melancholy ladies have the worst, unless you have the same mental disease. Most wives are, at time, misery-makers; but these carry it on as a regular trade. They are always unhappy about something, either past, present, or to come. Both arms full of children is a pretty efficient remedy in most cases; but, if the ingredients be wanting, a little want, a little real trouble, a little genuine affliction must, if you would effect a cure, be resorted to. But, this is very painful to a man of any feeling; and, therefore, the best way is to avoid a connexion, which is to give you a life of wailing and sighs."

In his advice to a husband, we find the following sensible remarks:

"The cares and troubles of the married life are many; but, are those of the single life few? Take the farmer, and it is nearly the same with the tradesman; but, take the farmer, for instance, and let him, at the age of twenty-five, go into business unmarried. See his maid-servants, probably rivals for his smiles, but certainly rivals in the charitable distribution of his victuals and drink amongst those of their own rank; behold their guardianship of his pork-tub, his bacon-rack, his butter, cheese, milk, poultry, eggs, and all the rest of it: look at their care of all his household-stuff, his blankets, sheets, pillow-cases, towels, knives and forks, and particularly of his crockery ware, of which last they will hardly exceed a single cart-load of broken bits in the year. And, how nicely they will get up and take care of his linen and other wearing apparel, and always have it ready for him without his thinking about it! If absent at market, or especially at a distant fair, how scrupulously they will keep all their cronies out of his house, and what special care they will take of his cellar, more particularly that which holds the strong beer! And his groceries and his spirits and his wine, (for a bachelor can afford it,) how safe these will all be! Bachelors have not, indeed, any more than married men, a security for health; but if our young farmer be sick, there are his couple of maids to take care of him, to administer his medicine, and to perform for him all other nameless offices, which in such a case are required; and what is more, take care of every thing down stairs at the same time, especially his desk with the money in it! Never will they, good-humored girls as they are, scold him for coming home too late; but, on the contrary, like him the better for it; and if he have drunk a little too much, so much the better, for then he will sleep late in the morning, and when he comes out at last, he will find that his men have been so hard at work, and that all his animals have been taken such good care of!

"Nonsense! a bare glance at the thing shows, that a farmer, above all men living, can never carry on his affairs with profit without a wife, or a mother, or a daughter, or some such person; and mother and daughter imply matrimony. To be sure, a wife would cause some trouble, perhaps, to this young man. There might be a nurse to gallop after at midnight; there might be, and there ought to be, if called for, a little complaining of late hours; but, good heaven! what are these, and all the other troubles that could attend a married life, what are they, compared to the one single circumstance of the want of a wife at your bedside during one single night of illness! A nurse! what is a nurse to do for you? Will she do the things that a wife will do? Will she watch your looks and your half-uttered wishes? Will she use the urgent persuasions so often necessary to save life in such cases? Will she, by her acts, convince you that it is not a toil, but a delight, to break her rest for your sake? In short, now it is that you find that what the women themselves say is strictly true, namely, that without wives men are poor helpless mortals.

"As to the expense, there is no comparison between that of a woman servant and a wife, in the house of a farmer or a tradesman. The wages of the former is not the expense; it is the want of a common interest with you, and this you can obtain in no one but a wife. But there are the children. I, for my part, firmly believe that a farmer, married at twenty-five, and having ten children during the first ten years, would be able to save more money during these years than a bachelor, of the same age, would be able to save, on the same farm, in a like space of time, he keeping only one maid-servant. One single fit of illness, of two months' duration, might sweep away more than all the children would cost in the whole ten years, to say nothing of the continual waste and pillage, and the idleness, going on from the first day of the ten years to the last.

"Besides, is the money all? What a life to lead! No one to talk to without going from home, or without getting some one to come to you; no friend to sit and talk to; no pleasant evenings to pass! Nobody to share with you your sorrows or your pleasures: no soul having a common interest with you: all around you taking care of themselves, and no care of you."

Here are some of the gentleman's ideas of Shakspeare:

"Shakspeare, who is cried up as the great interpreter of the human heart, has said, that the man in whose soul there is no music, or love of music, is 'fit for murders, treasons, stratagems, and spoils.' Our immortal bard, as the profligate Sheridan used to call him in public, while he laughed at him in private; our 'immortal bard' seems to have forgotten that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, were flung into the fiery furnace (made seven times hotter than usual) amidst the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music; he seems to have forgotten that it was a music and a dance-loving damsel that chose, as a recompense for her elegant performance, the bloody head of John the Baptist, brought to her in a charger; he seems to have forgotten that, while Rome burned, Nero fiddled: he did not know, perhaps, that cannibals always dance and sing while their victims are roasting; but he might have known, and he must have known, that England's greatest tyrant, Henry VIII. had, as his agent in blood, Thomas Cromwell, expressed it, 'his sweet soul enwrapped in the celestial sounds of music;' and this was just at the time when the ferocious tyrant was ordering catholics and protestants to be tied back to back on the same hurdle, dragged to Smithfield on that hurdle, and there tied to, and burnt from, the same stake. Shakspeare must have known these things, for he lived immediately after their date; and if he had lived in our day, he would have seen instances enough of 'sweet souls' enwrapped in the same manner, and capable, if not of deeds equally bloody, of others, discovering a total want of feeling for sufferings not unfrequently occasioned by their own wanton waste, and waste arising, too, in part, from their taste for these 'celestial sounds.'

"O no! the heart of man is not to be known by this test: a great fondness for music is a mark of great weakness, great vacuity of mind: not of hardness of heart; not of vice; not of downright folly; but of a want of capacity, or inclination, for sober thought."

On the whole, we feel a pleasure in recommending this work to attention, sincerely believing that it is well calculated to improve the character, and promote the happiness of all who receive its admonishments in a proper spirit.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

DECEMBER.

THE first month of winter, and the last of the modern year, derives its name from the Latin, decem, ten, being the tenth month counting from March, which was anciently reckoned the beginning of the year. The Saxons called it winter month, and afterwards holy month, on account of the nativity of our Lord.

Among the memorable events which have distinguished this month, the following are deemed of sufficient importance to claim a record in the present article: Bonaparte was crowned emperor of the French on the second, 1804, by Pope Pius VIII., in the church of Notre Dame, Paris; the battle of Austerlitz took place on the same day, in the following year, between the French, under Bonaparte, and the combined armies of Russia and Austria, under the Emperor Alexander and Francis I., who were defeated with the loss of thirty-five thousand killed or drowned, and twenty thousand taken prisoners, with their whole park of artillery; the celebrated battle of Hohenlinden was fought on the third, in a snow-storm, four years previous, 1800, when the Austrians, under the Arch-duke John, were defeated with great slaughter by the French, under General Moreau—Eighteen thousand prisoners were taken by the French, and night alone saved the Austrian army from total destruction. Campbell's sublime description of this contest is well-known, beginning,

"On Linden, when the sun was low,
All bloodless lay the untrodden snow,
And dark as winter was the flow
Of Isar, rolling rapidly.
But Linden saw another sight,
When the drums beat at dead of night,
Commanding fires of death to light
The darkness of her scenery."

Washington died on the fourteenth, 1799, just one hundred and seventy-nine years, lacking seven days, from the landing of the pilgrims on Plymouth Rock, which took place on the twenty-second, 1620: the battle of Trenton occurred on the twenty-sixth, 1776; the United States frigate Constitution captured and sunk the British frigate Java on the twenty-ninth, 1813: Montgomery was slain before Quebec on the thirty-first, 1775.

On the twenty-second of this month the sun enters that constellation of the zodiac which is called Capricorn, a monster, half man, half goat. In the quaint language of an old poet,

"Pan turned himself into that shape
When he did from Typhoeus fly,
And in that form did safe escape,
Which made Jove place it in the sky."

This sign in the zodiac is composed of twenty-eight stars, so situated as to form a striking outline of the figure of a goat. Some of the ancients supposed it to be the goat Amalthea, which fed Jupiter with her milk; while others contend that it is Pan, the god of shepherds and huntsmen, who is said to have changed himself into a goat when frightened at the approach of Typhæus, or Typhon, whose figure was indeed hideous enough to appal old Nick himself; for he is represented as having a hundred serpent or dragon heads, with devouring fire darting from every mouth, and even from every eye! while he uttered horrid yells, like the dissonant shrieks of different animals; the tones of his hundred voices being neither thirds, fifths, nor octaves, but comprising every semi-tone that could produce a discord. This amiable Typhon was no sooner born, than he sought to avenge the death of his elder brothers, the giants, by making war against heaven, and so frightened the gods, that they fled away, and assumed different shapes. Jupiter became a ram, Mercury a swan, Juno a cow, Bacchus a goat, Diana a cat, (bad taste in the pretty Diana) Venus a fish, Pan a satyr, &c. The father of the gods at last put Typhon to flight with his thunderbolts, and crushed him under Mount Ætna, in the island of Sicily, where he remaineth even unto this day. Such was the fate of

"The many-headed Typhon
Who 'gainst the gods once carried strife on."

But let us not lose sight of our friend Pan, at whose inn Apollo might soon be regaling himself, would he condescend to stop:

"For still, as a poet, you know, I am bound
To believe that bright Phœbus yet travels around
The turnpike of heaven, in chariot of fire,
Drawn rapidly onward by steeds that ne'er tire;
Nor stop to refresh, though they pass as they fly
The signs of a dozen fine inns in the sky;
The scorpion and centaur he swiftly has passed,
And Pan, his old comrade, salutes him at last."

This Pan was said to be a monster in appearance, having two small horns on his forehead. His complexion was ruddy, his nose flat, and from the hips downwards, he resembled a goat. His education was entrusted to a nymph of Arcadia, called Sinœe, who, the moment she was introduced to her likely-looking pupil, fled from him with terror. We think, however, that Miss Sinœe must have been somewhat fastidious in her taste, as Pan was afterwards very successful in winning the smiles of the ladies, and numbered among his conquests, not only the lovely mountain nymph Echo, but even the chaste Diana herself. He became the god of shepherds, and took up his residence in Arcadia, where the woods and the most rugged mountains were frequently his habitation. He invented the syrix, a musical instrument, composed of seven reeds of unequal length and diameter, now called the Pandean flute. Though remarkably good-humored and inoffensive in his conduct, many of the timid Arcadians, of both sexes, had cherished such a prejudice against his personal deformity, that they were terrified at his approach. Hence originated the word panic, or groundless fear. This kind of terror has been exemplified, not only in individuals, but in numerous armies, such as that of Brennus, which was thrown into the greatest consternation at Rome without any cause, or plausible reason.

As the patron of shepherds and agriculturists, Pan was worshipped as a god; his different functions being derived, it is believed, from the mythology of the ancient Egyptians, by whom he was adored with the greatest solemnity. His statues represented him as a goat, because that figure was their hieroglyphic emblem of fruitfulness. His horns, as some writers observe, represented the rays of the sun; while the brightness of the heavens was expressed by the vivacity and the ruddiness of his complexion. The star which he wore on his breast was the symbol of the firmament; and his hairy legs and feet denoted the inferior parts of the earth, such as the woods and plants.

The trial of musical, or poetical skill, between Pan and Apollo, is a prominent incident in the history of these worthies. Midas, the king of Phrygia, awarded the victory to Pan, which so incensed "Latona's bright-haired son," that he changed the monarch's ears into those of a donkey, to show his ignorance and stupidity. Were the same power exercised on similar occasions now-a-days, how many long-eared critics should we meet with in our perambulations!

But whether the astronomical sign, called capricorn, be derived from Pan, the god of shepherds, or from Amalthea, the she-goat who nourished Jupiter with her milk, one thing is certain, when the sun enters this sign it is the winter solstice; the longest night and the shortest day in the year exactly opposed to a similar phenomenon in June, when the sun enters the sign cancer, which is the summer solstice, when the day is at its greatest length, and the night is shortest.

The month of December, however, has some distinguishing characteristics which have been thus far only slightly alluded to. It is the commencement of winter—it is the termination of the year.

"Winter succeeds, with snow-wreaths on his brow;
Alas! I feel his icy fingers now!
Winter succeeds—the midnight of the year,
And all the fields are barren, cold, and drear:
He binds the streams and lakes in silver chains,
And hoary frost has candied all the plains.
The liveried trees their yellow coats forego,
And, shivering, stand in shrouds of frozen snow;
While the child's sap leaves succorless the shoot,
And shrinks below to cheer the dying root."

Early in the evening of Friday, the ninth of this month, (the day after thanksgiving,) the citizens of New-York, if the sky be cloudless, will have an opportunity of witnessing a phenomenon, which may not occur again during their brief pilgrimage on this mundane planet. The beautiful planet Jupiter, with all his satellites, will appear to be eclipsed by the moon, under circumstances the most favorable to observation. The immersion will take place on the dark, and the emersion on the enlightened side of the moon. This phenomenon is called an occultation, and is of very rare occurrence. The last that was observed in this country, happened in the autumn of 1820, and another is not to be expected for many years.

Editor's study.—It was one of the most dreary and melancholy weeks of the year. For the last several days the city had been either drenched with rains or wrapped in a drizzly fog. Wet weather in a city! Shudder at the thought, ye victims of dyspepsia and the blue devils. Ye susceptible creatures, whose spirits are influenced by the changes of the atmosphere, bless your stars for the dry pavements, the blue sky, and the revivifying sunshine, and remember with horror the murky, dismal, dim, dreadful look of the sloppy streets during a forty-eight hours' rain in November! Thou lovely belle, droop the light lids over thine orbs of dangerous fire at the recollection of those stupid hours! Gentlemen of business perform their peregrinations mournfully, and tramp through the streets shod like horses; and the Broadway loungers bid farewell to all the sweet faces and pretty feet, till the jolly smiles of Phœbus shine once more through the mist. We sat by our window gazing out upon the streets with a sort of patient misery; for, in common with all our unfortunate fellow-citizens, we were enjoying a hearty visit from the influenza. Our distant readers must be informed that every body in the city is afflicted with this annoying disease. It is, to be sure, not alarming, but is nevertheless exceedingly unwelcome. The poor victim is struck with a pain in the head, chest, and through all his bones, as if he had been beaten. His eyes grow weak, his throat sore: he coughs, complains, and, if not so seriously ill as to be confined to his bed, travels through the city barking as furiously as a suddenly awakened house-dog. Critics attend the theatres with their chins buried in red bandanna handkerchiefs, and cough Shakespeare, Rossini, and Auber out of countenance. The lecturer stops in the midst of his corollary to afford a practical illustration of the reigning epidemic; and, unhappy fat men stand in knots at the corners of streets, uniting their vocal powers in such a way as to hold out to impatient young heirs good prospects of coming into possession. We recommend that the earliest symptoms of this epidemic be met with a general abstemiousness. Pass a day or two without eating. It will do no harm, and may prevent a great deal. We all eat and drink too much for our sedentary habits. It may be questioned whether a wild Indian is afflicted with dyspepsia and influenza; and the most reasonable method of repairing the evil wrought in us by frequent violations of the rules of nature, is to suffer that excellent physician to treat us in her own way without interfering with her influence. And yet it is astonishing how few have the resolution to refrain when the dinner comes before them, with its fragrant temptations; and how on this, as on too many other occasions of life, we are apt to enjoy ourselves to-day, and put off a disagreeable duty till to-morrow. Yet how many a being has been cut off for the want of a simple caution in the commencement of a sickness! What suffering might be prevented by a timely attention! This is ably illustrated by one of the stories from the Diary of a Physician, entitled the "Slight Cold." These same diseases are dreadful drawbacks on the happiness of human life. We should not be so ready to murmur if they were all entailed on us by a decree of nature; but, alas! too many are the result of our own immoderate eagerness for enjoyment. Our luxurious banquets and exhilarating wines, our late sittings-up and our late risings, and the vast variety of our exciting pleasures and harrowing occupations to pay for them, load us with evils which never oppress the savage. And then with what horror a man yields to the benumbing influence of disease! Peradventure we are more than usually susceptible on this point, but the gradual development of any malady upon us has in it something absolutely appalling. The shadows that come slowly over our consciousness of existence, the blight and palsy that fall on our senses and feelings, the final incompetency to fulfill the ordinary duties of life, the drooping amid the bustle of business and pleasure, beneath a weight of pain and languor, all come over us with an involuntary shudder. When the hand of sickness presses us down, stealing away the strength from our limbs, and shooting fearful pains along our nerves, no matter how slight may be the occasion, we acknowledge a feeling of vague horror. We struggle long and manfully before confessing ourself an invalid. There is much in being among the gay and healthy. We shrink from the earliest symptoms of the sick chamber, and when at length forced to yield and in the silent darkened room we press our forehead upon a feverish pillow, it ever seems to us as if we had done with the world; its busy and varied scenery and adventures shuffle by us as the dim images of past things, and we may not easily describe the thoughts that come up gloomily in our imagination when the midnight bell reverberates solemnly through the still night, and finds us thus stricken down into helplessness and pain, the result of which we cannot conjecture. Then the dreams of a sick man are so awful. They are often full of some distorted and monstrous wo. We shall never forget two dreadful visions that once oppressed us when laboring under a trivial indisposition, which, in obedience to the advice of some kind counsellor, whose good nature exceeded his wisdom, we had endeavored to feed as the phrase is, instead of starving it. We therefore gaily abandoned ourself to the hearty cheer of the supper-table and forgot our insignificant suffering, (as who would not?) under the influence of wine, song, and the bewitching physiognomies of two right merry young damsels. Well! we are older now, and at these scenes of glee we fancy we behold the arch fiend's dark form in some shadowed embrasure, leering upon the victim of immoderate diet with a tolerably sure hope that he will pay for his mirth at last. The hours went on—the songs were over—the wine cups were emptied—the sweet faces were gone—and the high clear voices hushed. Morpheus paid his customary visits to the inhabitants of the mansion, and us among the rest. But in our case he brought a companion by no means welcome. Among the party had been one powerfully formed, a keen and intelligent young deaf mute, on the point of setting out on his travels. Having taken somewhat of a fancy to us, he had in the afternoon displayed, for our benefit, several weapons, which he intended to carry with him on his journey—pistols, a sword-cane, and, in particular, a large, double-edged, extremely sharp and beautiful dagger, which glittered brilliantly with every motion.

On retiring to rest, the feverish excitement of sickness, aided by the manner in which we had spent the evening, began to stir up our imagination, producing at first only pleasant images. We thought we stood on a delightful grassy knoll, which overlooked what appeared to be Lake George—just so lively and transparent. In the midst of its calm and crystal water, we presently observed a stupendous monster, or sea serpent, wreathing his gigantic form into ponderous folds—now unfolding the massive knots, and shooting along in gentle curves—then rising to the surface and diving down again with fantastic gambols to the pearly depths. Presently the leviathan's fiery eyes were fixed on us, and he darted towards us with the velocity of an arrow. We fled for miles and miles, through woods and over mountains, plains and cities, and, wherever we came, multitudes made way for us, till we took refuge in a castle, and there were locked in with our terrible pursuer, chasing us round the walls and into the dim recesses—till we awoke, and immediately sank again into slumber. But now we were stretched on a sick couch, and by some fatality deprived of motion—locked there, in a deathly stillness and silence, as we had been cut out of marble, or a block of granite flung down carelessly, yet endowed with the consciousness of life. It was a strange and fearful spell that petrified our limbs and sealed our lips utterly, and denied us the power to betray the faintest possible sign of being. Then the door opened, a stealthy step moved on the floor, and we could detect the young mute, of whom we have spoken before, stealing towards us. The conviction that he was a maniac flashed upon our mind, and that he was about to assassinate us. He came on slowly, his eyes glared, he lifted his arm—the bright, broad, pointed blade of the dagger gleamed—and, although our sufferings at the moment, were merely imaginary, they were sufficiently disagreeable to excuse us at present for recommending our friends with the influenza, and other fashionable disorders, to abstain from heavy meals of any kind, especially suppers, if they do not wish to be murdered by the ghosts of lunatics, and swallowed unceremoniously by phantom sea-serpents.

GRAND WALTZ,

FROM THE OVERTURE TO THE OPERA OF LA GAZZA LADRA—COMPOSED BY ROSSINI.

MISCELLANY.

SCRAPS FROM D'ISRAELI.

Mr. MOORE alone, like Murat, charging in the hottest fight, still maintains the war. Oh! long may victory poise on his unsullied plume!—long may the trenchant sabre of his wit gleam in our ranks, and long may his trumpet sound to triumph! Methinks that whenever he may leave us, on that day the sun will be less warm, the stars less bright, the moon less soft; that a cloud will burst over the gardens of Cashmere, and the peris grow pale in the palaces of Amrabad; that every nightingale will pine, and every rose will fade!

A BANQUET.—Shall I attempt to describe the delicacy of this banquet, where imagination had been racked for novel luxury? Through the centre of each table ran a rivulet of rose-water, and gold and silver fish glanced in its unrivalled course. The bouquets were exchanged every half hour, and music, soft and subdued, but constant and thrilling, wound them up, by exquisite gradations, to that pitch of refined excitement which is so strange a union of delicacy and voluptuousness, when the soul, as it were, becomes sensual, and the body dissolves into spirit. And in this choice assembly, where all was youth and elegance and beauty, was it not right that every sound should be melody, every sight a sight of loveliness, and every thought a thought of pleasure?

PURE LOVE IN THE BOSOM OF A DISSIPATED YOUNG SPENDTHRIFT.—In the mean time, the young duke was not in so calm a mood as the baronet. Rapidly the late extraordinary events dashed through his mind, and already those feelings which had prompted his soliloquy in the garden were no longer his. All forms, all images, all ideas, all memory, melted into May Dacre. He felt that he loved her with a perfect love; that she was to him what no other woman had been, even in the factitious delirium of early passion. A thought of her seemed to bring an entirely novel train of feelings, impressions, wishes, hopes. The world, with her, must be a totally different system, and his existence in her society, a new and another life. Her very purity refined the passion which raged even in his exhausted mind. Gleams of virtue, morning streaks of duty, broke upon the horizon of his hitherto clouded soul; an obscure suspicion of the utter worthlessness of his life whispered in his hollow ear; he darkly felt that happiness was too philosophical a system to be the result, or the reward of impulse, however unbounded, and that principle alone could create, and could support, that bliss which is our being's end and aim.

A BEAUTIFUL BELLE.—She turns her head, she throws around a glance, and two streams of liquid light pour from her hazel eyes on his. It was a rapid, graceful movement, unstudied as the motion of a fawn, and was in a moment withdrawn, yet was it long enough to stamp upon his memory a memorable countenance.

A SOFT LADY.—There is about Afy, in spite of all her softness and humility, a strange spirit, a cursed courage, or obstinacy, which sometimes has blazed out, when I have over-galled her, in a way half awful.

REVERIES OF A ROUE.—As his carriage rolled on he revelled in delicious fancies. The young duke built castles, not only at Hauteville, but in less substantial regions. Revery, in the flush of our warm youth, generally indulges in the future. We are always anticipating the next adventure, and clothe the coming heroine with a rosy tint. When we advance a little on our limited journey, and an act or two of the comedy, the gayest, in all probability, are over, the wizard Memory de-thrones the witch Imagination, and it is the past on which the mind feeds in its musings. It is then we ponder on each great result, which has stolen on us without the labor of reflection; it is then we analyze emotions which, at the time, we could not comprehend, and probe the action which passion inspired, and which prejudice has hitherto defended.

ENGLISH LITERATURE.

We think our readers will like the following article, although not altogether what we call a "great poem." It is sketchy, graphic, humorous, and eloquent; containing many plain truths, mingled up with false opinions; or, as the writer himself would say, the flame of much true genius smouldering under the rubbish of a tolerable heap of prejudices. We do not entirely acquiesce in his apparent definition of a "great poem." He speaks of it as if any weakness, error, or inconsistency must necessarily destroy its greatness—an idea we need scarce be at the trouble of confuting. If he had sought a perfect poem instead of a great one, we could better excuse him for unceremoniously sweeping away not only Rogers, Campbell, Moore, Byron, Crabbe, Coleridge, Southey, Scott, and Wordsworth—not only Bowles, White, and Montgomery, but even Cowper, Thomson, Collins, and Gray—the proud Burns, the magnificent Pope, the mighty Dryden, and (has Cobbett turned his brain?) the "high-browed Shakspeare." None of these have written (are we speaking heresy too?) a perfect poem; but great poems they incontrovertibly have produced. Nothing is more dangerous to a critic than these errors of comparison. That word is a spell. Under its influence little things grow gigantic, and stupendous objects shrink into dwarfish shapes. A star blazes, or the sun grows dim—we are wretched and happy—we are ruffians and saints—we are rich or poor—we are great or insignificant, by comparison; and while, when used to a certain extent, it affords the only means of estimating things accurately, if carried farther, on the principle of our Blackwood friend, in the annexed article, it undoes what it has done, and resolves every thing into a grand chaos. Viewing the works of the poets above mentioned, with a model in his own imagination, the critic finds none of them great. But on this principle Milton is not great. He too has faults. You feel that in superintending the machinery of that splendid and immortal work, which Blackwood's Magazine terms the only great poem in the English language, and which we can almost excuse a man for running into a little rhapsody about, you feel that even the blind bard of England is working upon materials too vast for his management. You feel that his superior beings, except Satan, are but mortals—their battles are the conflicts of human creatures with a few probabilities violated, and magnified into colossal proportions by the poet's imagination, as shadows are on the wall by the evening fire. You feel—but we will no longer beguile our readers into an hour of our own talk about poetry, but let them embark forthwith upon that of one more fluent.

AN HOUR'S TALK ABOUT POETRY.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

Ours is a poetical age; but has it produced one great poem? Not one. If you think it has, you will perhaps favor us with the name of the author and his work. But hark! you may first demand of us what we mean by a great poem. If you do, we shan't answer you, for we deal not in reasoning, but in assertions. Reasonings are apt to be tedious and unsatisfactory; assertions are short—and if correct—which ours always are—they carry their own demonstrations along with them—neatly folded up—and all that you have to do is to allow them to evolve themselves at their leisure in the light of truth, till they appear before you like "bright consummate flowers," which it is pleasant to gaze on, and profitable to gather. From the commencement of our career we have flourished on assertions, while most of our contemporaries have "faded, languished, grown dim, and died" on demonstrations. We learned this great secret from the observation and meditation of half a century; and applying to literature the philosophy of life, we have become immortal. In vain would you search through nearly twenty decades of Maga for one specimen of an argument above an inch long; whereas in every page the most astounding assertions stare you in the face, till you are out of countenance, and shut your eyes in the sudden and insupportable effulgence of the naked truth—only to open them again with gifted vision on a wider revelation of earth and heaven.

We therefore repeat our assertion—that ours is a poetical age, but that it has not produced one great poem. Just look at them for a moment. There is the "Pleasures of Memory,"—an elegant, graceful, beautiful, pensive, and pathetic poem, which it does one's eyes good to gaze on—one's ears good to listen to—one's very fingers good to touch, so smooth is the versification and the wire-wove paper. Never will the "Pleasures of Memory" be forgotten till the world is in its dotage. But is it a great poem? About as much so as an ant or a mole-hill, prettily grass-grown and leaf-strewn, is a mountain purple with heather and golden with woods. It is a symmetrical erection, in the shape of a cone, and the apex points heavenwards; but 'tis not a sky-piercer. You take it at a hop, and pursue your journey. Yet it endures. For the rains and the dews, and the airs and the sunshine, love the fairy knoll, and there it greens and blossoms delicately and delightfully, half a work of art and half a work of nature.

Then there is the poetry of Crabbe. We hear it is not popular. If so, then neither is human life. For of all our living poets, he has most skillfully "woven the web and woven the woof" of all his compositions with the materials of human life—homespun indeed—but though often coarse, always strong—and though set to plain patterns, yet not unfrequently exceeding fine is the old weaver's workmanship. Ay—hold up the product of his loom between your eye and the light, and it glows and glimmers like the peacock's back, or the breast of the rainbow. Sometimes it seems to be but of the "hadden grey," when sunbeam or shadow smites it, and lo! it is burnished like the regal purple. But did the boroughmonger ever produce a great poem? You might as well ask if he built St. Paul's.

Breathes not the man with a more poetical temperament than Bowles. No wonder that his eyes "love all they look on," for they possess the sacred gift of beautifying creation, by shedding over it the charm of melancholy. "Pleasant, but mournful to the soul is the memory of joys that are past," is the text we should choose were we about to preach on his genius. No vain repinings, no idle regrets, does his spirit ever breathe over the still receding past. But time-sanctified are all the shows that arise before his pensive imagination—and the common light of day, once gone, in his poetry seems to shine as if it had all been dying sunset or moonlight, or the newborn dawn. His human sensibilities are so fine as to be in themselves poetical; and his poetical aspirations so delicate as to be felt always human. Hence his sonnets have been dear to poets—having in them "more than meets the ear"—spiritual breathings that hang around the words like light around fair flowers; and hence, too, have they been beloved by all natural hearts who, having not the "faculty divine," have yet the "vision"—that is, the power of seeing and of hearing the sights and the sounds which genius alone can awaken, bringing them from afar, out of the dust and dimness of evanishment. But has Bowles written a great poem? If he has, then, as he loves us, let him forthwith publish it in Maga.

What shall we say of the "Pleasures of Hope?" That the harp from which that music breathed was an Æolian harp placed in the window of a high hall, to catch airs from heaven, when heaven was glad, as well she might be with such moon and such stars, and streaming half the region with a magnificent aurora borealis. Now the music deepens into a majestic march—now it swells into a holy hymn—and now it dies away elegiac-like, as if mourning over a tomb. Vague, indefinite, uncertain, dream-like, and visionary all; but never else than beautiful; and ever and anon, we know not why, sublime. It ceases in the hush of night, and we awaken as if from a dream. Is it not even so? As for "Gertrude of Wyoming," we love her as if she were our own only daughter—filling our life with bliss, and then leaving it desolate. Even now we see her ghost gliding through those giant woods! As for "Lochiel's Warning," there was heard the voice of the "Last of the Seers." The "Second Sight" is now extinguished in the "Highland Glooms"—the "Lament" wails no more.

"That man may not hide what God would reveal."

Never saw we a ship till Campbell indited "Ye Mariners of England." Sheer hulks before our eyes were all ships till that strain arose, but ever since in our imagination have they brightened the roaring ocean. And dare we say, after that, that Campbell has never written a great poem? Yes—in the face even of the Metropolitan.

It was said by the Edinburgh Review, that none but maudlin milliners and sentimental ensigns supposed that James Montgomery was a poet. Then is Maga a maudlin milliner, and Christopher North a sentimental ensign? We once called Montgomery a Moravian; and though he assures us that we were mistaken, yet having made an assertion, we always stick to it, and therefore he must remain a Moravian, if not in his own belief, yet in our imagination. Of all religious sects, the Moravians are the most simple-minded, pure-hearted, and high-souled—and these qualities shine serenely in the "Pelican Island." In earnestness and fervor that poem is by few or none excelled; it is embalmed in sincerity, and therefore shall fade not away, neither shall it moulder—not even although exposed to the air, and blow the air ever so rudely through time's mutations. Not that it is a mummy. Say rather a fair form laid asleep in immortality—its face wearing, day and night, summer and winter, look at it when you will, a saintly, a celestial smile. That is a true image; but is the "Pelican Island" a great poem? We pause not for a reply.

Lyrical poetry, we opine, hath many branches—and one of them, "beautiful exceedingly," with bud, blossom, and fruit of balm and brightness, round which is ever heard the murmur of bees and of birds, hangs trailing along the mossy greensward, when the air is calm, and ever and anon, when blow the fitful breezes, it is uplifted in the sunshine, and glows wavingly aloft, as if it belonged even to the loftiest region of the tree which is amaranth. That is a fanciful, perhaps foolish form of expression, employed at present to signify song-writing. Now, of all the song-writers that ever warbled, or chanted, or sung, the best, in our estimation, is verily none other than Thomas Moore. True, that Robert Burns has indited several songs that slip into the heart, just like light, no one knows how, filling its chambers sweetly and silently, and leaving it nothing more to desire for perfect contentment. Or let us say, sometimes when he sings, it is like listening to a linnet in the broom, a blackbird in the brake, a laverock in the sky. They sing in the fulness of their joy, as nature teaches them—and so did he—and the man, woman, or child who is delighted not with such singing, be their virtues what they may, must never hope to be in heaven. Gracious Providence placed Burns in the midst of the sources of lyrical poetry, when he was born a Scottish peasant. Now, Moore is an Irishman, and was born in Dublin. Moore is a Greek scholar, and translated—after a fashion—Anacreon. And Moore has lived all his life long in towns and cities, and in that society which will suffer none else to be called good. Some advantages he has enjoyed which Burns never did; but then how many disadvantages has he undergone from which the Ayrshire ploughman, in the bondage of his poverty, was free! You see all that at a single glance into their poetry. But all in humble life is not high—all in high life is not low; and there is as much to guard against in hovel as in hall—in "auld clay-biggings" as in marble palace. Burns too often wrote like a rude, unpolished boor—Moore has too often written like a mere man of fashion. But take them both at their best, and both are glorious. Both are national poets—and who shall say that if Moore had been born and bred a peasant, as Burns was, and if Ireland had been such a land of knowledge, and virtue, and religion as Scotland is—and surely without offence we may say that it never was, and never will be—though we love the green island well—that with his fine fancy, warm heart, and exquisite sensibilities, he might not have been as natural a lyricist as Burns, while, take him as he is, who can deny that in richness, in variety, in grace, and in almost all the power of art, he is infinitely superior to his illustrious rival? Of "Lallah Rookh" and the "Loves of the Angels," we defy you to read a page without admiration; but the question recurs, and it is easily answered, we need not say in the negative, did Moore ever write a great poem?

Let us make a tour of the lakes. Ridal Mount! Wordsworth! The bard! Here is the man who has devoted his whole life to poetry. It is his profession. He is a poet just as his brother is a clergyman. He is the head of the lake school, just as his brother is master of trinity. Nothing in this life and in this world has he had to do beneath sun, moon, and stars, but

"To murmur by the living brooks
A music sweeter than their own."

What has been the result? Five volumes (oh! why not five more?) of poetry as beautiful as ever charmed the ears of Pan and of Apollo. The earth, the middle air, the sky, the heaven, the heart, mind, and soul of man, are "the haunt and main region of his song." In describing external nature as she is, no poet, perhaps, has excelled Wordsworth—not even Thomson—in imbuing her and making her pregnant with spiritualities, till the mighty mother teems with "beauty far more beautiful" than she had ever rejoiced in till he held communion with her—therein lies his own especial glory, and therein the immortal evidences of the might of his creative imagination. All men at times "muse on nature with a poet's eye," but Wordsworth ever, and his soul has grown religious from worship. Every rock is an altar, every grove a shrine. We fear that there will be sectarians even in this natural religion till the end of time. But he is the high priest of nature—or, to use his own words, or nearly so, he is the high priest "in the metropolitan temple built by nature in the heart of mighty poets." But has he—even he—ever written a great poem? If he has, it is not the "Excursion." Nay—the "Excursion" is not a poem. It is a series of poems, all swimming in the light of poetry, some of them sweet and simple, some elegant and graceful, some beautiful and most lovely, some of "strength and state," some majestic, some magnificent, some sublime. But though it has an opening, it has no beginning; you can discover the middle only by the numerals on the page; and the most serious apprehensions have been very generally entertained that it has no end. While "Pedler," "Post," and "Solitary" breathe the vital air, may the "Excursion," stop where it will, be renewed; and as in its present shape it comprehends but a three days' walk, we have but to think of an excursion of three weeks, three months, or three years to feel the difference between a great and a long poem. Then the life of man is not always limited to the term of threescore and ten years. What a journal might it prove at last! Poetry in profusion till the land overflowed; but whether in one volume, as now, or in fifty, in future, not a great poem—nay, not a poem at all—nor ever to be so esteemed, till the principles on which great poets build the lofty rhyme are exploded, and the very names of art and science smothered and lost in the bosom of nature from which they arose.

Let the dullest clod that ever vegetated, provided only he be alive and hears, be shut up in a room with Coleridge, or in a wood, and subjected for a few minutes to the ethereal influence of that wonderful man's monologue, and he will begin to believe himself a poet. The barren wilderness may not blossom like the rose, but it will seem, or rather feel to do so, under the lustre of an imagination exhaustless as the sun. You may have seen perhaps rocks suddenly so glorified by sunlight with colors manifold, that the bees seek them deluded by the show of flowers. The sun, you know, does not always show his orb even in the daytime—and people are often ignorant of his place in the firmament. But he keeps shining away at his leisure, as you would know were he to suffer eclipse. Perhaps he—the sun—is at no other time a more delightful luminary, than when he is pleased to dispense his influence through a general haze, or mist—softening all the day till meridian is almost like the afternoon, and the grove, anticipating gloaming, bursts into "dance and minstrelsy" ere the god go down into the sea. Clouds too become him well—whether thin and fleecy and braided, or piled up all round about him castlewise and cathedral-fashion, to say nothing of temples and other metropolitan structures; nor is it reasonable to find fault with him, when, as naked as the hour he was born, "he flames on the forehead of the morning sky." The grandeur too of his appearance on setting has become quite proverbial. Now in all this he resembles Coleridge. It is easy to talk—not very difficult to speechify—hard to speak; but to "discourse" is a gift rarely bestowed by heaven on mortal man. Coleridge has it in perfection. While he is discoursing, the world loses all its common-places, and you and your wife imagine yourselves Adam and Eve listening to the affable archangel Raphael in the garden of Eden. You would no more dream of wishing him to be mute for a while than you would a river that "imposes silence with a stilly sound." Whether you understand two consecutive sentences, we shall not stop curiously to inquire; but you do something better; you feel the whole just like any other divine music. And 'tis your own fault if you do not

Reason is said to be one faculty, and imagination another, but there cannot be a grosser mistake; they are one and indivisible; only in most cases, like man and wife, they live like cat and dog, in mutual worrying, or haply sue for a divorce; whereas in the case of Coleridge they are one spirit as well as one flesh, and keep billing and cooing in a perpetual honey-moon. Then his mind is learned in all the learning of the Egyptians, as well as the Greeks and Romans; and though we have heard simpletons say that he knows nothing of science, we have heard him on chemistry puzzle Sir Humphrey Davy, and prove to our entire satisfaction that Leibnitz and Newton, though good men, were but indifferent astronomers. Besides, he thinks nothing of inventing a new science, with a complete nomenclature, in a twinkling; and should you seem sluggish of apprehension, he endows you with an additional sense or two, over and above the usual seven, till you are no longer at a loss, be it even to scent the music of fragrance, or to hear the smell of a balmy piece of poetry. All the faculties, both of soul and sense, seem amicably to interchange their functions and their provinces; and you fear not that the dream may dissolve, convinced that you are in a future state of permanent enjoyment. Nor are we now using any exaggeration; for if you will but think how unutterably dull are all the ordinary sayings and doings of this life, spent as it is with ordinary people, you may imagine how, in sweet delirium, you may be robbed of yourself by a seraphic tongue that has fed since first it lisped on "honey-dews," and by lips that have "breathed the air of Paradise," and learned a seraphic language, which all the while that it is English, is as grand as Greek, and as soft as Italian. We only know this, that Coleridge is the alchemist that in his crucible melts down hours to moments—and lo! diamonds sprinkled on a plate of gold.

What a world would this be, were all its inhabitants to fiddle like Paginini, ride like Ducrow, discourse like Coleridge, and do every thing else in a style of equal perfection! But, pray, how does the man write poetry with a pen upon paper, who thus is perpetually pouring it from his inspired lips? Read the "Ancient Mariner," the "Nightingale," and "Genevieve." In the first, you shudder at the superstition of the sea—in the second, you slumber in the melodies of the woods—in the third, earth is like heaven, for you are made to feel that

"All thoughts, all passions, all delights,
Whatever stirs this mortal frame,
All are but ministers of love,
And feed his holy flame."

Has Coleridge, then, ever written a great poem? No; for besides the regions of the fair, the wild, and the wonderful, there is another, up to which his wing might soar; for the plumes are strong as soft. But why should he who loveth to take "the wings of a dove that he may flee away" to the bosom of beauty, though there, never for a moment to be at rest—why should he, like an eagle, soar into the storms that roll above this visible diurnal sphere in peals of perpetual thunder?

Wordsworth, somewhere or other, remonstrates rather angrily with the public, against her obstinate ignorance, shown in persisting to put into one class himself, Coleridge, and Southey, as birds of a feather, that not only flock together, but warble the same sort of song. But he elsewhere tells us that he and Coleridge hold the same principles in the art poetical, and among his lyrical ballads he admitted the three finest compositions of his illustrious compeer. The public, therefore, is not to blame in taking him at his word, even if she had discerned no family likeness in their genius. Southey certainly resembles Wordsworth less than Coleridge does—but he lives at Keswick, which is but some dozen miles from Rydal, and perhaps with an unphilosophical though pensive public that link of connection should be allowed to be sufficient, even were there no other less patent and material than the Macadamized turnpike road. But true it is and of verity, that Southey, among our living poets, stands aloof and "alone in his glory." For he alone of them all has adventured to illustrate in poems of magnitude, the different characters, customs, and manners of nations. "Joan of Arc" is an English and French story—"Thalaba" an Arabian one—"Kehama" is Indian—"Madoc" Welsh and American—and "Roderic" Spanish and Moorish; nor would it be easy to say (setting aside the first, which was a very youthful work) in which of these noble poems Mr. Southey has most successfully performed an achievement entirely beyond the power of any but the highest genius. In "Madoc," and especially in "Roderic," he has relied on the truth of nature, as it is seen in the history of great national transactions and events. In "Thalaba" and in "Kehama," though in them, too, he has brought to bear an almost boundless lore, he follows the leading of fancy and imagination, and walks in a world of wonders. Seldom, if ever, has one and the same poet exhibited such power in such different kinds of poetry, in truth a master, and in fiction a magician. Of all these poems the conception and the execution are original; in much faulty and imperfect both; but bearing throughout the impress of highest genius, and breathing a moral charm, in the midst of the wildest, and sometimes even extravagant imaginings, that shall preserve them forever from oblivion, and embalm them in the spirit of love and of delight. Fairy tales, or tales of witchcraft and enchantment, seldom stir the holiest and deepest feelings of the heart; but "Thalaba" and "Kehama" do so; "the still sad music of humanity" is ever with us among all most wonderful and wild; and among all the spells, and charms, and talismans that are seen working strange effects before our eyes, the strongest of them all are ever felt to be piety and virtue. What exquisite pictures of domestic affection and bliss! what sanctity and devotion! Meek as a child is innocence in Southey's poetry, but mightier than any giant. How matron or maid, mother or daughter—in joy or sorrow—as they appear before us, doing or suffering, "beautiful and dutiful," with faith, hope, and charity, their guardian angels, nor fear ever once crossing their path! We feel in perusing such pictures, "purity! thy name is woman!" and are not these great poems? We are silent. But should you answer "yes," from us, in our present mood, you shall receive no contradiction.

"Like a spirit, still and bright,
With something of an angel light."

The transition always seems to us, we scarcely know why, as natural as delightful from Southey to Scott. We intend, some happy hour or other to draw parallel characters of these two chiefs, not exactly after the manner of Plutarch. For the present let it suffice—that for nothing can be more sketchy than this outline of an article—that we suggest to you that they alone of all the poets of the day have produced poems in which are pictured and narrated, epically, national characters, and events, and actions, and catastrophes. Southey has heroically invaded foreign countries; Scott as heroically brought his power to bear on his own people, and both have achieved immortal triumphs. But Scotland is proud of her great national minstrel—and as long as she is Scotland, will wash and warm the laurels round his brow, with rains and winds that will forever keep brightening their glossy verdure. Whereas, England, ungrateful ever, to her men of genius, already often forgets the poetry of Southey, while Little Britain abuses his patriotism in his politics. The truth is, that Scotland had forgotten her own history till Sir Walter burnished it all up till it glowed again—it is hard to say whether in his poetry or his prose the brightest—and the past became the present. We know now the character of our own people as it showed itself in war and peace, in palace, castle, hall, hut, hovel, and shieling, through centuries of advancing civilization, from the time when Edinburgh was first cycled Auld Reekie, down to the period when the bright idea first occurred to her inhabitants to call her the modern Athens. This he has effected by means of about one hundred volumes, each exhibiting to the life about thirty characters, and each character not only an individual in himself, or herself, but the representative—so we offer to prove, if you be sceptical—of a distinct class or order of human beings, from the monarch to the mendicant, from the queen to the gipsy; as for example, from the Bruce to Sir Richard Monipies, from Mary Stuart to Meg Merrilies. We shall never say that Scott is Shakespeare; but we shall say that he has conceived and created—you know the meaning of these words—a far greater number of characters—of real living flesh-and-blood human beings—and that more naturally, truly, and consistently than Shakespeare; who was sometimes transcendently great in pictures of the passions—but out of their range, which surely does not comprehend all rational being—was—nay, do not threaten to murder us—a confused and irregular delineator of human life. All the world believed that Sir Walter had not only exhausted his own genius in his poetry, but that he had exhausted all the matter of Scottish life—he and Burns together—and that no more ground unturned up lay on this side of the Tweed. Perhaps he thought so too for a while, and shared in the general and natural delusion. But one morning before breakfast it occurred to him, that in all his poetry he had done little or nothing—though more for Scotland than any other of her poets, or perhaps than all put together—and that it would not be much amiss to commence a new series of inventions. Hence the prose tales, novels, and romances—not yet at an end—fresh floods of light, pouring all over Scotland, and occasionally illuminating England, France, and Germany, and even Palestine—what ever land had been ennobled by Scottish enterprise, genius, valor, and virtue. Now, we beg leave to decline answering our own question—has he ever written a great poem? We do not care one straw whether he has or not, for he has done this—he has exhibited human life in a greater variety of forms and light, all definite and dis-ting, than any other man whose name has reached our ears—and therefore, without fear or trembling, we tell the world to its face, that he is, out of all sight, the greatest genius of the age, not forgetting Goethe, the Devil, and Dr. Faustus.

"What? Scott a greater genius than Byron?" Yes—beyond compare. Byron had a vivid and strong, but not a wide imagination. He saw things as they are, occasionally standing prominently and boldly out from the flat surface of this world; and in general, when his soul was up, he described them with a master's might. We speak of the external world—of nature and of art. Now observe how he dealt with nature. In his early poems he betrayed no passionate love of nature, though we do not doubt that he felt it; and even in the first two cantos of Childe Harold he was an unfrequent and no very devout worshipper at her shrine. We are not blaming his lukewarmness, but simply stating a fact. He had something else to think of, it would appear; and proved himself a poet. But in the third canto, "a change came over the spirit of his dream," and he "babbled o' green fields," floods, and mountains. Unfortunately, however, for his originality, that canto is almost a cento—his model being Wordsworth. His merit, whatever it may be, is limited, therefore, to that of imitation. And observe, the imitation is not merely occasional, or verbal; but all the descriptions are conceived in the spirit of Wordsworth, colored by it and shaped—from it they live, and breathe, and have their being—and that so entirely, that had the "Excursion" and "Lyrical Ballads" never been, neither had any composition at all resembling, either in conception or execution, the third canto of Childe Harold. His soul, however, having been awakened by the inspiration of the bard of nature, never afterwards fell asleep, nor got drowsy over her beauties or glories; and much fine description pervades most of his subsequent works. He afterwards made much of what he saw his own; and even described it after his own fashion; but a far mightier master in that domain was his instructor and guide—nor in his noblest efforts did he ever make any close approach to the beauty and sublimity of those inspired passages, which he had manifestly set as models before his imagination. With all the fair and great objects in the world of art, again, Byron dealt like a poet of original genius. They, themselves, and not descriptions of them, kindled his soul; and thus, "thoughts that breathe, and words that burn," do almost entirely compose the fourth canto, which is worth, ten times over, all the rest. The impetuosity of his career is astonishing; never for a moment does his wing flag; ever and anon he stoops but to soar again with a more majestic sweep; and you see how he glories in his flight—that he is proud as Lucifer. The two first cantos are frequently cold, cumbrous, stiff, heavy, and dull; and, with the exception of perhaps a dozen stanzas, and these far from being of first-rate excellence, are found woefully wanting in imagination. Many passages are but the baldest prose. Byron, after all, was right in thinking—at first—but poorly of these cantos—and so was the friend, not Mr. Hobbhouse, who threw cold water upon them in manuscript. True, they "made a prodigious sensation," but bitter bad stuff has often done that; while often unheeded or unheard has been an angel's voice. Had they been suffered to stand alone, long ere now had they been pretty well forgotten; and had they been followed by other two cantos, no better than themselves, then had the whole four in good time been most certainly damned. But fortunately, the poet, in his pride, felt himself pledged to proceed; and proceed he did in a superior style; borrowing, stealing, and robbing, with a face of aristocratic assurance that must have amazed the plundered; but intermingling with the spoil, riches fairly won by his own genius from the exhaustless treasury of nature, who loved her wayward, wicked, and wondrous son. Is "Childe Harold," then, a great poem? What! with one half of it little above mediocrity, one quarter of it not original, either in conception or execution, and the remainder glorious! As for his tales—the "Giaour," "Cornair," "Lara," "Bride of Abydos," "Siege of Corinth," and so forth—they are all spirited, energetic, and passionate performances—sometimes nobly and sometimes meanly versified—but displaying neither originality nor fertility of invention, and assuredly no wide range either of feeling or of thought, though over that range a supreme dominion. Some of his dramas are magnificent—and over many of his smaller poems, pathos and beauty overflow. "Don Juan" exhibits almost every kind of cleverness—and in it the degradation of poetry is perfect. Many of these hints will doubtless appear impertinent and heterodox; but we would not advise any hostile critic in any periodical work to attempt to prove them so; for if he do, he may count upon the crutch.

There are not a few other praiseworthy poets adorning this age, of whom it would be far from unpleasant to speak; but we appear to have proved our point that the age has not produced a single great poem. It is, however, as we said before, a most poetical age; and were we to gather together all the poetry it has produced, and fling it into one heap, what an Olympus!

(To be concluded in our next.)

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Hewitt, Broadway, has just issued the following pieces of music: the "Minstrel to his harp," a ballad; the "Sea," as sung by Phillips; "Come to the sun-set tree," poetry by Mrs. Hemans; "Prince Leopold's grand march;" the "Rover's bride," by T. Haynes Bayley; the "Leipic gallopade;" a "Waltz rondo," for the piano-forte; the "Bridal star," and the "Tompkins Blues' quick march."

MONUMENTS IN EDINBURGH.

There are no less than three public monuments in process of erection in the metropolis of Scotland. One to Dugald Stewart, one to Robert Burns, and one to King George the Fourth.

DECEMBER.

DECEMBER in New-York, if not the pleasantest month in the year, is still sure to furnish us with enjoyments which cannot be tasted at any other season. The Christmas holidays commence on the twenty-fifth, when thousands of grateful hearts unite to celebrate the nativity of our blessed Redeemer. "As the closing festival of the year, Christmas eclipses all its predecessors in splendor and hilarity; and Christmas eve in the city of New-York, exhibits a spectacle, which, to a stranger, must be highly pleasing and imposing. Whole rows of confectionary stores and toy-shops, fancifully, and often splendidly, decorated with festoons of bright silk drapery, interspersed with artificial flowers and natural evergreens, are brilliantly illuminated by gas-lights, arranged in every shape and form that fancy can devise. During the evening, until midnight, these places are crowded with visitors, some selecting toys and fruits for holiday presents; others merely sauntering from shop to shop to enjoy the varied scene. But the most interesting, and, in our estimation, the most delightful sight of all, is the happy and animated countenances of children on this occasion. Their joys cannot be restrained, but burst forth into boisterous mirth, or beam from the countenance in sunny smiles, which are still more expressive. If the weather be fair, music is heard from various quarters, while changing peals from the chiming bells of old Trinity, fall at intervals on the delighted ear."

Our English ancestors always considered Christmas in "the double light of a holy commemoration, and a cheerful festival; and accordingly distinguished it by devotion, by vacation from business, by merriment and hospitality." They seemed eagerly bent to make themselves and every body about them happy. The great hall resounded with the tumultuous joys of servants and tenants, and the gambols they played served as amusement to the lord of the mansion and his family; who, by encouraging every act conducive to mirth and entertainment, endeavored to soften the rigor of the season, and mitigate the influence of winter.

On Christmas eve, it was customary with our ancestors to light up candles of an uncommon size, and lay a log of wood upon the hearth called a yule-log, to illuminate the house, and as it were, to turn night into day. The custom of decorating their churches and dwellings with evergreens, at this season, is still observed by their descendants, though few have ever investigated its origin. "Among the ancient Romans, the laurel was an emblem of peace, joy, and victory; whence, it has been conjectured, we have taken the custom of dressing up our houses with laurel, as an emblem of joy for the victory gained over the power of darkness, and of that peace on earth, and good will towards man, which the angels sang over the fields of Bethlehem! Other evergreens were subsequently added, with artificial flowers, and such other ornaments, as taste and fancy have successively suggested.

We most cordially agree with the writer just quoted, in the following sentiments:—"Let the external decorations and the superficial forms of this anniversary fade and fall into desuetude; or be replaced with newer glories, as fashion and caprice may dictate; but, let not the spirit of Christmas, at once holy and festive, ever evaporate from our feelings or be chilled by a non-observance of this happy season. Let the laurel—the symbol of peace and good-will—be green in our hearts, though it no longer adorn our parlors. A proper observance of the prescribed religious duties, hospitality and social brotherhood; an interchange of love; promoting presents; the festive board; the blazing fire; the moderate bowl, enlivened by music, wit, and song; the harmless sports and pastimes, for which none are too old who find a reflected pleasure from delighting the young; or who can renew, even for a single evening, the pleasant memories of their own childhood; but, above all, that enlarged philanthropy, which prompts us to look beyond our own circle of smiling faces, and to light up a similar gladness in the cottages of the poor by acts of charity—these are the observances which every man, to the extent of his ability, is strictly bound to maintain; for they constitute the foundation of that religion which inculcates universal love."

In country places, as has been before observed, where home-born joys must necessarily be resorted to, the Christmas holidays, perhaps, afford the highest degree of satisfaction. The gigantic yule-log, a long time previously selected for the purpose, is rolled upon the hearth; and around the crackling flame, soon kindled before it, is placed a plentiful supply of nuts, cake, and sparkling cider, to regale the mirthful circle.

"In all my wanderings through this vale of tears,
From infancy to manhood's riper years,
Whatever pains assailed, or griefs oppress'd,
Christmas and New-year always saw me best.
A lengthened absence o'er, how pleasant then
To meet the friends I dearest loved again!
Grasp the warm hand, or share the fond embrace,
And see new smiles lit up in every face.
'Twas Christmas-eve—the supper-board was spread,
The fire blazed high, with logs of hickory fed;
The candles, too, unusual lustre lent,
Candles expressly made for this event.
Old tales were told—the cheerful glass went round,
While peals of laughter made the cot resound.
A thousand welcomes hailed the truant boy,
And swift the moments flew on hours of joy;
Till (as they thought, too soon) the hour of prayer
Bade the young urchins to their beds repair;
But first the stocking from each little leg
Must be suspended from a hook or peg.
That Santa Claus, who travels all the night,
Might, in the dark, bestow his favors right.
These rites observed—they take a parting kiss,
And go to dream of morning's promised bliss;
Thus did a week of festive pleasures roll,
Till New-year's happy morning crown'd the whole."

MY AUNT.

My aunt has many queer notions,
She never butters her bread;
She declares that the Bulwer novels
Are things not fit to be read;
She thinks that to flirt is a crime,
And especially with youth;
And she thinks the "Paradise Lost,"
Is every syllable truth.
My aunt has got to her spectacles,
Though without them she sees well enough;
She is very well versed in politics,
And thinks your poetry stuff.
She imagines that all the clergymen
Are as wise as wise can be;
She thinks that Pope is a poet—
But there she agrees with me.
She dreams she can tell the mark that is left
On my cousin's lip by a kiss;
And of all her antic theories
I am sure not to meddle with this.
She might tell the track of a bird through the air,
Or the track of a ship on the sea—
On the viewless heart, not the visible lip,
The stamp of a kiss will be!

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MASANIELLO is less successful than Cinderella. The prevailing opinion appears to be that it is, in several instances, ineffectively cast, and in a manner different from that originally intended. In every other respect it is well got up, and would have been uncommonly attractive. Mr. Sinclair's Masaniello is superior to all his previous efforts. There is less redundancy of embellishment, he displays a better conception of the character, acts altogether with more spirit and feeling, and imparts greater effect to the music. We have before remarked that his barcarole in the second act is strikingly beautiful, and the fragments of melodies which the rebel fisherman has sung in the earlier parts of the piece, and which, in his mad scene after the poisoning, float in broken passages through his wandering imagination, were very creditable specimens of his ability. Mr. Richings escaped safely through some pretty perilous pieces of music, partly sheltered under cover of an influenza. His playing was forcible and excellent, as in such pieces it usually is. Mrs. Barrymore, the dumb girl, exhibited the same skill in pantomime for which she has already been deservedly praised in the Dumb Savoyard, but a little more pathos might heighten the effect, which is injured by the superabundance of merry dancing. Mrs. Sharpe, as Elvira, exerted herself greatly, and her execution of the first few passages was quite above mediocrity, but every repetition of the opera has rendered it more clearly apparent that the part is entirely out of her sphere, as is also that of Alfonso out of Mr. Thorne's. Yet, we may add, it would be ingratiate to the past services of both these useful performers in other departments, to forget that the present characters, from their attempts of which we are obliged to withhold praise, are not voluntarily assumed by them, but are undertaken at the command of those who have superintended the getting up of the piece. It is no discredit to a successful representative of Lady Macbeth, that she is not at home in opera, nor to a singer with a pleasing base voice, that he does not make a hit in a part written for a high tenor.

Mr. Forest's Gladiator continues to draw, after numerous repetitions. He played it in this city to a large and gratified audience. The star of little Burke's bright fortune does not seem to strengthen its lustre.

The American Theatre and the Richmond Hill, present strong bills. Miss Clifton has been extending her circle of admirers, and Mrs. Duff, at the Richmond Hill, brings white heads, and wise ones too, to enjoy her striking and powerful playing. It is announced that her daughter, Miss Duff, whose reputation has already reached us, is to appear at this house.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

CINDERELLA IN PHILADELPHIA.

GENTLEMEN—It may not be unacceptable to many of your readers to hear of the progress which this "enfant gâté" of the New-York public has made during its visit to a sister city. In removing this pet child from under the care of the parent public which fostered its infancy, the principal agents in the affair naturally had some dread; first, as to the mode in which the piece would be treated in its production by a new management; and secondly, as to its reception by a new public. The first difficulty seemed, in a great degree, removed, by the fact, that Mr. Maywood was lessee of the theatre in Chestnut-street, whose experience and knowledge of the profession are well known. The second and greater apprehension, as regards its reception by a new audience, was materially alleviated by the known facts, that the Philadelphians are great amateurs of music; that when the French operas were well performed they were well supported; and that Cinderella, in point of musical composition, had claims of a very high order; the talents of Mr. Jones would bear criticism, and Mrs. Austin's musical attainments were previously established. The only remaining point, then, was the capability of Mr. Maywood's company to fill the very extended cast of the piece, including a full band and complete choir. Suffice it to say, that the orchestral and choral arrangements were committed to Norton, and for further explanation we proceed to the night of performance. The doors of the gallery and pit were besieged long before the time of entrance; and, on the former being opened, a rush took place which filled the theatre with sable and party-colored gentlemen, who had no particular disposition to pay; the police having restored order, the overture commenced to a house crowded from pit to gallery. In the band we observed Milon, as chef d'orchestre; Norton, Cuddy, Reinhardt, and almost every musician of eminence in Philadelphia; at the first double bass, Meignan; at the second, Worral. The overture was received with great applause, and was, in truth, admirably played. The curtain then rose to the light and playful notes of the flute—and such a flute!—and the groups of fairies commenced their gambols, as at the Park. This scene decidedly exceeded that at New-York; there was a greater warmth of coloring, and a dazzling effect, admirably in keeping, with birds of all descriptions, which plumed themselves, and fluttered in every direction across the water; fish, of golden and silver hues, likewise sported through the waves. The fairy queen appeared on the lake, in a car drawn by swans—a far superior mode of travelling to that adopted at the Park, where two boys, in blue bed-gowns and black leather shoes, tug for dear life to bring on Mrs. Wallack. The flying cupids, likewise, consisted of certain painted representatives of the same in the distance, and left a better impression upon the audience than the two or three children suspended by the back at the Park theatre, like the sign of the golden fleece over the door of a hosier's shop. The female chorus, however, was neither so graceful nor so effective in their music as those we have been accustomed to see and hear in New-York; not so with the fairy queen—her music was much better executed, her action lighter, and more graceful; and her personation of the old woman excellent. Mrs. Wallack had, however, one superiority—her diction is less hurried, and more distinct. Before we quit the fairy queen we have to add, that her appearance in the finale of the first act was very properly in the likeness of an old woman, not of a fairy; and in the second act her entrance, instead of being clumsily managed from behind, took place through the fire-place. The scenery, excepting the first, is hardly equal to that of the Park; the transformation of the kitchen into a palace not so perfect; but that of Cinderella and Pedro, during the dance, better. The male chorus was strong and perfect to a note. Alidora was played by Mr. Rowbotham admirably; he sang the music as well as Richings, and looked more like "that wonderful man whose great wisdom, whose flaming lights—but allow me to present to you," my daughters—who were Mrs. Rowbotham and Miss Amelia Fisher, and who sang extremely well; the former acted the part as well as we could wish; the latter was superior to her sister, Mrs. Vernon, in singing, but lacked that humor which makes that lady so excellent a representative of Thibbe. Mr. Mercer was the valet Dandini; his voice is firmer and stronger than that of Mr. Thorne, and more effective in concerted music, although not so flexible; he acted the part with a good deal of broad humor, but not with so much neatness. We know that actors will make the audience laugh if they can, and if they cannot succeed with the better classes they will try the worst. We never yet could assent to the propriety of arranging the cloak ungracefully, and pressing the hat over the eyes in such a character as that of Dandini, whose daily occupation is avowedly the arranging garments so as to set off his master's figure to the best advantage; however, we suppose Messrs. Thorne and Mercer know best, or think they do, which is the same thing, touching such matters. We have now to speak of the Baron, who was represented by Mr. John Fisher, and really he exceeded our expectations. To please in the Baron Pumpolino, after Placide has been seen in that character, we consider a very arduous undertaking. Dull pomposity and grave absurdity in him have so powerful a representative; and, withal, he is what the French term so toujours en scène, and so correct and efficient in the music, that any body else must fail in some of these particulars. Mr. John Fisher dressed the character admirably; but he was too light, too fidgety, and lost many of the finest points in the piece for want of that impenetrable gravity which pervades Placide; he was correct in his music, and although not equal to our New-York buffo in the concerted pieces generally, yet in the comic duet, "Sir, a secret," there was very little to choose between them. Pedro we found in the hands of Roberts, and he had formed a very different conception of the character from Mr. Placide. We are not prepared to say a better conception; but, nevertheless, it was a very amusing one. He threw a sluggish manner and dry humor into the part, which was extremely droll; and his persuading Cinderella to smile upon the people, and hold out her foot, both which gestures he described, convulsed the audience with laughter.

The second representation brought a fine house, more fashionably attended than the first; the box-book for the third was better than either of the foregoing, but an apology was made for Cinderella, whose last trip to the ball had afflicted her with the prevailing influenza, of which malady she is confined at this present writing, to the great dismay of the manager, and disappointment of those who have already secured seats for future performances. This opera has established the fact, that if managers can be found with sufficient taste and sense to get up sterling pieces, with fine music, executed with fidelity by efficient performers, Philadelphia has taste enough to appreciate and wealth enough to reward such exertions, while quackery will fail in both cities.

STENOGRAPHIC MACHINE.

At a late sitting of the Royal Academy of Sciences, a statement was made that a skilful mechanic, residing in the south of France, had invented a stenographic machine by which it is possible to write sixty times faster than it is to speak. The machine consists of keys, the touches of which correspond with letters.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

COURTSHIP.

THE other day I received the following letter, which I hand to you, gentlemen of the Mirror, for publication. It comes from a young man whom I have been accustomed to advise upon various subjects, as, notwithstanding I am much the elder, there subsists between us a kind of friendship, of a warm and faithful nature:—

DEAR SEDLEY.—Although you may be inclined to smile upon the perusal of this, you will restrain your mirth, and furnish me with a serious opinion, when I declare that I am deeply interested in the event. Be secret as the grave, I pray and beseech you, for dear, dear Sedley, I am in love. How I came to be so, I can scarcely explain, but that I am so, alas, alas! these fevers and tremors, these lofty hopes and childish fears—the transcendent brightness of one, and the comparative dimness of all the world beside, but too clearly prove. I am subject to capricious depressions and exhilarations of spirits. I tremble when I come into her presence. Every thing I say, or do, or feel, convinces me that I am in love. But now, (I can feel myself blush in thus exposing my secret emotions, even to you) now we come to my grand misfortune: I have found it impossible to make my beloved Lavinia, comprehend my sentiments, although I have never neglected to pay her every marked and tender duty becoming a devoted lover to his mistress; although I have racked my brain in inventing elegant double entendres, by means of which I might declare my passion, although apparently performing the most trivial office of civility, yet she takes no more notice of the same than if she were my sister. That you may more clearly perceive how perverse, how deaf and blind my enchantress is, I shall enumerate several little tender things I have vainly said and done in order to touch her flinty heart, and open her dear, obstinate, beautiful eyes. Having last week attended her and her family to the play, I so far forgot myself, during the recitation of a soft passage, which I deemed applicable to my own feelings, that I seized her hand, and gave it such a gentle and expressive squeeze as I thought must do the business for me effectually, when she turned around, with an air of sweet surprise, and asked me if I was “going.” On another occasion I sat with her in the midst of a large circle, one of whom was reading the address of a lover to his mistress. It was so eloquent, and so exactly expressive of my own misery, that I felt my eyes grow moist, and cast a look of meaning towards my innamorata, intending, by treading lightly on her toe, to make her perceive how I was affected. Instead of producing my object, however, she informed me, across the table, that I was treading on her foot, with so much gravity and simplicity, that I am sure either her innocent soul has not the slightest conception that I love her, or else she is the most consummate actress that ever existed.

I have thus already declared myself a thousand times, and in a thousand different ways. I have expressed my passion while handing her a plate of bread and butter, or let it betray itself when other people thought I was poking the fire. I have done every thing that a modest man should, except plump myself down upon my knee, like respectable lovers in small-clothes, represented in the old novels, and yet I cannot detect in her, even in her most unguarded moments, any evidence that she returns my attachment, or even that she has any idea of its existence. I think I will write her a letter, only one would not like to see such things in the hand of a third person. Even should I do so, and with a trembling hand and beating heart, upon a sheet of rose-colored gold-edged paper, trace the interesting and elegant confession:—“Madam—You must be aware, from my frequent visits, little attentions, &c. &c. that my heart,” &c. &c. &c.; I should not be astonished on my next visit to find the fatal letter lying wide open on her table, or getting commented on by some detestable fop, with whiskers and whalebone cane, for the benefit of a select company.

Now, dear Mr. Sedley, what shall I do?—Shall I at once abandon the chase? alas! that is impossible. Shall I, one of these days, when I catch her alone, make up to her boldly, and swear I love her, and will marry her, if she will let me? I fear my tongue would cleave to the roof of my mouth; my voice would fail me, and one of her quizzical looks would annihilate me utterly. Believe me, &c. &c.

Yours, R. L. B.

I truly sympathize with this unfortunate young man, and have thought I could render him the most appropriate service by printing his account, that the young lady, whoever she is, may take the hint, and either dismiss him at once, or give him, at least, some trifling testimony that she may one day be brought to love him. Although no subject is more often the theme of ridicule than that of love, yet few men can say they have not, at times, deemed it of more importance to their happiness than they are willing to confess. Who has not loved?—who has not, at some period of his life, found a little saucy gipsy more dear than any thing else earthly—some particular pair of eyes that possessed the magic power of ruling his proud feelings, as the moon does the tide, and shooting delicious transports, or exquisite agonies along his nerves. There is a time, when a young girl is raised to the rank of an omnipotent despot over the happiness of her lover, and I confess I should be inclined to consider her a worthy or unworthy character, by her actions towards him. If she love him, she should, in the proper time, and with due modesty, suffer him to perceive her preference. There is a noble frankness in this, superior to any rule of fashion, which a man of true delicacy and sensibility will instantly appreciate.

As for our friend, the author of the above letter, we recommend him to fall straightway in love with some more acute and discriminating damsel, or to go forward, like a man, and offer her his hand and heart. Whether he choose to do so by letter, or by any other fashion, ought to be the result of circumstances; but there is something dissatisfactory in the former method, and, I confess an antipathy to it. It is like sending in a bill, and has a cool business-look, inconsistent with the fullness and wealth of love, which ought to be gushing out from the overflowing young heart, in a thousand various directions. What can be more stiff than this?

“Madam—Permit me to adopt this method of discovering what you cannot be altogether ignorant of,” &c. &c.—and, “Sir—Your favor came to hand this morning, and, after showing it to papa and mamma, I have come to the conclusion that,” &c.

Give me the girl who can feel, and return feeling, without pen, ink, and paper. Let her lover be with her in the ordinary circumstances of daily life; let him take her hand in the dance; assist her into a carriage, or across the room; let them be distant when observed, but their eyes meet by stealth; let him whisper one word when accident flings them together alone; let him then hold her hand in the twilight room, when the dusky beams of the fire fill the apartment with pleasant shadows, and heighten all her charms; let him breathe his hopes and feelings into her half-averted ear; let her face reward him with one glowing look of love, before it buries its blushing beauties in his bosom, and then—grave and respectable readers of this gazette, pardon me—recollections of departed years, whither have ye led me? A momentary flush of youth stole over my cold spirit; I will not be so betrayed again.

The character of the young lady which my friend has depicted above, reminds me of one whom I once knew, of an exactly opposite description. Instead of resolutely blinding herself to the attempts of her lover to express his attachment, she was forever eagerly on the look out for evidences of the effects of her fascinations, and frequently succeeded in discovering them, when the lover himself was ignorant of them. A gentleman could scarcely be decent to her without convincing her that his heart was a little touched. If you drank her health, you were yielding gradually to her enchantments; carving her a piece of the beef was attended with no little risk; and leaning over her at the piano, established your reputation as a desperate adorer.

Such a lady resembles a whirlpool. Young gentlemen should be careful how they sail too near her, or they may find themselves sucked down into a promise of marriage before they suspect whom they are talking to. A civil smile covers the sensitive damsel with embarrassment and blushes; and if you hand her a motto paper, she tells you, “No, her heart is engaged to another.” There is a third class of females, who lie like pointed rocks in the apparently serene sea of courtship. They are such as will suffer from a youth any reasonable familiarity. You may squeeze their hands, snatch a kiss from their lips, steal a curl from their head, assail their hearts with the most tender attentions, until, in fact, you believe matters quite settled, and look about for “a two-story brick house, in a genteel part of the city,” when, to your horror and consternation, you discover some handsome young puppy has been actually doing the same thing, and under the same impression. From these, and similar troubles, which I may make the theme of a future essay, I am confirmed in a resolution of bachelorship, which “fire cannot burn out of me.”

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

THE DEATH OF THE GENTLE USHER.

A CHAPTER FROM AN UNPUBLISHED NOVEL.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

Like light
That needs must die, although its little beam
Reflects upon a diamond.—Shelley.

CLEMENT REVERE, though filling an office not often popular, was loved like an elder brother by every boy under his care. He performed his duties with a modest and unassuming gentleness, that won the heart of the most refractory. Few could remember a harsh word from his lips, and yet his government was salutary and perfect to a degree never known in the previous annals of the school, and his particular pupils were remarked always at college for the vein of scholarlike and nice apprehension which ran through their attainments in the particular reading for which he had prepared them. He was himself a ripe and beautiful scholar, imbued to the very soul with the sweetness and fulness of classic poetry, and it was his only weakness as a teacher, that he would take the hesitating passage from the lips of the forgotten delinquent, and read on, in the exquisite cadence of his Latinity, with a flushed cheek and a kindling eye, to the end.

He had studied originally for the pulpit, but a pulmonary weakness had compelled him to relinquish the profession; and with the bitter disappointment of his highest hopes lying heavily at his heart, he sat down sadly, but resignedly, to his trying employment. In preparing for duties he was not to fulfil, however, he had found, like many others, that there were temptations far short of the goal, strong and winning enough to make even the most earnest slacken in his career; and it went well nigh to console him for his checked ambition, that he was left idle by the sweet wells of knowledge, and could accomplish himself, without reproach, in the seductive graces of the scholar. Later than any light in the village burned the solitary lamp in the usher's window; and the shadow of his slight figure bending over his book, lay sometimes for hours as motionless as a painting on the white curtain. It was plain to every body's eye that he was a martyr to study. As he went stooping along the path to school, putting his hand frequently to his side, as if to still a sudden pain, the very villagers looked after him with pity. His form was the slightest that could be called a man's. A little above the middle height, and with a painful stoop in his slender chest, he looked as if he were walking out for the first time under the extremest emaciation of sickness. His countenance still held the look of calm, placid abstraction, and though it was probable, from the habitual pressure of his hand upon his side, that he suffered constant pain, the sweet, child-like smile upon his lips never changed, and his tone, up to the last day he sat in his desk, had kept its winning and serene cheerfulness unbroken.

The gentle usher had given his last lesson. A slight cold had settled upon his lungs, and after raising blood all night, with a distressing cough, he was found upon his bed at morning too faint and exhausted even to speak. The physician was called in, but a single glance at his unnaturally bright eye, and the vivid spot flushing in his cheek, convinced him that it was too late; and ordering only some soothing medicines which relieved his immediate distress, he left him to sink as gently as he might, amid the appliances of affectionate care, to his grave.

For several days he lay without much pain, growing hourly, though almost imperceptibly, weaker and weaker. His reason was still clear; and as he needed little attendance, the eldest of his particular pupils watched with him, by turns. On the fourth night of his illness, he sent unexpectedly for Ernest. He had taken a fancy to his new pupil in the short time he had been under his care, and the boy's heart had leaped to him at once with a strong reciprocation of interest. He obeyed the summons with a sorrowful eagerness.

The sick man welcomed him with a smile as he entered, and when the nurse had retired to rest, Ernest read to him, at his request, till he slept. As soon as his breathing became audible, he closed the book, and sitting down at the open window, looked out upon the night. The air blew cool and freshly amid his hair, and the solemn click of the cricket, mingling with the low murmur from the distant river, fell with a pleasant harmony upon his ear. Across the valley in every direction shot the vanishing streak of the fire-fly; and softly above burned the unclouded stars, twinkling like revolving lamps in the heavens; and as the young watcher gazed on their beautiful order, and took in with his eye the glorious bend of their courses, and felt the absolute stillness of the night pressing on him like the hand of some invisible spirit, a feeling of awe mingled with a wild delight came over him, and he uttered an involuntary exclamation—“how beautiful! how beautiful!”

“Yes!” said a low, sweet tone at his ear; and forgetting his surprise in the fascination of the voice, he yielded his chair to the dying usher, and sat down in a listening attitude beside him—“Yes; and beautiful as they are, they are all accurately numbered and governed, and just as they burn now have they burned since the creation, ‘never faint in their watches,’ and never absent from their place. How glorious they are! How thrilling it is to see them stand with such a constant silence in the sky, unsteady and unsupported, obeying the great law of their Maker! What pure and silvery light it is! How steadily it pours from those small fountains, giving every spot of earth its due portion! The hovel and the palace are shone upon equally, and the shepherd gets as broad a beam as the king, and these few rays that are now streaming into my feverish eyes were meant and lavished only for me. I have often thought—(cover me, Ernest! the night grows chill)—I have often thought how ungrateful I have been in calling myself poor, when there is so much that no poverty can take away. Clusters of silver rays from every star in these heavens are mine. Every breeze that breaks on my forehead was sent for my refreshment. Every echo that I catch from that sweet river playing upon its pebbled bottom below us, was meant for my ear, and this subdued fragrance that comes up from the earth to my window, and the singing of these melancholy insects, and your own care, my dear Ernest, are all gifts that poverty could not take away. It is not often that I forget these treasures—(sit closer to me, Ernest! the night grows cold)—not often, for I have loved the night-heavens with a passionate affection from my boyhood, and nature in every form has been always unspeakably dear to me—for in it I see the evidence of an Almighty Maker; and in the excessive beauty of the stars, and the unfading and equal glory of their steadfast fires, I see glimpses of immortal beauty, and find an answer to the eternal questioning within me.

One—two!—the village clock strikes clear to-night! Chase my hands, Ernest—I am very cold. Nay, not to bed yet—!—I sit awhile longer, and look upon the stars. It is the last time—I am sure of it—the very last! Yet, to-morrow night those stars will all be there—not one missing from the sky, nor shining one ray the less because I am dead. It is strange that this thought should be so bitter—strange that the companionship should be so close between our earthly affections and those spiritual worlds; and stranger yet, that, satisfied as we must be that we shall know them nearer and better when released from our flesh, we still cling so fondly to our earthly and imperfect vision. I feel, Ernest, that I shall traverse hereafter every star in those bright heavens. If the course of that career of knowledge, which I believe in my soul it will be the reward of the blessed to run, be determined in any degree by the strong desires that yearn so sickeningly within us, I see the thousand gates of my future heaven shining at this instant above me. There they are—the clustering Pleiades, with their “sweet influences,” and the morning star melting into the east with its transcendent lambency and whiteness, and the broad galaxy with its myriads of bright spheres dissolving into each other's light, and belting the heavens like a girdle. I shall see them all! I shall know them and their inhabitants as the angels of God know them. The mystery of their order, and the secret of their wonderful harmony, and the duration of their appointed courses—all will be clear! I am glad that I am dying now. I would not—(colder—colder—how chill it is!) I would not live longer. * * * Well—well—I'll get to bed. * * * So—cover me! * * * Cold—cold—cold! will nothing warm me? * * * Press my hand, Ernest! * * * I feel it not—dying—dying—dying! Oh God! release me quickly! * * * Still cold—still living!—raise my head, Ernest!—dying—dying!”

Ernest took the lamp, and sitting down by the bedside gazed upon the face of the dead usher with irresistible curiosity. It was the first time he had even seen death. The lids were half closed, and in the clear blue eyes, still visible through the long dark eyelashes, there swam a softness as if they were filled with tears. He gazed upon the lips, slightly parted as if about to speak, and looking, in their fresh color and placid mildness of expression, as if just about to break into a smile, and, with tenderness, as if the form beneath him were living, he put away a lock of silken hair from his forehead, and counted the branching veins lying blue and lifeless upon his finely-formed temples. Could this be death!

He sat holding the dim lamp to the face till a broad sun-beam, falling upon the motionless lips from the eastern window, interrupted his busy thoughts.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

THE subject of female education, although much discussed, is not exhausted, and with pleasure we bear witness to the fact that of late years it has assumed a more favorable aspect in this city and its environs. Among other similar institutions, report speaks highly of the Brooklyn Collegiate Institute for Young Ladies. The following address was delivered at the late anniversary of that establishment by Fanning C. Tucker, president of the board of trustees. It is from the pen of a writer, herself an accomplished female of no ordinary reputation for poetic ability and general literary attainments. We copy it into our pages with the view of affording to our young readers the advantage of a perusal, which, we believe, was intended to be confined to the members of the institute.

AN ADDRESS ON FEMALE EDUCATION.

BY MRS. EMMA C. EMBURY.

At the present period of society, when the light of knowledge, no longer the feeble glimmering of an uncertain dawn, is rapidly becoming "brighter and brighter unto the perfect day," it may seem idle and superfluous to call your attention to so hackneyed a subject as that of education. But permit me to observe, that a subject of such vital importance to us, both as individuals and citizens, can scarcely be too often presented to our view. There is, perhaps, no country in the world, where the benefits of education are so fully appreciated, and so widely diffused, as in our own. Schools, both public and private, have multiplied in every part of the union; and even our common seminaries are now conducted upon such enlarged and liberal principles, as were formerly unknown beyond the walls of a university. But, even in this enlightened age, there is one point which yet remains somewhat in dispute—I mean the education of females. It is not long since the belief in woman's inferior capacity was at least tacitly admitted; and there are many even now who adhere to that belief: but let us inquire what domain of human knowledge man can claim as his exclusive right. Is it the boundless field of classic lore? Where can be found a more indefatigable laborer in that fruitful soil, than was Madame Dacier, the elegant translator of Plutarch? Is it the rugged steep of science? How few of all those who have toiled up that ascent ever attained such an elevated station as Maria Agnesi, the young and beautiful professor of mathematics at Bologna! Is it the thorny road of political economy, or the flowery paths of general literature? Who has ever traversed the former with such masculine vigor, or threaded the pleasant mazes of the latter with such feminine tact as Madame de Staël, the wonder of the other sex, the envy of ours? Is it the fairy land of poesy? Who, since the days of Shakspeare, could lay claim to the title of "Poet of the Passions," until it was proudly won by Miss Baillie? Where, since the early days of Campbell, have been found more sweetness and polish than in the productions of our universal favorite, Mrs. Hemans?

From the almost numberless examples of female intellect, a few only have been adduced, with which we are all familiar; and surely they are enough to convince any unprejudiced mind that heaven has conferred upon woman, no less than upon man, the gifts of talent and genius. By the proper restraints of her sex, woman is prevented from buffeting the waves of popular prejudice, and diving into the depths of science after the yet undiscovered gems of truth; but who will dare assert that she is therefore insensible to their value, or incapable of grasping them?

It has been asserted by some, whose minds were capable of a much wider range of observation than the remark would seem to indicate, that education, though it always renders man an ornament to his station in society, invariably unfits a woman for the duties which seem to have been allotted her by nature. This cannot possibly be true. Our ordinary experience certainly affords no proof that an enlightened mind is the most prone to error; it rather teaches us that they whose eyes have been opened to "see the right," seldom will voluntarily "the wrong pursue." I speak not now of what is usually termed the eccentricity of genius, though that might be referred to as another evidence of the necessity of a proper education; for, were talents always subjected to the discipline of the schools, we should not find a Mary Wollstonecraft pleading the cause of immorality and atheism under pretence of advocating the rights of women; nor would our country have been so recently insulted by the presence of a woman, who still more boldly tramples upon the restraints of modesty and decorum, and publicly proclaims herself the "apostle of infidelity." These are things which, if they were the result of mental cultivation, would induce a parent to suppress every glimmering of intellect in his darling and innocent child; but we need no argument to convince us that only those who have been "nursed in darkness," are prone to evil rather than to good.

Another objection which has been urged, with some apparent truth, against the present enlarged system of female education is, that it is calculated to render women pedants and bookworms, rather than useful members of the domestic circle; but to confute this, we need only recur to our own personal experience; since, doubtless, there are few among us, who cannot number among their friends women as much distinguished for domestic virtues as for superior intellect and extensive acquirements. Indeed, is it not absurd to suppose that our daily repast will be less grateful, because intellect and elegance preside at the social board? or that our household fires will burn less brightly, because kindled by a torch from the shrine of Minerva?

The true cause of all these various objections appears to be a misconception of the term education. A good education includes the culture of the heart as well as of the mind. It implies not merely the improvement of the mental faculties, but also the government of the passions and the proper direction of the affections. We should not think a garden beautiful where the weeds had been allowed to grow up among the flowers, however green and flourishing it might appear; neither should we deem a woman well educated whose heart was the abode of folly and vanity, however her mind might be stored with knowledge. One of our best writers on education (herself a striking proof of its benefits) has compared a well regulated mind to a watch, where every part is so nicely balanced, that no one can preponderate. This is a very apt illustration. Of the various faculties with which heaven has endowed us, each may be perfect in itself, but from some error in our adjustment of them, (if I may use the term,) all may become useless. It is only by the most unwearied self-discipline that this correct balance of the mental powers can be effected; and the ability to discipline one's self can only be derived from education.

To employ the rapidly developing faculties of early childhood merely as sources of amusement to ourselves, is certainly not the proper method of bestowing upon our children the treasures of wisdom; yet this is the course usually pursued. If we would reap the rich harvest of a truly good education, the work of cultivation must commence at a much earlier period than even our most zealous laborers in the field of knowledge would deem necessary. As soon as a child is capable of receiving different degrees of pleasure from different objects, the task of instruction should commence; not however, by means of dry precept and tedious disquisition, for these would be incomprehensible; but by resorting to all those thousand devices which a judicious instructor is so ingenious in contriving, in order to inform as well as amuse. Every opportunity of imparting knowledge should be eagerly seized; for knowledge acquired at such an age, becomes a part of our very nature; and, whatever may be the course of our after life, the impressions received in early childhood are never totally effaced.

But to whom is the sacred and laborious duty of early instruction delegated? Is it to the father, who, returning from his daily toil, seeks in the bosom of his family that peace which never abides in the turmoil of the world? Surely not. The conflict with a hard and selfish world is enough for him; the duty of combating with rebellious human nature is reserved for the mother's portion. No father can, no father ought, to know how much heaviness of heart, how much weariness of spirit, the mother has endured, in order to render his children the objects of his pride as well as of his affection. To foster the germ of mental energy, to train up the early shoots of intellect, and, more than all, to watch over the pure fresh feelings of the youthful heart, and direct its innocent affections to "things above," so that it may never be induced to "place its happiness lower than itself," these are the ennobling duties of a mother.

But can these duties be performed by the woman whose mental energies were in early youth wasted upon the fascinating pages of romance, and, in later life, frittered away amid the frivolities of fashion? "Never," observed a man of acknowledged sense and penetration, "never have I known a man distinguished for wisdom and virtue who was the son of a foolish mother." This is emphatically true; and when we consider how often the temper and dispositions which we falsely ascribe to nature, may be traced to impressions received in infancy, our own experience will bear testimony to its truth. The husbandman who should scatter his seed among the dry clods of an untilled field, and then go his way rejoicing in the anticipation of a rich harvest, would be far more likely to reap tares than wheat; yet there would not be more folly in his expectations, than in those of the well-meaning, but injudicious mother, who, after having allowed the precious years of infancy to slip by, fondly hopes to gather from the youthful mind the rare fruits of virtue and religion, the principles of which no previous culture had fitted it to receive. Education must begin in infancy. Even in the nurse's arms a child learns to distinguish between pleasurable and disagreeable objects: and in the same manner, that is to say, by making appeals to the senses, may it be taught the difference between right and wrong. If it be true, as some wise men have asserted, that the first ten years give a coloring to man's whole life, then let women look well to their maternal duties, for awful is their responsibility.

Could the secret biography of heroes and sages throughout the earth be correctly ascertained, so as to trace the progress of early education, what a brilliant lustre would be shed on the maternal character? Even in the pages of general history, notwithstanding its vague and unsatisfactory sketches of the detail of life, how universally do we find the influence of women made manifest. It is recorded of the greatest orator of antiquity, that the wise and politic plans which it had cost him years to frame, could be overturned in a single day by a woman; and Tacitus himself, the most impartial of historians, has not hesitated to trace the degeneracy of morals, under the emperors, to the period when Roman matrons began to relinquish to slaves and hirelings the education of their children. If such are the desolating effects of woman's ill-directed influence, let us reflect for a moment upon the incalculable benefits which might be derived from the same powerful force, when exerted in its proper direction. Those only who have been long accustomed to look into the springs of human action, can be aware how much the general state of civilized society depends on the sentiments and habits of women; for, while many are willing to admit the powerful effect of female elegance on the manners of men, few will readily acknowledge the influence of female principles upon their character. But to those who can only be taught by examples, we can give one noble evidence of the advantages of woman's influence. Let us recall to mind the history of the man who directed the destinies of our own proud and happy country—let us look at the moral grandeur of his character—let us behold him gifted with the heart to desire, the intellect to plan, and the hand to achieve, the freedom of an infant nation—let us observe him placed at the head of that nation, idolized by its citizens, respected by its enemies, admired by the world—yet, uncontaminated by that ambition which is so generally the offspring of power, we see him quietly resigning that proudest of all titles, the ruler of a free people, and returning with his early, simple habits, to the tillage of his humble farm. Yes—let us contemplate in every point of view the majesty of this character, which stands, like the pyramids of Egypt, the unrivalled object of a world's admiration, and then let us recollect with noble pride, that the character of our illustrious Washington was formed by his mother.

In a country like ours, where wealth is continually fluctuating, where the fortune which a father bequeaths to his son to-day may be totally consumed by some sudden revolution in commerce to-morrow, the only alienable property which can be bestowed upon our children, is an unblemished name and a good education. Under such a government as ours, the latter is indispensable. Ours has been called a nation of kings; and when we reflect on the incalculable mischief which is daily effected, in less happy countries, by unenlightened rulers and an ignorant populace, we may form some idea of the evils which would result from an uninformed and uneducated sovereign people. The little boy who climbs his father's knee, and hears his infantile prattle into his delighted ear, may be called, at some future period, to direct the destinies of a large portion of our fellow-countrymen. The path to distinction is open to all, however lowly their station; for the aristocracy of talent is the only aristocracy which Americans acknowledge; and this we cannot reject, since it bears heaven's own signet on its patent of nobility. Is it not absolutely essential, then, that the heart and mind of every child in the community should be objects of earnest solicitude to every patriotic bosom? "The old systems of education are good for nothing," said the first consul of France to Madame Campan, when he visited the school under her direction. "What is yet requisite, in order that young persons may be well educated in France?" continued he. "Mothers," was the emphatic reply. "True, madam," answered Napoleon; "let Frenchmen, therefore, acknowledge their obligation to you, as having been the first to educate mothers for their children." Napoleon well knew that the only materials out of which a mighty nation could be formed, were rational, enlightened, educated men; and the importance of female influence, in early life, could not possibly escape the penetration of such an adept in human nature.

Let me not be misunderstood when I thus earnestly insist upon the necessity of female education. I do not mean that our daughters should be rendered capable of becoming teachers of classical literature, or professors of the sciences; but I would have them intimately acquainted with all useful branches of human knowledge. I would have them sufficiently versed in the learning of the ancients to be able to lay the foundation of a classical education in their sons; I would have them so well skilled in those elegant arts which form the embellishments of life, that they may be able to improve to the utmost the developing tastes of their daughters; and, above all, I would have them deeply and thoroughly imbued with the knowledge of the scriptures—the wisdom which cometh from above—the pure and holy and liberal principles of that religion, whose founder was the Redeemer of a world.

The duty of a mother is indeed an arduous one; but its very difficulty renders it incapable of being transferred to other hands. To struggle with the untamed passions of human nature—those passions whose early development affords the most convincing proof that the heart of the natural man is "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked"—to arouse the spirit of useful inquiry in the infant mind—to direct that inquiry to subjects which may purify the heart and elevate the intellect—to impart the first notions of a deity, and afterwards to improve those vague ideas into a love and reverence for the bountiful Creator and ruler of the universe—these are tasks of which no father, however affectionate, is capable. They require woman's opportunities, woman's tact, woman's delicacy; and, may I not add, the peculiar devotedness of woman's affection?

"There is none,
In all this cold and hollow world, no sound

Of deep, strong, deathless love, like that within
A mother's heart. There's too much pride, wherewith
To his fair son the father's eye doth turn,
Watching his growth. Aye, on the boy he looks,
The bright glad creature springing in his path,
But as the heir of his great name—the young
And stately tree; whose rising strength ere long
Shall bear his trophies well—and this is love!
This is man's love!—what marvel?—you ne'er made
Your breast the pillow of his infancy,
While to the fulness of your heart's glad heavings
His fair cheek rose and fell; and his bright hair
Waved softly to your breath!—you ne'er kept watch
Beside him, till the last pale star had set,
And morn, all dawning, as in triumph, broke
On your dim weary eye;—not yours the face
That, early faded through fond care of him,
Hung o'er his sleep, and, duly as heaven's light,
Was there to greet his wakening!—you ne'er smoothed
His couch, ne'er sung him to his rosy rest,
Caught his least whisper, when his voice from yours
Had learned soft utterance; pressed your lip to his,
When fever parched it; hushed his wayward cries
With patient, vigilant, never-weary love!
No, these are woman's tasks!"

But these are not all—were a mother's cares confined to the mere physical welfare of her sons, too often, in later life, when she saw the objects of her solicitude swallowed up in the ever-yawning vortex of vice, would she be compelled to exclaim, with all the bitterness of disappointment,

"My boys! my boys!
Hath vain affection borne with all for this?
Why were ye given me!"

It is not so—her duties are of a higher order. Beautiful as is the picture of woman's tenderness which I have just presented to you, it was far exceeded in moral beauty by the exquisite description of an enlightened and pious mother, which not long since was uttered within these very walls,† by lips that seemed touched with "a live coal from the altar." If it be true that the noblest being in the scale of creation is he who has the greatest number of duties to perform, then well may woman rejoice in the dignity of her station; but let her joy be mingled with "fear and trembling," and let her so perform her allotted task, that in the day when all must be summoned before the bar of God, she may be able to say, in the emphatic words of scripture, "Behold, here am I, Lord, with the children which thou hast given me."

If such are the arduous duties of a mother, what should be the measure of gratitude which she has a right to claim from her children? It is a debt like that we owe to heaven—the day of our death finds it yet uncanceled.

To you, my young friends, I would address myself in the language of deep and earnest interest. You are now at that delightful period of life, which is like spring among the seasons, redolent of beauty and freshness, and giving fair promise of the rich fruits of maturer years. Take heed the young blossoms be not blighted. Call to mind the countless advantages which have been bestowed on you—reflect upon the anxious solicitude of the fathers who wait to see the objects of their pride, as well as the sources of their happiness—remember the cares, the exertions, the almost heart-breaking anxiety of the mothers who have guided your infant feet to the threshold of the temple of knowledge, and then press forward "in the race set before you." You are entering upon a noble career. The pure, and elevated, and holy duties, which are peculiarly a woman's, will soon claim your undivided attention. Let me pray you, therefore, so to discipline your hearts, so to cultivate your minds, so to purify your spirits, now, during the unbroken leisure of youth, that the hour of trial may find you "with your lamps trimmed and burning." You have begun well—go on, then, in the same course, and remember that "of those to whom much is given, much will be required;" and that genius and knowledge, while they lay claim to the highest honors which man can bestow, also bear with them the highest responsibilities both to God and man. Science is now opening to you her richest stores of honor and usefulness; and the prayers of parents and friends are following you, when you are utterly unconscious of them. Pause, then—in the cool freshness of the morning of life, before you wax faint in the noon-day heats—pause and form for yourselves the noble resolutions which should direct your future life. Look back through the shadowy vista of past years, and behold what are the foundations of the most lasting honors of men. Look forward, with the eye of faith, to the glories of the promised land; and while you weigh well the different results of moral conduct, take heed that ye "keep your hearts with all diligence, for out of them are the issues of life." Form your taste on the classics, your judgment on the sciences, and your principles on the book of all truth. Let the dawn of your being be hallowed by that pure devotion, which is ever an "offering of a sweet smelling savor" to the bounteous giver of all good. Let the first fruits of your intellect be laid before the altar of Him who breathed into your nostrils the breath of life, and with that breath a portion of his exalted spirit; and while your life furnishes the most striking illustration of the benefits of education, let it be your care so to persevere unto the end that it may be said of each, in her own peculiar sphere, "Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Roxobel. By Mrs. Sherwood, author of the "Lady of the Manor," "Little Henry and his Bear," &c. &c. Three vols. 18mo. New-York: J. & J. Harper. 1831.

Mrs. SHERWOOD's reputation as an agreeable and instructive writer is established. She has done much for youth, and the present volumes will add to the obligations they owe her. They are written with plainness and yet elegance, and are pervaded by a cast of piety, which must be grateful to the pure young mind, and which renders it exactly the kind of book which parents love to behold in the hands of their children. They show what ought to be the conduct of a christian in the situations of brother, husband, father, servant, and master, and also discover several admirable displays of female character. It is, indeed, a book for a lady especially, although it would also contribute to the amusement and instruction of many of the other sex. We make one extract:

* Mrs. Hemans. † This address was read in St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn.

"The day after my visit to the hall was Sunday; and Mrs. Strickland's pew being very small, the ladies of the hall did me the honor to invite me into that belonging to them; a compliment which I valued the more, as it was an acknowledgment of their good opinion of the little man in the presence of the whole parish. There, being enshrined among crimson cushions and quarto prayer-books, and not choosing to mount upon a hassock (for I am rather particular in matters of decorum,) I saw no one during the service but the three elder ladies, and the blooming Lucy. However, I had the pleasure of hearing an excellent sermon from Dr. Beauchamp, who, I was informed, had returned to the parsonage the evening before, with his lady and the children.

"As we made our entries and our exits by a side-door which led from the family-pew, through a little shrubbery, into the hall gardens, I was spared all greetings in the porch, which pleased me well, as I have a particular dislike to that gossiping which too frequently takes place in going in and out of a village church. In consequence of this uninterrupted transition from devotion to retirement, I was enabled to retain that sweet frame of mind into which the service had tended to place me, till I reached the privacy of my own apartments.

"When Mrs. Strickland brought up my first dish, which she makes a point of doing every day, she took occasion to felicitate me on the compliment which the ladies had paid me, informing me that I was the first stranger who had ever been invited to the family-pew, and hinting that I owed this preferment to a word spoken in Mrs. Judy's ears by Mr. Barnaby Sample.

"So," thought I, 'there have been manoeuvres, and counter-manouvres, for ought I know, respecting the pew the little man was to sit in at church; and my friends have carried the day, and are triumphant.'

"In the evening I again went to church, and heard another sermon; but I found only Miss Lucy and her maid in the pew. After service, the little lady wished me to accompany her in a walk to the parsonage, having received permission to spend the evening there: but I thought proper to decline this tempting offer, as I had not yet received a call from Dr. Beauchamp.

"After drinking tea, I set out about six o'clock to take a walk in the park.

"Above all things, I love a solitary hour spent in some quiet place on a Sunday evening; and if to quiet I can add the epithet beautiful, so much the better. I accordingly issued from my lodging, and made my way in a straight line towards the higher regions of the park. Crossing a velvet lawn, I entered a woody region, having Torville on my left-hand, and the parsonage on my right, and began to ascend beneath the shade of a winding walk entirely sheltered by tufted trees; a cool and fragrant region—a place for the sound of rushing waters and rustling leaves. Passing on, yet continually ascending, I came out on a wide glade entirely encircled with woods, in the centre of which many deer were assembled in groups; and at the farther end of the lawn, under two aged yew-trees, was an old-fashioned wooden rotunda, opening upon a deep dingle to the left. These ancient yew-trees, extending their arms as if to embrace each other, reminded me of the story of Baucis and Philemon, as given by Dryden. They seemed so old that they appeared to have belonged to ages long forgotten. Amid the higher regions of the woods which encompassed this glade, were the nests of many rooks, who at this calm period of the evening were all in motion in their aerial city, setting things in order, as it were, against the hour of rest. I proceeded onward, musing on many matters, till I had come up close to the yew-trees, and to the wooden rotunda between their huge trunks; and then making my way around it, I suddenly found myself brought in the face of a large party within. I started back; but, before I could make my escape, I was hailed by an infant voice, and seized by an infant hand, and was thus arrested in my intended retreat. It was Lucy who had taken possession of me.

"O, Mr. Airy, I am so glad to see you," said this affectionate little creature; 'we were just talking of you, and wishing for you here. Papa, (I always call Dr. Beauchamp papa,) and Mrs. Beauchamp, and Eugenius, and Sophia, and Theodore, were all vexed because I had not brought you. But come in, and you shall see them all together.'

"I now found myself seized by the friendly hand of the doctor himself, drawn into the alcove, and addressed on all sides with such hearty welcomes, that I felt myself to be among old acquaintances almost before I had chosen a seat.

"Well, this is kind, most kind," said the doctor, his eyes glistening with christian charity, and the good man never doubting but that I had come, not by accident, but on purpose to join the party. 'This is setting aside ceremony: I meant to have called on you tomorrow; but Sunday is better than Monday for our meeting. The better the day the better the deed; and what deed so good as one which evinces our love for our fellow-creatures? Right welcome are you, dear sir, to Roxobel. We are all prepared to love you.' And then he called on the boys to offer me their hands, and drew forward his little Sophia for the same purpose.

"A lovely creature indeed she is, with those soft sleepy eyes which are always so beautiful; and more especially so, when they are capable of being lighted up, and exchanging their dove-like simplicity for a more animated expression. I soon perceived that this pretty little creature was highly prepossessed in my favor; for, although she did not venture to address a single word to me, yet she looked half-shyly, half-kindly upon me, and when brought near by her father, she stood still by my side, not seeming to desire to remove.

"Mrs. Goodwill had well described Mrs. Beauchamp; one glance assured me that she is the kindest and the best of creatures; but there is more deep study required to penetrate the characters of the two boys, who, though entirely different, are in their way each uncommonly handsome: Eugenius, whom I looked upon as the future possessor of the wide domains around me, being as elegant a boy as I ever beheld; and Theodore, on the other hand, as remarkable for the vivacity and fire of his dark eyes, and for the spirited turn of his well-defined features. On the whole, therefore, I thought that I never had seen four more promising young people than those before me; and I naturally loved them the more for the friendliness of their manner towards myself, and for the unequivocal evidences of good-will which they exhibited.

"It is a law of our nature, from which the worst of men never wholly depart, to love those who love us. Hence it is found, that those teachers of religion who chiefly expatiate on the goodness and mercy of God, as displayed in his having given his only-begotten Son for our lost race, are always more successful in exciting our better feelings than those who take delight in exhibiting the terrors of divine justice. Nevertheless, a perfect display of the christian religion consists in a correct statement of all the divine attributes, and in an accurate display of the wonderful manner in which they all harmonize in the work of salvation through Christ our Saviour. But whither am I wandering? and how have I happened to glide into matters apparently so remote from my subject?

"Well, sir," said the good doctor, after a short silence, 'and how do you like my children? I see that you have been physiognomizing them. They are all very different. Nevertheless, and he smiled, and paused, 'I hardly know which is the worst among them. A fine legacy, indeed, did dear Emily Lovel leave me when she passed from this life to a better, in leaving me her two good-for-nothing children; and she expected me to take these young cuckoos into my nest, yea, into my very heart. How unreasonable some people are!' And the good man's eyes filled with tears, while he held a hand to the orphan brother and sister, who both rushed to his bosom, the little girl in the ardor of her embraces displacing his bushy gray wig. 'There now,' he added, looking at me while he arranged his wig, 'see what liberties these creatures take. But come, come, all to your places. Who can remind me of what we came here for?

"To sing some hymns, papa," replied the little modest Sophia; 'and for you to explain to us a chapter in the Bible.'

"Well," said the doctor, 'and we will have our hymns, though Mr. Airy is come. Who will lead the band?

Each person then produced a little edition of Dr. Watts's Hymns, and there was a sort of pause till I volunteered my services.

"Music has been my delight from infancy, and nature has endowed me with some voice and ear. I sung a well-known simple old psalm-tune; and the young people followed me up with spirit. And when we had concluded, the doctor said, 'Delightful! Most delightful, Mr. Airy! You shall teach my children to sing.'

"And to play, too," I replied. 'Will you be my scholars, my little ladies?' I added. 'Make the little man useful, if you can, Dr. Beauchamp. Shall I be your music and drawing-master, my little people? I shall require a high salary though, in return for my labors; namely, your good-will—the friendship of all here present.'

"I had thought some time of making this proposal with regard to Miss Lucy, as I had espied a neglected harpsichord in the library at the hall; and I was glad to find that my proposition was most joyfully received by all parties.

"Other subjects suitable to the day were then introduced. A chapter was read by the young people, and some remarks were made upon it by Dr. Beauchamp; after which we looked about on the lovely prospect which was extended before us.

"I cannot wonder at the ancient heathens," remarked Dr. Beauchamp, 'for converting their woods and groves into the temples of their idols. The unconverted man, indeed, pollutes every thing with which he meddles. Nevertheless, the first idea was noble and natural; for where do we feel disposed to indulge such holy aspirations, as amid scenes where the loveliest objects of creation are spread around us? And this, sir, is my reason, for bringing my children out on a Sunday evening, after the public services of the day, to study the word and to sing the praises of God among his exquisite works.'

"At this moment two crows alighted on the grass, at no great distance from our alcove. One of these most amiable specimens of the feathered race was grasping in his beak a portion of a dead horse, or some other such delicate morsel, and seemed to consider himself in a sort of dilemma; not daring to lose the savory bit lest his companion should snap it up, and yet not knowing how to transfer it to his maw without first dropping it on the earth. No doubt he had changed his place, and had flown from tree to tree, till he was wearied with his various manoeuvres, and despaired of thus delivering himself from his fellow-bird, who had made up his mind, with true crow-like impudence, to have his share in the dainty. And now, both parties having alighted on the grass, we were not a little amused with their various gestures, their struttings and flutterings to and fro, and their manifold hoppings and sidings. The careless air of the empty-mouthed bird on the one hand, and the looks of vigilance and defiance which were cast upon him by the bearer of the prey on the other, together with the various cawings and croakings which proceeded from their throats, were likewise extremely entertaining. At length, on the boys bursting into a loud laugh, the birds took wing, and we saw them no more.

"As soon as they were out of sight, Eugenius remarked, that he had often envied the vizzier in the Arabian Tales, who understood the language of birds and beasts; and that he had no doubt that those crows understood each other's cawings, as well as he could understand the discourses of his companions.

"That vizzier," I replied gravely, 'was certainly to be envied; but if he understood the language of birds and beasts only, he was but partly instructed, Master Lovel: for I once knew a person who, in some measure, understood not merely the language of birds and beasts, but also that of stars and planets, brooks, and rivers, trees and herbs, rocks and hills, and of almost every production of nature.'

The reader will perceive, from the easy simplicity of this kind of writing, how properly adapted it is to communicate moral and religious impressions to the ingenious mind in the most favorable light. For this purpose these volumes were composed, and the author has conducted her undertaking with great skill and success.

American Turf Register and Sporting Magazine. Vol. III. No. III. 8vo. p. 151. Baltimore: J. S. Skinner. 1831.

This seems to be a well-conducted work, peculiarly interesting to sportsmen, but at the same time containing some very good writing for the general reader. It is adorned with a fine engraving, by Durand, of the "Lady Lightfoot." We extract a pretty description of a dog, which may not be considered inappropriate when we remember how many great poets have been occupied on the same theme.

"The beautiful Flora is no more. The grave has closed over her. She lives now but in the memories of men, and in the heart that will long cherish the remembrance of her excellent qualities and of her pure devotion. The hand that now traces this sketch is often called in requisition to brush away the tears that will irresistibly flow at the recollection of her living beauty, her generous attachment, and the distressing manner of her death. It is a painful occupation, because that it is filled with the most melancholy associations; but I cannot deny myself the gratification of spreading on the pages of the 'Sporting Magazine' a simple record of the character and life of a most valuable dog—a sincere and devoted friend. She was, indeed, a beautiful creature—full of vivacity and of great worth.

"The sire of this fine animal was a very valuable pointer dog, of the full blood, belonging to Dr. Coleman, of the United States' army; and she descended, by the maternal line, from the excellent stock of dogs belonging to Major Andrews, of Washington city. The form and color of Lady Flora was very uncommon in the pointer dogs of this country. She was about as high as the generality of pointers; but very delicately made, and approaching, in shape and agility, in grace and flexibility of movement, nearer to the greyhound, than any dog I have ever seen. She was very fleet, and possessed uncommon activity. Her head was beautifully turned, and 'hung with ears, like the Sioux hounds, to sweep away the morning dew.' Her nose was delicate and pointed, and endowed with a sensibility and power that I have never seen equalled. In color she was brilliant and very beautiful. Her bearing, Argent à quarter gules. On a field of pure white, were several quarterings, or large spots of deep orange, spread at intervals over her body, and the greater part of her head, which gave her an air of brilliancy and variety.

"In the field I have seen the performances of many of the best dogs; but I have never seen one that resembled the Lady Flora. I have seen much to please and interest the mind, and to excite the agreeable feelings of the heart; but I have never yet witnessed a spectacle so exciting, so cheering, so thrilling, as the evolutions of Lady Flora in an open field. She was all motion—all vivacity—all life. As swift as thought; her light and airy tread did not seem to break the dew-drop on the grass. And when, after coursing the field with an indescribable velocity, she stopped, and showed the certain index of her game, such was the tremulous emotion that agitated her whole frame, that the spectator, then contemplating her, must have been cold indeed, who did not feel his heart's blood accelerated, as it gushed from its source and receded again—having lighted all his feelings into a glow of admiration.

"But the Lady Flora is gone. Her sports and her glory are now at an end, and will be known no more for ever. The thoughts of her death are full of anguish. I had gone to the country, and had designed to amuse myself a little in the field. I carried with me my gun and dog. The first day that I took the field was fatal to my dog, and the most melancholy to me that I have known for years. Lady Flora had made a dead point. I drew near her, and discovered a large flock of turkeys. Oh! the very name produces a revulsion in my feelings that makes my heart sick. I saw the game—they were moving, and amidst a very thick growth of underwood. I hastened round on one side, to take them as they rose. My dog moved also, but without my knowledge, and in an opposite direction. I fired, and to my utter astonishment, and consternation, I heard my dog scream. I dropped my gun, and hastened to the spot; but I was too late—she was dead. Two shot had passed through her heart. Thus she fell, and died in the very spring-time of life, aged but eighteen months. I buried her alone on the mountain side, and she sleeps now in peace where she fell; and there are of us who may envy her in this, that she died in the performance of her duty."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. PAT, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1831.

Editor's study.—A young saucy girl of our acquaintance, who has a great deal of wit, and enough good nature to manage it, but who thinks no more of an editor than of a mere ordinary human being, told us the other day, that a late number of the Mirror was quite masculine. We always feel inclined to listen to hints; they are sometimes full of wisdom. We have known one flung out, half in jest, contain more matter than an octavo. A lady too has a keener eye, and a more ready and instinctive good sense than your profound heavy-headed statesmen and scholars. Their sphere of life is by no means so enlarged as ours, but within its limits they are infinitely our superior. We are never tired of admiring their keen-sightedness, and faculty of learning rapidly, and their intuitive style of viewing a subject. There will sometimes come a stroke of innocent satire from a pair of pretty lips, that, if delivered on the floor of congress, would flash through the country "like a sheet of lightning;" and many an exquisitely-turned sentence we have heard from one who never dreamed she was carelessly casting from her ideas that the stolid and laborious author would have seized on as gems. We were therefore not a little struck with our fair friend's running criticism, and had serious thoughts of introducing several wood-cuts of bonnets and ruffles, and a trifle or two in the way of a flounce or a tippet, instead of old Dutch houses, and other specimens of ancient architecture, when a person whose opinion, though none of the literati, has much weight with us, complained that the same number designated by our fair critic, was not solid enough. The coincidence awakened in our mind a train of thought. It was in the evening, and the twilight came over our proof-sheet, and the printer's devil had borne off the last paragraph of copy, except this that we are now writing, which we in truth consider as little better than a mere reverie, and a sort of confidential confab over the embers of the fire; and we sat and meditated, and heard the draught humming in the red grate, and let our thought flow exactly where it pleased, winding in among all the little events of the past, and the shadowy conjectures of the future, just as a stream steals through the woods, sometimes lapsing along sleepily, then hurrying onward, compressed in its deepened channel, then broken up into little cascades and eddies, while plashing and tumbling among a bed of stones. It might amuse thee, reader, whoever thou art, who perusest these insignificant scribbles of one who may be to thee ever a perfect stranger—it might amuse thee to look into the mind of an editor as he sits thus in solitary and silent rumination beside his evening fire. We are so entirely the creatures of circumstances, that we—our very souls, are in a manner formed by our daily situation and employments. All are so. The blacksmith doubtless looks upon the world with interest only as it affects iron and his anvil, and will be wondering if there is not metal beneath a hill, which brings tears of rapture into the eyes of a painter from its picturesqueness. It is not only in a single instance that our minds are filled with images of a certain cast from our ordinary occupations, but it is ever thus, and it requires a great effort to avoid betraying this difference which exists between us and those around us, for no one is such a bore, to use a common, but expressive phrase, as he whose character as a man is lost in that of his profession.

There we sat, however, pondering over our cares and prospects, thinking of the diversity of human nature, which renders it impossible to please every body, and regretting the unreasonableness of many, who will never suffer themselves to be pleased at all.

The truth is, editing a paper is a trade which requires as severe an apprenticeship as any other, and, (we speak disinterestedly) if the public wish a decent periodical, they must come forward and support it liberally. We fall into dreams sometimes, even about this hebdomadal. If we could but make people see as we see; if we could but take all the good folks in the United States, individually and familiarly by the button here, by our cheerful fire, and explain to them what an advantage it would be to them—to literature, to the world at large, to say nothing of ourself, would they but put down their names on our subscription-list, and let them be there, we do believe we might produce a tolerably well filled sheet. We do not wish to be impertinent, indeed, every body who knows us at all, knows that would be impossible; but there is a trick, which, since we are on this subject, some otherwise very sensible and respectable personages have practised upon proprietors of gazettes time out of mind—it is—if we must speak out—a capricious fashion of discontinuing—not to subscribe to any other, not indeed from any dissatisfaction with the present, but simply, we are sure, because they do not understand what an inconvenience it is to us editors. Has any one of our readers the slightest idea of stopping? Don't, we entreat; we make it personal—we beg you "would not mention it." It's a damper to all literary ambition to see a man come in and stop his subscription. We fling down our pen—we abuse the public privately—we vow they are not a literary people. It is uncommonly provoking; we have often thought of hinting this in a sly way. A periodical publication must be based on a concentrated and uniform patronage. It must understand exactly what it has to depend upon. They who wish to see a good paper must contribute their mite towards it promptly. No body must stop. A decent man ought to be ashamed of it. We have stanch substantial families who have never finched from our side for nine years. Some have had houses burnt down, ships sunk, banks broken, have speculated in cotton, and been cast in law-suits. Never did they come with a long face, and a doleful story of hard times, and wound up a pitiful tale of lamentation with "You need not send your paper any more to me." We hold them up for models. Those men do more for literature than if they spent whole months in racking their brains for rhymes and round periods. See what a rich article we copy from Blackwood's Magazine in the present number. We should like to present our friends with such an one original every week, but then they must stand by us. They must not come with any of their nonsense about "take more papers now than I can read," and the like.

In Great Britain they pay well for those things. The public are old hands at the business; they know there is intense labor as well as talent in such a production, and they understand how the conductor is dependent upon their steady support for the character of his journal. We are told that the British are uniformly and certainly firm and faithful in their adherence to an established periodical. They perceive that it cannot exist in any other way. London editors drive carriages! we are fond of a turn in an autumn morning,—but we must not press the conclusion, and so, if you please, we will change the subject.

No class have a more direct claim upon our sympathies than the deaf and dumb. The institution for their instruction is able to receive but a small proportion of them, and there is a collateral association for their relief, very praiseworthy in its nature, to which we would now solicit attention. Its origin is curious, and proves how much the poorest members of society may accomplish if animated with the true spirit of benevolence. An aged African woman, well known in this city for her integrity and industry, accidentally came in contact with a deaf mute, whom she found perfectly friendless, and without means of support. After having, as far as her limited stock permitted, administered to his wants, she visited a number of families and ladies for the purpose of raising a collection in his behalf. Several not only generously entered into the views of this humble but poor disciple of the true religion, but so far enlarged upon them as to organize an institution for the relief of deaf and dumb children, who were excluded by poverty, or other causes, from participating in the advantages of the other. It is termed the "Female Association for the relief of the Indigent Deaf and Dumb," and consists, we believe, entirely of ladies of this city. It has been organized almost seven years. An annual exhibition will take place next Monday, at the city-hotel, Mr. Jennings having, with his usual kindness, afforded them the gratuitous use of one of his apartments. Several discourses will be delivered. Among the gentlemen who will probably address the society, will be M. Vayesse, recently from the Deaf and Dumb Institution, at Paris, the Rev. Mr. Haight, and Mr. Buchanan, the British consul. The object of the society is so clearly philanthropic and noble, that of alleviating the misfortune of so helpless and unhappy a class of our fellow beings, that we may safely anticipate the spacious concert room on Monday evening will be filled with the most respectable of our fellow citizens. We subjoin an appropriate extract, by Mr. James Mack upon the subject.

THE MINSTREL BOY.

And am I doomed to be denied forever
The blessings that to all around are given?
And shall those links be reunited never,
That bound me to mankind till they were given
In childhood's day? Alas! how soon to sever
From social intercourse, the doom of heaven
Was pass'd upon me! And the hope, how vain,
That the decree may be recall'd again.
Amid a throng in deep attention bound,
To catch the accents that from others fall,
The flow of eloquence, the heavenly sound
Breathed from the soul of melody, while all
Instructed or delighted list around,
Vacant unconsciousness must me enthrall!
I can but watch each animated face,
And there attempt th'inspiring theme to trace.
Unheard, unheeded, are the lips by me,
To others that unfold some heaven-born art,
And melody—oh, dearest melody!
How had thine accents, thrilling to my heart,
Awaken'd all its strings to sympathy,
Bidding the spirit at thy magic start!
How had my heart responsive to the strain,
Throb'd in love's wild delight or soothing pain.
In vain—alas, in vain! thy numbers roll—
Within my heart no echo they inspire;
Though form'd by nature in thy sweet control,
To melt with tenderness, or glow with fire,
Misfortune closed the portals of the soul;
And till an Orpheus rise to sweep the lyre,
That can to animation kindle stone,
To me thy thrilling power must be unknown.

And none are more exquisitely awake
To nature's loveliness than those who feel
The inspiration of the muse—who take
From her the glowing thoughts that as they steal
Around the soul entranced, a goddess make
Of nature to whose shrine of beauty kneel
The kind enthusiasts morning all
Within her we may dread or lovely call.
The terrible in nature is to them
The beautiful, and they can with delight
Behold the tempest, and its wrath condemn,
Stationed upon some rock whose quivering height
Is by the spirit swept, whose diadem
In burning terror wreathes the brow of night,
While the rude winds their cave of slumber rend,
And to the loud-voiced thunders answer send.
Yet nature, not alone when stern and wild
Canst thou the homage of the bard awaken,
Still art thou worshipped by the muse's child,
When thou thy throne of terrors hast forsaken;
With darkness when thy brow is undefiled,
When scarce a leaflet of thy robe is shaken
By zephyrs that soft music murmuring,
Around thee wave their aromatic wing.
When first the queen of night in beauty rides,
That with the glory of Apollo vies,
One star alone through heaven's azure glides,
That when ten thousand thousand robe the skies,
Pre-eminent in beauty still presides;
To her the lover's and the poet's eyes
Are ever fondly turned to hail the power
That smiles such loveliness upon the hour.
How often have I watch'd the star of even,
When eyes of heaven's own ethereal blue,
Have follow'd mine to gaze upon the heaven,
Where they as on a mirror's face might view
The bright and beautiful reflection given,
Of their own starry light and azure hue!
But she beholding night's resplendent throne,
Of nature's beauty thought, and not her own.
I thought of both—if earth appear so fair,
How glorious the world beyond the skies;
And if the form that heaven-born spirits wear,
This earthly shrine so fascinate our eyes,
To kneel in worship we can scarce forbear,
And e'en to gaze on thine is paradise,
O what are those who free from earthly stain,
Above yon azure realms in bloom immortal reign?

Statue of Washington.—A project is on foot, to which we lend our cordial concurrence, of employing the inimitable sculptor of the Chanting Cherubs, at present exhibiting in this city, upon a statue of Washington. The artist is highly gifted, and of great application, and is also an American. It is proposed to raise the necessary sum of five thousand dollars by subscription. The proceeds of the exhibition of the above-mentioned exquisite groupe will also hereafter be devoted to that purpose. No one should neglect the opportunity of enjoying so much gratification in so good a cause.

SECOND VERSE.

Be such, and only such, my friends,
Once mine, and mine for ever;
And here's a hand to clasp in theirs
That shall desert them never.
And thou be such, my gentle love,
Time, chance, the world defying;
And take, 'tis all I have, a heart
That changes but in dying.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

ANNA.

Why thus, with tearful eyes repining,
Lingering sad along the grove,
Each thought of joy and mirth resigning,
Wouldst thou ask why thus I rove?
Far, far, my friend, from scenes of folly,
Where pleasure yields her rosy bowl,
I soothe a tender melancholy,
That pains to transport all the soul.

Alas! 'tis love's fond, keenest anguish,
That draws my lonely footsteps here,
That bids me, silent, muse and languish,
That breathes each sigh, and starts each tear.
Fair, as the dew-gemm'd rose of morning,
Anna I loved, nor loved in vain;
The trivial arts of prudery scorning,
She saw my love—and loved again.

While her regard, my proudest treasure,
Bade jarring doubts and passions cease;
While fairy hopes of future pleasure
Lull'd all my soul to gentle peace;
E'en then his darts was death preparing;
Alas! from him what power can save?
Nor youth, nor love, nor beauty sparing,
I mourn above my Anna's grave!

Oh! in that sacred hour of musing,
When all is hushed in midnight sleep,

My busy thoughts, all rest refusing,
I wander here to muse and weep.
To Anna oft, with fond devotion,
I breathe the vow of love sincere,
While she to fancy's wand'ring notion,
Still seems to pity and to hear.

Oh! Anna, throned in yonder heaven!
For whom my grief can never die!
To whom, perchance, the task is given
To watch me with a guardian eye!
Oh! hear my vow, that never, never,
My breast shall know another love,
But dove-like mourn thy absence ever,
My Anna, till we meet above.

REWARD OF VIRTUE.—This old-fashioned phrase was curiously verified on a late occasion, in the person of Dr. — of this city, whom every body knows as one of the most benevolent and excellent men in the world. This estimable physician has been, for many years, in the habit of performing his pedestrian peregrinations to his patients, at all hours of the day and night, without any fear of molestation. It will be remembered, that at a certain recent period, our citizens were thrown into a pretty general panic by the frequent proofs of the existence of a gang of marauders, who resorted to every expedient for purposes of plunder. The doctor once started off in the middle of the night from the house of a sick man towards his own. In a lonely part of the street he was passed by a ruffian-looking fellow, who, after eying him narrowly, returned and asked—

"How late is it, sir?"

"Just struck two," said the doctor.

"But I want to know exactly," said the man—"I want to know to a minute. So out with your watch."

Of course he refused, and the man, looking closely under his hat, made an exclamation of surprise, and bade him good-night.

Several months after this occurrence, a prisoner in bridewell was heard to confess to his companion that he was the aggressor who attacked Doctor — with the intention of plundering him.

"That was wrong," said the other—"Doctor — is a good man."

"I know it," replied the ruffian, "but when I accosted him I did not know him; as soon as I perceived who it was, I concluded to let him go, and accordingly left him, and made signs to my accomplices, who suffered him to pass free. If it had been any other man, he would have gone home that night without a watch, that's certain."

Such an enviable security against the attacks of these "minions of the moon," is certainly a very great additional inducement to virtue, and, we trust, all night-walkers will profit by the example.

LABOR.—There is a kind of man who thinks nothing is labor but that which is accomplished by bodily strength. To satisfy such a one that you are industrious, you must blast rocks, or dig the earth. I am convinced that corporeal toil is by far most favorable to happiness, because, however tiresome, its intervals are delicious. The most violent labor possible is that which requires an exertion of the mind at stated intervals. For example, the necessity of writing an essay by a given time; the necessity of it—dreadful thought! These heavy penalties entailed upon us by the nature of civilized society, cause much suffering in the mass. I have known an actress compelled to go through a smiling and light-hearted character, when her thoughts were actually engaged by domestic scenes of woe and death! That is what I call labor.

ENGLISH LITERATURE.

AN HOUR'S TALK ABOUT POETRY.

[Concluded.]

Just take a moment's glance at the period that elapsed between Pope and Cowper, and, mercy on us! what a period of drought and sterility! Versification flourished, and all else decayed. Among the crowd, of fancy there was a little, of feeling less, and of imagination none, while intellect was so feeble it could hardly crawl. Among the honored, Collins was a poet, and his name was Fine Ear. But feeling his own weakness, he took refuge in abstractions, and hid himself in the shadowy twilight which they afford. Filmy visions floated before his half-shut eye, and they were beautiful; but unsubstantial all, and owning remotest kindred with the flesh-and-blood creatures of this our living world. He loved to dream of superstitions and enchantments; but he was not a sublime seer. His ode—as it is absurdly called—on the superstitions of the Highlands, is uninspired by the fears that beset fancy, and but an elegant and eloquent narration of sights and sounds, that, had they been seen and heard aright, would have wailed in rueful and ghastly strains, curdling the blood. "The Passions" is an unimpassioned series of portraits, from which Reynolds or Lawrence might have painted graceful pictures. But he calls no spirits from the "vasty deep." Now passions are spirits, and the human heart is "a vasty deep;" and therefore Collins's "Ode on the Passions" is but a poor performance. But he had a soul finely strung to the obscure pathetic,—and it often yields melancholy murmurs by moonlight "when the high woods are still," which, spell-like, sadden the imagination, making the night pensive. Gray, again, had no pathos. His famous Elegy pleases and elevates the mind, for the feelings and thoughts flow naturally, and the language and versification are elegant in the extreme—scholar-like without being pedantic—in the best sense classical, and free from flaws, like "a gem of purest ray serene." Then, the subject is of universal and eternal interest. It is, therefore, an immortal elegy, and "Its curfew tolls" will, we fear, continue to be the pest and plague of all rising generations, till the schoolmaster now abroad be dead. As to his odes—with fine passages—they are but cold and clumsy concerns. Their day is over. We, ourselves, love to read them for the sake of the mere sound, which is rushing and river-like, and sometimes we think we hear the sea, sullen afar off, or near at hand, in a high tide, and dashing rejoicing among the rocks. He was a skilful artist—but no Pindar—though he describes grandly the Theban eagle. Mason has more poetry in him than Gray, but he threw it away on unhappy, at least unfit subjects, and he always wrought after a model. All his writings, except a few beautiful lines in his English garden, which one meets with now and then in quotation, without knowing whence they come, are forgotten now by all the world, except by a few old parsons not yet died out; but his name will survive. A sad case! Tom Wharton was one of the finest fellows that ever breathed, and the gods had made him poetical, but not a poet. He loved poetry dearly, and he wrote its history well; that book being a mine. He loved nature dearly too; and some beautiful sonnets did he indite about the Isis, and the Charwell, and the rural scenery about Oxford, and Oxford's self—she who is worthy of an immortal song. In short, Collins, Gray, and Wharton were three such men as one will not often meet with on a summer's day. But had they genius sufficient to glorify an era? No—no—no.

To what era, pray, did Thomson belong, and to what era Cowper? To none. Thomson had no precursor—and till Cowper no follower. He effulged all at once sunlike—like Scotland's storm-loving, mist-enamored sun, which till you have seen it on a day of thunder, you cannot be said ever to have seen it at all. Cowper followed Thomson merely in time. We should have had the "Task" even had we never had the "Seasons." These two were "Heralds of a mighty train issuing;" add them, then, to the worthies of our own age—and they belong to it—and all the rest of the poetry of the modern world—to which add that of the ancient—if multiplied by ten in quantity—and by twenty in quality—would not so variously, so vigorously, so magnificently, so beautifully, and so truly image the form and pressure, the life and spirit of the mother of us all—nature. Are then the "Seasons" and the "Task" great poems? Yes. Why? We shall tell you in two separate articles. But we presume you do not need to be told that that poem must be great which was the first to paint the rolling mystery of the year, and to show that all its seasons were but the varied God? The idea was original and sublime; and the fulfilment thereof so complete, that some six thousand years having elapsed between the creation of the world and of that poem, some sixty thousand, we prophesy, will elapse between the appearance of that poem and the publication of another equally great, on a subject external to the mind, equally magnificent. We farther presume, that you hold sacred the "Hearth."

Now, in the "Task," the "Hearth" is the heart of the poem, just as it is of a happy house. No other poem is so full of domestic happiness—humble and high; none is so breathed over by the spirit of the christian religion.

We have not forgotten an order of poets, peculiar, we believe, to our own enlightened land—a high order of poets sprung from the lower orders of the people—and not only sprung from them, but bred as well as born in "the huts where poor men lie," and glorifying their condition by the light of song. Such glory belongs, we believe, exclusively to this country and to this age. Mr. Southey, who, in his own high genius and fame is never insensible to the virtues of his fellow-men, however humble and obscure the sphere in which they may move, has written a volume—and a most interesting one—on the poets of this class in other ages of our literature. Nor shall we presume to gainsay one of his benevolent words. But this we do say, that all the verse-writers of whom he there treats, and all the verse-writers of the same sort of whom he does not treat, that ever existed on the face of the earth, shrink up into a lean and shrivelled bundle of dry leaves or sticks, compared with these five—Burns, Hogg, Cunningham, Bloomfield, and Claire. It must be a celestial soil—the soil of this Britain—which sends up such products, and we must not complain of the clime beneath which they grow to such stately height, and bear such glorious fruitage. The spirit of domestic life must be sound and strong—the natural knowledge of good and evil must be high—the religion true—the laws just—and the government, on the whole, good, methinks, that have all conspired to educate these children of genius, whose souls nature has framed of the finer clay.

Such men seem to us more clearly and certainly men of genius, than many who, under different circumstances, may have effected higher achievements. For though they enjoyed in their condition ineffable blessings to dilate their spirits, and touch them with all tenderest thoughts, it is not easy to imagine the deadening or degrading influences to which by their condition they were inevitably exposed, and which keep down the heaven-aspiring flame of genius, or extinguish it wholly, or hold it smouldering under all sorts of rubbish. Only look at the attempts in verse of the common run of clod-hoppers. Buy a few ballads from the wall or stall, and you groan to think that you have been born, such is the mess of mire, mud, and filth which often, without the slightest intentions of brutality, those rural, city, or suburban bards of the lower orders prepare for boys, and virgins, and matrons, who all devour it greedily, without suspicion of its being a foul and feid stir-about of grossness and obscenity. Strange, as true, that even in that mural minstrelsy, occasionally occurs a phrase or line, and even stanza, sweet and simple, and to nature true; but consider them in the light of poetry read, recited, and sung by the people, and you might well be appalled and disgusted by the revelation therein made of the coarse, gross, and beastly tastes, feelings, and thoughts of the lower orders. And yet in the midst of all the popularity of such productions, the best of Burns's poems, his "Coxar's Saturday Night," and most delicate of his songs, are still more popular, and read by the same classes with a still greater eagerness of delight! Into this mystery we shall not now inquire; but we mention it now merely to show how divine a thing true genius is, which, burning within the bosoms of a few favorite sons of nature, guards them from all this pollution, lifts them up above it all, purifies their whole being, and without consuming their family affections or friendships, or making them unhappy with their lot, and disgusted with all about them, reveals to them all that is fair and bright and beautiful in feeling and in imagination, makes them very poets indeed, and should fortune favor, and chance and accident, gains for them wide over the world, living and dead, the glory of a poet's name.

From all such evil influences incident to their condition—and we are now speaking but of the evil—the five emerged; and first in beauty and in brightness—Burns. Our dearly beloved Thomas Carlyle is reported to have said at the dinner lately given to Allan Cunningham, in Dumfries, that Burns was not only one of the greatest of poets, but likewise of philosophers. We hope not. What he did may be told in one short sentence. His genius purified and ennobled in his imagination and in his heart the character and condition of the Scottish peasantry, and reflected them, ideally true to nature, in the living waters of song. That is what he did; but to do that, did not require the highest powers of the poet and the philosopher. Nay, had he marvellously possessed them, he never would have written a single line of the poetry of the late Robert Burns. Thank heaven for not having made him such a man, but merely the Ayrshire ploughman. He was called into existence for a certain work, for the fulness of time was come—but he was neither a Shakespeare, nor a Scott, nor a Goethe; and therefore he rejoiced in writing the "Saturday Night" and the "Two Dogs," and the "Holy fair," and "O' a' the Airts the Wind doth blaw," and eke the "Vision." But forbid it, all ye gracious powers! that we should quarrel with Thomas Carlyle, and that too for calling Robert Burns one of the greatest of poets and philosophers.

If he were, then so is the Ettrick Shepherd. The truth ought always to be spoken; and therefore we say that in fancy and in imagination James Hogg—in spite of his name and his teeth—is superior to Robert Burns, and why not? The forest is a better schoolroom than ever Burns studied in; and it once overflowed with poetical traditions. But comparisons are always odious; and the great glory of James is, that he is as unlike Robert as ever one poet was unlike another, as we once showed in an article many years ago, which we modestly believe exhausted the subject, and left nothing valuable to be said about the genius of either bard. So have we written of Allen Cunningham—though of him we purpose to write again—for while as a poet he is well worthy to be one of the three, he must be spoken of properly, out of poetry, as a man of great talents in literature.

The five, then, belong to this age; and that is a glory, as we said, peculiar to itself; for they alone deserve the name of poets, of all the aspirants belonging to the people—born and bred among them—and singing of their condition. No inconsiderable talent and ingenuity some others similarly circumstanced in youth or all life long have exhibited; but as to poetry, properly so called, it was not in them; they did nothing worthy of remembrance, and they are all forgotten for ever.

But there is another glory belonging to this age, and almost to this age alone of our poetry—the glory of female genius. We have heard and seen it seriously argued whether or not women are equal to men; as if there could be a moment's doubt in any mind unbesotted by sex, that they are infinitely superior; not in understanding, thank heaven, nor perhaps even in intellect, but in all other impulses of soul and sense that dignify and adorn human beings, and make them worthy of living on this delightful earth. Men for the most part are such worthless wretches, that we wonder how women condescend to allow the world to be carried on; and we attribute that phenomenon solely to the hallowed yearnings of maternal affection, which breathes as strongly in maid as in matron, and may be beautifully seen in the child fondling its doll in its blissful bosom. Philoprogenitiveness! But not to pursue that interesting speculation, suffice it for the present to say, that so far from having no souls, a whim of Mahomet's, who thought but of their bodies, women are the sole spiritual beings that walk the earth not unseen; they alone, without pursuing a complicated and scientific system of deception and hypocrisy, are privileged from on high to write poetry. We—men we mean—may assume a virtue, though we have it not, and appear to be inspired by the divine afflatus. Nay, we sometimes—often—are truly so inspired, and write like gods. A few of us—not we—are subject to fits, and in them utter oracles. But the truth is too glaring to be denied, that all male rational creatures are in the long run vile, corrupt, and polluted; and that the best man that ever died in his bed within the arms of his distracted wife, is wicked far than the worst woman that was ever iniquitously hanged for murdering what was called her poor husband, who in all cases righteously deserved his fate. Purity of mind is incompatible with manhood; but all women, till men reduce them nearly to their own level, are pure as dew-drops or moon-beams, and know not the meaning of evil. Their genius conjectures it, and in that there is no sin. But their genius loves best to image forth good, for 'tis the blessing of their lives, its power and its glory; and hence, when they write poetry, it is religion, sweet, soft, solemn, and divine.

Observe, however—to prevent all mistakes—that we speak but of British women—and of British women of the present age. Of the German fair sex we know little or nothing; but daresay that the Baroness de Motte Fouque is a worthy woman, and as rapid as the Baron. Neither make we any allusion to Madame Genlis, or other illustrious lemons of the French school. We restrict ourselves to the maids and matrons of this island, and of this age; and as it is of genius that we speak, we name the names of Joanna Baillie, Mrs. Tighe, Felicia Hemans, Lucy Eliza Landon, and the lovely Norton, while we pronounce several other sweet-sounding christian surnames in whispering under-tones of affection, almost as inaudible as the sound of the growing of grass on a dewy evening.

Corinna and Sappho must have been women of transcendent genius so to move Greece. For though the Greek character was most impressive and combustible, it was so only to the finest finger and fire. In that delightful land dunces were all dumb. Where genius alone spoke and sung poetry, how hard to excel! Corinna and Sappho did excel—the one conquering Pindar, and the other all the world but Phaon.

But our own Joanna has been visited with a still loftier inspiration. She has created tragedies which Sophocles, or Euripides, nay, even Æschylus himself would have feared in competition for the immortal garland. Plays on the passions. "How absurd!" said one philosophical writer. "This will never do!" It has done—perfectly.

What, pray, is the aim of all tragedy! The Stagyrite has told us, to purify the passions by pity and terror. They ventilate and cleanse the soul, till its atmosphere is like that of a calm, bright summer day. All plays, therefore, must be on the passions. And all that Joanna intended—and it was a great intention greatly effected—was in her series of dramas to steady her purposes by ever keeping one mighty end in view, of which the perpetual perception could not fail to make all the means harmonious, and therefore majestic. One passion was, therefore, constituted sovereign of the soul in each glorious tragedy—sovereign sometimes by divine right, sometimes an usurper, generally a tyrant. In "De Monfort" we behold the horrid reign of hate, but in his sister, the seraphic sway of love. Darkness and light sometimes opposed in sublime contrast, and sometimes the light swallowing up the darkness, or "smoothing its raven down till it smiles." Finally, all is black as night and the grave—for the light, unextinguished, glides and gleams away into some far-off world of peace. "Count Basil!" A woman only could have imagined that divine drama. How different the love Basil feels for Victoria from Anthony's for Cleopatra! Pure as the heaven and deep as the sea. Yet on it we see him borne away to shame, destruction, and death. It is indeed his ruling passion. But the day before he saw her face, his ruling passion was the love of glory. And the hour he died by his own hand was troubled into madness by many passions; for are they not all mysteriously linked together, sometimes a dreadful brotherhood?

We must really not much longer delay our long-projected panegyric on the genius of our lady-poets. Let them be assured that the old man loves them all, as they would wish to be loved; and that he would not "let even the winds of heaven visit their faces too roughly." Not too roughly; but long may the winds of heaven visit them freely and boldly, for there is health and beauty in the breeze; and as for the sunshine and the moonshine, may they let fall their lights and their shadows unobstructed on countenances "instinct with spirit," whether dim in pensiveness or radiant with joy, still in all expression "beautiful exceedingly," for it alone deserves the name, the beauty of the soul.

Well may our land be proud of such women. None such ever before adorned her poetical annals. Glance over that most interesting volume, "Specimens of British poetesses," by that amiable and ingenious man, the Reverend Alexander Dyce, and what effulgence begins to break towards the close of the eighteenth century! For hundreds of years the genius of English women had ever and anon been shining forth in song; but faint, though fair, was the lustre, and struggling, imprisoned in clouds. Some of the sweet singers of those days bring tears to our eyes by their simple pathos, for their poetry breathes of their own sorrows, and shows that they were but too familiar with grief. But their strains are mere melodies "sweetly played in tune." The deeper harmonies of poetry seem to have been beyond their reach. The range of their power was limited. Anne, Countess of Winchelsea, Catharine Phillips, known by the name of Orinda, and Mrs. Anne Killegrew, who, Dryden says, was made an angel, "in the last promotion to the skies," showed, as they sang on earth, that they were all worthy to sing in heaven. But what were their hymns to those that are now warbled around us from many sister spirits, pure in their lives as they, but brighter far in their genius, and more fortunate in its nurture! Poetry from female lips was then half a wonder and half a reproach. But now 'tis no longer rare—not even the highest—yes, the highest, for innocence and purity are of the highest hierarchies; and the thoughts and feelings they inspire, though breathed in words and tones, "gentle and low, an excellent thing in woman," are yet lofty as the stars, and humble too as the flowers beneath our feet.

And now we are upon the verge of another era of poetry, when the throne was occupied by Dryden, and then by Pope, searching still for a great poem. Did either of them ever write one? No—never. Sir Walter says finely of glorious John,

"And Dryden, in immortal strain,
Had raised the table round again,
But that a ribald king and court
Bade him play on to make them sport,
The world defrauded of the high design,
Profaned the God-given strength, and marr'd the lofty line."

But why, we ask, did Dryden suffer a ribald king and court to debase and degrade his immortal strain? Because he was poor. But could he not have died of cold, thirst, and hunger—in a state of starvation? Have not millions of men and women done so, rather than sacrifice their conscience? And shall we grant to a great poet that indulgence which many a humble hind would have flung in our teeth, and rather than have availed himself of it, faced the faggot, or the halter, or the stake set within the sea-flood? But it is satisfactory to know that Dryden, though still glorious John, was not a great poet. His soul, we know, was insensible to the pathetic and the sublime, else had his genius held fast its integrity, been ribald to no ribald, and indignantly kicked to the devil both court and king. Pope, again, with the common frailties of humanity, was a pure, pompous little fellow of a poet, and played on his own harp with fine taste and great execution. We doubt, indeed, if such a finished style has ever been heard since, from any of the king Apollo's musicians. His versification sounds monotonous only to ears of leather. That his poetry has no passion is the creed of critics "of Cambyse's vein;" as for imagination, we shall continue, till such time as that faculty has been distinguished from fancy, to see it shining in the "Rape of the Lock," with a lambent lustre; if high intellect be not dominant in his Epistles and his "Essay on Man," we advise you to look for it in Keates, or Barry Cornwall: and could a man, whose heart was not heroic, have given us another Iliad, which may be read with transport, even after Homer's?

In Johnson's "Lives of the Poetasters," may be spied with a microcosm, a variety of small fry, wriggling about in the waters of Helicon, which the creatures at last contrive so to muddle, that they elude observation, even through that microscopic instrument; and in Chalmers's edition of the "British Poets," the productions of people are inserted, who must, when alive, have been almost too stupid for the ordinary run of social life. Some folks are born, it is proverbially said, with a silver spoon in their mouths, and others with a wooden ladle. But what is more perplexing still, some are born poets, whom the world persist in thinking prosers, and some are born prosers, and live and die in complete possession of all the faculties essential to the support of that character, whom the world, or the world's counsellors and guides, the critics, insist upon dubbing poets, wreathing their brows with laurels, and consigning them to immortal fame. Some of them—persons not destitute of common sense—such as the Sprats, the Dukes, the Pomfrets, and the Yaldens, must have been themselves much astonished at such procedure on the part of the public. In former ages this fortunate and unfortunate breed flourished in England, nor are they yet extinct. The dunces are not yet dead, and occasionally the empty skull gets a leaf of laurel. But to do our poetasters justice, many of them are in a degree poetical, and really write verses very prettily indeed, in a style seldom sufficiently felicitous to shield them from a certain share of contempt from their contemporaries, but often superior to the very highest and most successful efforts of many who, in former times, were asked to sup in taverns as persons of wit.

We have not yet, it would seem, found the object of our search—a great poem. Let us extend our quest into the Elizabethan age. We are at once sucked into the theatre. With the whole drama of that age we are conversant and familiar; but whether we understand it or not, is another question. It aspires to give representations of human life in all its infinite varieties and inconsistencies, and conflicts, and turmoils produced by the passions. Time and space are not suffered to interpose their unities between the poet and his vast design, who, provided he can satisfy the souls of the spectators by the pageant of their own passions moving across the stage, may exhibit there whatever he wills from life, death, or the grave. 'Tis a sublime conception, and sometimes has given rise to sublime performance; but in our opinion, has been death to the drama, in all hands, but in those of Shakespeare. Great as was the genius of many of the dramatists of that age, not one of them has produced a great tragedy. A great tragedy indeed! What! without harmony or proportion in the plan, with all puzzling perplexities, and inextricable entanglements in the plot, and with disgust and horror in the catastrophe? As for the characters, male and female, saw ye ever such a set of swaggers and rantipoles as they often are, in one act—methodist preachers, and demure young women at a love feast in another—absolute heroes and heroines of high calibre in a third, and so on, changing and shifting name and nature according to the laws of the romantic drama, forsooth—but in hideous violation of the laws of nature—till the curtain falls over a heap of bodies huddled together without regard to age or sex, as if they had been overtaken in liquor, and were all dead drunk! We admit that there is gross exaggeration in the picture. But there is always truth in a tolerable caricature, and this is one of a tragedy of Webster, Ford, or Massinger.

It is satisfactory to know that the good sense, and good feeling, and good taste of the people of England will not submit to be belabored by editors and critics into admiration of such enormities. The old English drama lies buried in the dust with all its tragedies. Never more will they disfigure the stage. Scholars read them, and often with delight, admiration, and wonder. For genius is a strange spirit. In the closet it is pleasant to peruse the countenances, at once divine, human, and brutal of the incomprehensible monsters—to scan their forms, powerful though misshapen—to watch their movements, vigorous though distorted—and to hold up one's hands in amazement on hearing them not seldom discourse most excellent music. But we should shudder to see them on the stage enacting the parts of men and women, and massacre the manager. All has been done for the least deformed of the tragedies of the old English drama that humanity could do, enlightened by the christian religion; but nature has risen up to vindicate herself against such misrepresentations as they afford; and sometimes finds it all she can do to stomach Shakespeare.

But the monstrosities we have mentioned are not the worst to be found in almost every scene of the said old English drama. Others there are that, till civilized christendom fall back into barbarous heathendom, must for ever be unendurable to human ears, whether long or short—we mean the obscenities. That sin is banished for ever from our literature. The poet who might dare to commit it, would be immediately hooted out of society, and sent to roost in barns among the owls. But the old English drama is stuffed with ineffable pollutions; and full of passages that the lowest human creature would be ashamed to read aloud. Therefore, let them rot. We have not seen that volume of the "Family Dramatists" which contains Massinger. But if made fit for female reading, his plays must be mutilated and mangled out of all likeness to the original wholes. But to free them even from the grossest impurities, without destroying their very life, is impossible; and it would be far better to make a selection of fine passages after the manner of Lamb's specimens—but with a severer eye—than to attempt in vain to preserve their character as plays, and at the same time to expunge all that is too disgusting, perhaps, to be dangerous to boys and girls. Full-grown men may read what they choose, perhaps without suffering from it; but the modesty of the young clear eye must not be profaned, and we cannot, for our own part, imagine a family old English dramatist.

The Athenians were as wicked, as licentious, as polluted, and much more so, we hope, than ever were the Englishers; but they debased not with their gross vices their glorious tragedies. Nature in her higher moods alone, and most majestic aspects trode their stage. Buffoons, and ribalds, and zanies, and "rude indecent clowns" were confined to comedies; and even there they too were idealized, and resembled not the obscene samples that so often sicken us in the midst of the acting of "a dreadful thing" in our theatres. They knew that "with other ministrations, thou, O nature!" teachest thy handmaid art to soothe the souls of thy congregated children, congregated to behold her noble goings-on, and to rise up and depart elevated by the transcendent pageant. The tragic muse was in those days a priestess—tragedies were religious ceremonies, for all the ancestral stories they celebrated were under consecration, the spirit of the ages of heroes and demigods descended over the vast amphitheatre; and thus were Æschylus, and Sophocles, and Euripides, the guardians of the national character, which, we all know, was, in spite of all it suffered under, high indeed, and forever passionately enamored of all the forms of greatness.

Forgive us, spirit of Shakespeare! that seem'd to animate that high-browed bust—if indeed we have offered any show of irreverence to thy name and nature—for now, in the noiselessness of midnight, to our awed but loving hearts do both appear divine! Forgive us, we beseech thee, that on going to bed, which we are just about to do, we may be able to compose ourselves to sleep, and dream of Miranda and Imogen, and Desdemona and Cordelia. Father revered of that holy family! by the blue light in the eyes of innocence we beseech thee to forgive us! Ha! what old ghost art thou, clothed in the weeds of more than mortal misery—mad, mad, mad—come and gone—was it Lear?

We have found, then, it seems, at last, the object of our search—a great poem—ay, four great poems—Lear, Hamlet, Othello, Macbeth. And was the revealer of those high mysteries, in his youth, a deer-stealer in the parks of Warwickshire, a link-boy in London streets? And died he in his grand climacteric in a dimmish sort of a middle-sized tenement in Stratford-on-Avon, of a surfeit from an over-dose of home-brewed humming ale? Such is the tradition.

Had we a daughter, an only daughter, we should wish her to be "Like heavenly Una with her milk-white lamb."

In that one line has Wordsworth done an unappreciable service to Spenser. He has improved upon a picture in the "Fairy Queen," making "the beauty still more beautiful," by a single touch of a pencil dipped in moonlight, or in sunlight tender as Luna's smiles. Through Spenser's many nine-lined stanzas the lovely lady glides along the wild, and our eyes follow in delight the sinless wanderer. In Wordsworth's one single celestial line we behold her but for a moment of time, and a point of space—an immortal idea at one gaze occupying the spirit.

And is not the "Fairy Queen" a great poem? Like the "Excursion," it is at all events a long one—"slow to begin, and never ending." That fire was a fortunate one in which so many books of it were burnt. If no such fortunate fire ever took place, then let us trust that the moth-drillingly devoured the manuscript, and that 'tis all safe. Purgatorial pains—unless, indeed, they should prove eternal—are insufficient punishment for the impious man who invented Allegory. If you have got any thing to say, sir, out with it, in one or other of the many forms of speech employed naturally by the creatures to whom God has given the gift of "discourse of reason." But as you hope to be saved, (and remember your soul is immortal) beware of mispending your life in perversely attempting to make shadow light and light shadow. Wonderful analogies there are among all created things, material and immaterial, and millions so fine that poets alone discern them, and sometimes succeed in showing them in words. Most spiritual region of poetry—and to be visited at rare times and seasons—nor long there ought hard to abide. For a few moments let the veil of Allegory be drawn before the face of truth, that the light of its beauty may shine through it with a softened charm, dim and drear, like the moon gradually obscuring in its own halo on a dewy night. Such air woven veil of allegory is no human invention. The soul brought it with her when

"Trailing clouds of glory, she did come
From heaven, which is her home."

Sometimes, now and then, in moods strange and high, obey the bidding of the soul, and allegorize; but live not all life-long in an allegory, even as Spenser did—Spenser the divine—for lo, and behold! he with all his heavenly genius—and brighter visions never met mortal eyes than his—what is he but a "dreamer among men," and what may save that wondrous poem from the doom of the dust?

To this conclusion must we come at last—that in the English language there is but one great poem. What! said you not that Lear, and Hamlet, and Othello, and Macbeth were all great poems? We did—but therein we erred, for all the four have undergone, in the hands of their creator, disfiguration. There is, we repeat it, but one great poem alone in our tongue—Paradise Lost. So go and "Gaze on that mighty orb of song,

The divine Milton."

"Fluxit—domine!" The sand in the hour-glass is still. "Tomorrow for severer thoughts," as old Crewe has it at the conclusion of his "Lewiston-hill," but now for bed, as he was then "for break-fast"—yet not till we have said our prayers. Let no man hope to sleep soundly—for many nights on end—who forgets that knees were given, along with many other purposes, for genuflection, and that among all mankind is the natural posture of thanksgiving. Eugene et telete, amica! formosissima.

A new description of sleigh bells has been invented in Boston, the notes of which are said to be as perfect as those of the harpichord, and, instead of tinkling drowsily, "discourse most eloquent music."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE TON OF TO-DAY.—DRESS, PAINTING, MUSIC, POETRY.

A DESULTORY ARTICLE.

EITHER all fashions are absurd, or else there is no real absurdity in fashion. It is the mistiming of things that makes them ridiculous. He who is called mad for wearing an eccentric dress, is only so in not waiting till every body else is equally mad. An umbrella bonnet should not, therefore, despise one the size of a pinched farthing: "they're all of them queens in their turn." Time was, when the beauty of the female figure was estimated by the smallness of the shoulders and the largeness of the hoop; but now, under the hideous regime of the gigot sleeves, a fair lady's shoulders are wider than those of any of Barclay and Perkins's draymen. The lord and master standing by her side, bears about the same proportion to her that a figure of one does to a cipher. She is all nothing! Yet, the ambition of the sex is gratified by the appearance of magnitude, even though they must know that the men are aware of its being mere wind and buckram. A male, of the finest dimensions, passes the park entrances with ease, while the huge little creature on his arm, either has to go edgewise, or crumple through, to the detriment of many yards of silk, in consequence of a monstrous fashion, so graceless and ugly in itself, that it could only have been invented in order that the first who followed it might take advantage of the convenience to smuggle lace. The "bishop sleeves" are much better; yet even these are unspeakably troublesome, being continually trailed across the ragouts at dinner, or dipped in the slop-basin at tea. It is well if they do not take fire in snuffing the second candle.

Alas! and has the poetry of the female figure fled for ever? Shall we think of the graceful undulating forms of beauty, the sylphid symmetry of limbs, the buoyancy of elastic loveliness, and nature's real elegance, pure, glowing, and spontaneous in every motion, only as dreams that are passed? Are these bright visions of our youth no more to be realized? Must a married man never expect to see his wife grace his board in her own proper person, which, as far as he can judge, cannot fail to be considerably different from the egregious outline she now presents? Must a bachelor never more hope to see a sweet woman in her natural shape? "There were angels in those days," when, in the fragrance of the noontide groves, the heart might beat a joyous measure,

"To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
Or with the tangles of Neera's hair."

But now Amaryllis is cased in pasteboard, and Neera's hair is played the fool with. All coiffures are abominable. The giraffe head-dress made the fairest female a figure of fun! and if the "coiffure à la chinoise" is ever really adopted—for we actually hear it is contemplated—then farewell the tangles of luxuriant tresses, and hail bare face!

"Out upon thee, lie upon thee, bare face!"

We have never been so truly out of temper with head-dresses as in the pit of the Italian Opera, when a lady in one of the stalls, with a head like a large bush in blossom, happened to be directly in a line with our vision, to the outrage of our excited feelings, and the waste of our half-guinea. If Pasta comes next season, this really ought to be put a stop to. One moment to be fixed in breathless awe with her powerfully expressive countenance, wrought up with the demon or the divinity of human passion, and the next, to have it obscured by a bunch of greens, or something far more nonsensical, if not so vulgar—is a thing beyond endurance. Real refinement in social life consists in having a courteous sympathy with the feelings of others, and to outrage them for a freak of vanity, is moral vulgarity. Many a woman who sells cauliflowers, would act with far more consideration and decency. Perhaps the lady may reply, "Pray, sir, cannot you hear through my head-dress?" True, we go to the opera chiefly for the music; but, even without allusion to our second Siddons, the eye is curious to inform itself of the visible figure and features of the object which is so powerfully exciting the feelings. It is the same in listening to an instrumental solo: unless we can see the person performing, we are by no means satisfied or comfortable. This is to be attributed to the insufficiency of the sense of hearing (with some few fine exceptions) to convey a definite impression to the understanding: the heart beats, and it is the brain wishing to know why it is, and how it is, that creates anxiety to see the performer. We wish to bring all our senses to bear upon the interpretation.

Much as we admire a flowing costume for both sexes, like that of the Persians or Turks, in preference to the hateful angular-cut, or puffed-up monstrosities of Paris and England, we are, nevertheless, free to confess, that the only thing that puts us seriously out of temper with "fashion," is the shameful influence it is suffered to have over works of intellect and art. And herein lies the source of many a grievous wound, which men of genius will understand too well, without further probing. Yet, let us adduce an instance or two.

The grandeur of the old masters in painting—their truth, and character, and power, is now only appreciated and admired by a select few; and the artists of the present day, being compelled to adopt an opposite style, have come to an opinion that the modern school is the superior. This is the natural consequence, when their pecuniary interests come to be acted upon by human vanity and habitual associations. Flat, high-colored, smooth, surface-like painting, with no more depth or substantiality than can be avoided, in fact, only a few removes from Chinese, is the reigning fashion! Whatever approaches the genuine standard is prescribed. The ladies and gentlemen of the present day are all determined to be painted like sweet peas. There is, however, an engraving now about town, far above all trifling; and we hope to be believed, when we declare upon our honors that we would "bear it out, even to the edge of doom," to obtain the heart and hand of such a woman. The print is entitled "Une Tragedienne," and is not at all like the person said to be the original. It is the finest thing that has been published these many years. It has not sold well, as may be imagined, nor is it likely; and we are selfish enough in our admiration, to wish it never may.

We have heard more than one royal academical affirm that a real fine painting by a modern artist, in the style of the old masters, would scarcely be looked at, much less sell. We are not quite sure of this. A painter has the advantage of coming before the public with far less difficulty, trouble, and expense than those who devote themselves to the sister arts. Suppose, for instance, a young man, of "no name," composes a piece of music, which possesses every merit that genius and science can accomplish—who will publish it? What manager will give it a trial? If he relinquishes the idea of fame, and merely wishes to make it the respectable medium of his interest, and to take it as his diploma of capability to give lessons, it will cost nearly one hundred pounds to get a full orchestra for the trial; and he has not as many shillings! Again, suppose an obscure man writes a powerful epic poem or tragedy, what can he do with it? Why, if he have not interest, money, or luck—things which no man of genius ever yet had—he can do nothing with it. Whereas an artist has only to contend with the circumstance of his painting being hung in "an infamous bad place," which may not always occur, and even there it may be spied out some fine day. The painters, however, seem all of opinion, not only that historical painting is ruinous, but that fine painting of any kind is secondary to the "humor" of the story. Oh, the grievous necessity for doing foolish things!

Without deteriorating from the great talent of Sir Thomas Lawrence, and allowing him every merit connected with grace, delicacy, high finish, correct drawing, harmony of color, and the art of making the most of his sitter's beauty, it is still to be lamented that he made so few attempts at higher things. It may be said, in answer to our objections to the aerial fashion he has set, his portraits being all like flowers in the sun, that, had he done otherwise, he must have given up his originality. This, of course, implies that his chief originality lay in the above qualifications; and this we shall not deny. What we principally regret is, that he did not choose nobler subjects for his pencil. We never heard of his seeking for fine heads, and there is no appearance of many having sought him. If a man had a name, Sir Thomas was happy to paint him; but if he read a great work by an obscure individual, he was one of the last persons to feel an impulse to go and have a look at him. However, Sir Thomas was a beautiful painter, and would deserve no mean fame, even if we had no other proofs of his talents than his portraits of Walter Scott, and Kemble in the character of Hamlet.

Pass we now to music. Shades of dead kings of melody! how are your names and memories outraged! how are your immortal lessons neglected! The prevailing taste in music is for nursery trash in the vocal, and trickery execution in the instrumental. The great composers of former days had none of these gymnastic exercises, these feats of slight of hand, in their pieces; they preferred a Doric simplicity—grand, original, and pure; and in their vocal composition they identified music with the most sublime ideas. They felt the divinity within, and chose words according to their own comprehension and sense of power. This is what makes the names of Handel and Haydn sacred to fame. With them, it was

"Music married to immortal verse."
What have we now?—music seduced by trumpery; and the town peopled with a truly ephemeral and no less spurious offspring, in the shape of butterflies, ripe cherries, gentle moons, and oysters! By the by, the last-mentioned disgusting song is a garbled and polluted version of "Aurora che sorgea!" and Miss Graddon, bearing that in mind, used to introduce a long Italian cadence in concluding, and descended to her lowest note upon o-o-o-y-o-y-tes! The song sold well. So much for taste; but we would rather a thousand times listen to "Hokey pokey wonky pong, &c. king of the Cannibal Islands," in which there is at least some character and grotesque oddity, without any anomalous pretence or puerile warbling. How far his present majesty feels flattered by the melodious effusion of "King William the far for me," it is impossible to say; but we would not have grudged walking a mile to see the face George the Fourth would have made at a similar appellation. We do not, however, object to a pleasant song, a droll song, or a young lady's song; we only mean to declaim against the preference given them, to the exclusion or cold neglect of fine compositions, by which we are far from meaning mere scientific music.

We have only a few words to say about poetry. The dynasty of maudlin rhyme and prettiness, and the substitution of personal character for dramatic imagination, has reached its utmost height, and is now upon the wane. Several bold attempts have recently been made in blank verse, which is the true standard style of solid English poetry. It is now a long while since the age of Elizabeth, "and there were giants in those days!" So long an interval having elapsed, surely the genius of the world can now afford to bring forth a few powerful dramatic writers again; and even the critics must hail them with pleasure, being heartily sick of decrying nonsense. Polish has levelled nature, and refinement has arrived at the last state of effeminacy and consumption. Let us hope that the stirring period which approaches will not fail to do what such periods have always done hitherto, and that the ephemeral productions of time-serving taste will be swept off like chaff and tinsel from the stage of intellectual life; when "the powers that be" will be found to wither away before the powers that last, even as those of ages gone have outlasted the perishable empires of the world. HERRICK THE POET.

Poor Herrick was subjected to all the ups and downs of fortune, which are so peculiarly the lot of poets. He took orders in the church; but the ill odor into which the establishment fell, and the growing power of the Puritans, induced him to give up his profession, and take shelter under the character of a layman. The evening of his days was spent more happily:

"For good-luck came, and on my roof did light,
Like noiseless snow, or as the dew of night,
Not all at once, but gently."

Though an enthusiastic companion, as every man worth a farthing ought to be when in the company of those whose minds assimilate with his own, Herrick was, at the same time, a man of principle and integrity. A fine spirit of pious morality breathes through many of his compositions; as, for example, in these lines

ON HIMSELF.

"A wearied pilgrim I have wander'd here
Twice five-and-twenty, bate me but one year.
Long have I lasted in this world, 'tis true,
But yet those years that I have lived are few.
Who by his gray hairs does his lustres tell,
Lives not those years, but he that lives them well.
One man has reach'd his sixty years; but he,
Of all those threescore, has not lived half three.
He lives, who lives to virtue: men, who cast
Their ends for pleasure, do not live, but last."

KORNER'S TRAGEDY OF ROSAMOND.

We rank a tragedy next to an epic poem; years and experience must be added to natural endowments, before a high rank can be attained in either. Korner's chief fault is one of the faults of youth; he is too diffusive and didactic. There is not enough of the poetry of action in "Rosamond," and too much of the poetry of sentiment. The play is, of course, founded on the love of Henry II. for the unfortunate daughter of Lord Clifford, who met an untimely fate through the jealousy of Queen Eleanor. The story is certainly well adapted to the stage, yet it has never been very successfully dramatized.

OR NOTICES OF ANTIQUITY, APOTHEGMS, CUSTOMS, ANECDOTES.

WHEN Ptolemy the second, king of Egypt, looked forth one day from his palace window, afflicted as he was at the time with the gout, the consequence of his luxurious indulgence, and distracted with kingly anxieties, he observed a multitude of his plebeian subjects reclining in festal ease, on the sandy banks of the Nile, and dining with immense glee and great good appetite on such plebeian entertainment as they had provided for themselves. "Miserable me!" said the monarch, "that my fate hath not allowed me to be one of them!"

Anaxagoras, the Clazomenian philosopher and preceptor of Socrates, being asked for what purpose he conceived he had come into the world, answered, "To see sun, moon, and stars." The same philosopher, being utterly negligent regarding the politics of his town of Clazomena, was twitted for his indifference on that subject by some one of his more zealous fellow-citizens, who asked him whether he entertained no concern for his native country? "For my country," replied the sage, "I have always great concern; my native city"—pointing to the heavens—"is perpetually the subject of my thoughts!"

Chilon, the sage of Sparta, inquired of Æsop what was Jupiter's employment—what was his regular daily business in the skies? "To humble those that are elevated, and elevate those that are humble!" said the fabulist.

Dancing seems to have been reckoned, as well among the Hebrews as the Greeks, one of the first-rate accomplishments, and to have been associated not only with their poetry, but with their religious worship. Almost all the earliest Greek poets, as Thespie, Cratinus, and others, not only excelled in dancing, but taught it to freemen, or gentlemen, for money. We do not read, however, that Homer was a dancer, or kept a dancing-school. Sophocles was one of the best dancers of his generation; he had a very handsome person, which he was fain to exhibit in the dance's grace-displaying movements. After the celebrated battle of Salamis, in the glory of which he and Æschylus alike as warriors partook, he exhibited himself as a lyrist and dancer, nearly in the same manner as David did before the ark: he footed it along, dancing and singing to his lyre, being anointed also with oil, and naked to the waist; though others say he wore his robe. When his play of Nausicaa was acted, he not only danced, but played at the ball. With the Hebrews, dancing must assuredly have been associated with notions of dignity, otherwise it would not have been used in their most solemn worship. And yet the taunting rebuke given to David by his wife, presupposes, in her estimation, something of levity combined with that exercise. With the Romans, after their connexion with Greece, dancing was also deemed a high accomplishment. In the age of Cicero, the first men of Rome made a boast of their skill in dancing; as Claudius, who had triumphed; Cælius, the enemy of Cicero; and Lic. Crassus, son of the celebrated Parthian Crassus.

Anacharsis, though a Scythian, uttered sentiments as beautiful as those of Plato himself. Among his fine sayings is the one—"The vine bears three grapes: the first is that of pleasure; the second is that of drunkenness; the third is that of sorrow." A Greek poet, I forget his name, gave the first bowl, or crater, to the Graces, Hours, and Bacchus; the second to Venus, and again to Bacchus; the third to Mischief and Atë.

When Mark Antony was fast fleeing from his conqueror, after the battle of Mutina, one of his acquaintances gave as a reply to some person that inquired of him what his master was about—"He is doing what dogs do in Egypt when pursued by the crocodile—drinking and running!"

How different are the times and modes of study practised by literary men in all nations and ages! Demosthenes studied always during the night, utterly secluded, and quaffing at cold water; Demades, his rival in the forum, hardly studied at all, but dissipated away his time amid wine and licentiousness. Æschylus was said to be always drunk when he wrote, whence Sophocles remarked to him with some of the bitterness of jealousy, that "if he wrote well, he did so perchance and unwittingly." If it be true that Æschylus wrote always in a state of inebriation, it may perhaps account for his harsh, contorted, yet furious, forceful, and sublime style of poetry. I should infer from Homer's simple style, that he was a drinker of cold water. Not only Æschylus, but Alcæus and Aristophanes, composed their poetry in a state of excitation from liquor; yet Anacreon, bacchanalian as he was, wrote, it is said, always sober—he only feigned inebriety. Among modern writers, I have only heard of Tasso and Schiller, who composed in a state of semi-inebriation; Schiller used to study till long after midnight, with deep potatoes of Rhenish; Tasso was wont to say that Malmsey was that alone which enabled him to compose good verses.

The Greeks seldom drank wine undiluted with water. Hesiod recommends three cups of water to one of wine; they sometimes drank four to one; the Greek proverb prescribes five of water to two of wine, or three of water to one of wine. The proportion of five to two seems generally to have been preserved by those who wished to drink cheerfully, and converse for a long time without inebriation. Anacreon, whom we may conceive the pattern of all jolly winebibbers, used two of water to one of wine. It was considered a Thracian or Scythian custom to drink pure wine. The Romans drank more undiluted wine than the Greeks; yet we hear Ovid himself saying, that he could never drink wine in an unmixed state; it was too strong for him.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

TITLES.

A LOVE of distinction is implanted in almost every human breast. It displays itself in the earliest stages of childhood, and may be detected under various disguises, for it has many degrees of quality and fineness; and, while it urges on some to feats of intellect, researches of science, and virtuous actions, it breaks forth in others in wild irregularities, schemes of mischief, or silly affectation. One commands it by perilous deeds, another by unremitting assiduity, a third by benefiting, a fourth by plaguing mankind; while a fifth is satisfied with it, even in the shape of abuse and execration; and, if he can but succeed in becoming an object of notice, is indifferent whether he is held above the million as a hero or a scoundrel, like that "aspiring youth who fired the Ephesian dome," with the design of having his name handed down to posterity, if not for a building, at least for the destruction of the celebrated temple. I know those who will receive distinction only in an honest way forming a small number compared with those who grasp at it on any condition; for multitudes may be every day observed so thirsty for renown, as to willingly abandon the path of virtue, modesty, and good sense in the pursuit. Nature, doubtless, bestowed this passion for a good purpose, as, without it, the arts and sciences, and perhaps the whole machinery of society would stop. She intended it as an inducement to industry, morality, and benevolence, and to create a generous emulation among mankind in enterprises to ennoble themselves and to benefit each other. But, like many of her gifts, it is frequently abused; and we partake of it as drunkards do of wine, even to inebriation. They who despair of it for genius, or courage, or true virtue, will have it for subordinate, and often opposite qualities. A youth of my acquaintance set out in life with an idea that his talents must raise him to eminence, but, being of an effeminate, pleasure-loving, and irresolute disposition, he has let years slip by in common-place and enervating gratifications; and now, incapable of accomplishing his wishes in an honest way, and equally unable to overcome his love of notoriety, he aspires to it by the aid of several silly absurdities of dress and manner. It is amusing to observe the disappointed candidate for immortality, who contentedly substitutes a coat bedaubed with tawdry lace for the elegance of learning and the dignity of virtue; and who, if he cannot make his fellow-creatures regard him for the flashes of his wit, slyly claims their attention by the eccentricity of his gait and the curl of his mustachios.

Everybody could be distinguished for something good if they would strive for it with sufficient perseverance, as a female, without beauty, may charm by modesty, cheerfulness, and intelligence. Nature did not afflict us with the desire without leaving the path open to all for its accomplishment, and it should encourage such as are not gifted with any extraordinary advantages of person, or peculiar feature of mind sufficient, without exertion on their part, to attract the attention of the world, to know that the most valuable distinction which can attend a human being is that which arises from a long and faithful performance of the ordinary duties of life. We may be dazzled for a time by the sparkle of wit, the exhibition of genius, or the effulgence of beauty; but these, even in their highest perfection, are inadequate to retain our love, and do not contribute as much to the happiness of those around, as the simple and useful virtues. What wife would not prefer an affectionate and good-tempered husband to a witty or a handsome one of a different description? What man would not delight in a wife who kept his home neat and happy, who ever met him with good humor at his fireside, when the exhausting and wearisome labors of the day were over, to one whose excellences would only bloom in the sunshine of public admiration? Indeed I have wondered how sensible people could, so often as they do, overlook the precious, durable, and infinitely superior qualities I have mentioned, and which are in the reach of all who seriously endeavor to obtain them, yet be so blindly fascinated by the glare and glitter of superficial accomplishments, which, like ornaments on the stage of a theatre, shine brilliantly for the audience, but are useless in private life. Who would toil and pant after artificial flowers when the buds of nature's own formation could be plucked every day by the road side?

Perhaps it is a defect in our system of education that this species of ambition is too early and strongly developed. The child is taught to study and conduct himself well, not that he may enjoy the pleasure of knowledge and the consciousness of virtue, but that he may receive a book bound richly, or wear a gold medal. This is a dangerous principle to arouse and cherish in the youthful breast. What is a piece of glittering metal, compared with the inward noble consciousness of having performed one's duty. That is the reward of virtue in this world, and children cannot too soon be made acquainted with it. How cruel, to deceive an ardent and generous child into labor by teaching him to rest all his hopes and wishes upon a mere outward triumph. It is in reality nothing more than a conspiracy, on the part of his guardians, to lead him into industry, by a false picture of the world. When he grows up, how his heart will droop and sicken if not supported by some inward principle of reward, in a measure independent of external distinction.

It is not extraordinary that children should be contented with baubles as the reward of their efforts, or, in the words of Pope, be "Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw;"

but a quiet observer, withdrawn from the excitements of life, will smile to find what empty honors and insignificant trifles persons grown up to maturity are frequently "tickled" with. Although we dwell under a republican form of government, one of the great principles of which is universal equality, I am continually struck with the endeavors of individuals to escape from its restrictions, and the consequent approaches we are making towards the construction of a nobility. Men are apt to imitate what they admire, and to become what they imitate; and what creates a greater sensation among us plain professing democrats than the appearance of a count or a duke? Their arrival in our sphere is as greatly distinguished as that of a hawk in a barn-yard; except that, instead of screaming with terror, and crowding away into dark corners and secret holes to shun his approach, there is a universal flutter of joy and admiration among us; he is received by a throng of sycophantic natives, and, to carry out a rather irreverent simile, every old hen displays her pretty brood of chickens with a cackle of maternal delight and ambition. Far be it from me to cast ridicule on a gentleman for having been born in a country where fortune or his own merits, or both combined, may have added a celebrated name to his possessions, or to object to whatever hospitable attention a stranger is entitled to on our shores; but I would distinguish between the welcome elicited by worth, and that blind deference paid to titles, which is too frequently yielded to the undeserving, and which then renders one party an object of contempt, and the other of derision. I know a very excellent young man who, on the brink of a successful termination of a long courtship, was completely put to rout by the appearance of a pair of French mustachios on the scene of action; and, although, as it afterwards appeared, they were directed against the heart of the lady only obliquely, and for the temporary amusement of the personage who stood behind those powerful engines of love, the mortified youth very properly disdained afterwards to receive the affection so readily inclined to yield to a foreign enemy, and astonished his relatives by marrying a pretty country girl, as fresh and untainted with these city diseases as the roses in her father's garden, and who could never look at a duke without laughing.

Another capital reason why our honest citizens and their wives and daughters should be on their guard against displaying too much solicitude touching titled travelers, merely because they are so, consists in the simple fact that no one laughs at them for their pains more heartily than the very objects of their respect; for these are sometimes clear-headed and talented men, accustomed to put the right value on things, and estimating their own stars and garters only as means of passing through the world in a more agreeable manner. When such gentlemen find themselves suddenly elevated to an artificial consequence among people who can have no earthly reason but vanity to prefer them before their own friends and countrymen, they are rather disgusted than gratified, and are unfortunately at once let into the secret of one of the worst weaknesses in the character of the American people.

I could name two instances, which some of my readers will easily recollect, without the mortification of mentioning the parties, each of which, in its own way, illustrates what I have been saying. One guest, who perhaps might have commanded by his talent that deference which he refused for his military rank, left a token of his disapprobation in the form of a severe poem, printed in one of the daily papers, not long since; and the other, with a ludicrous mixture of frankness, ignorance, prejudice, egotism, and good-nature, no sooner escaped from under the ponderous honors and compliments beneath which he was nearly suffocated, than he turned about and belabored the whole nation with such lusty and indiscriminate abuse, as, in the opinion of several discreet persons, we richly deserved, although it had no foundation in truth.*

Since these wandering stars from the spheres of foreign nobility avail themselves so successfully of exterior elegance and distinctions, or, as the phrase is, succeed so well in "astonishing the natives," and practise with so much profit upon their simplicity, and lurking respect for titles, it is not to be wondered at that some among ourselves aspire to the same advantages. The most ludicrous mimicry of foreign manners, dress, and customs, is sprouting up in different places around, as the seeds of false taste begin to grow. I have already seen a company awed by the announcement of the Hon. Mr. B., or Major C., or Col. D. Every title is hoisted into notice with a careful publicity. Time, instigated by pride of family and office, is slowly building up barriers between the high and the low; and a coach-maker, the other day, told me that his customers are busy in raking up, from the forgotten history of their ancestors, the fragments of heraldic bearings, that they may be patched up in this country of public simplicity, and lead the way to more serious innovations. I mention this more particularly, because of the allusion to it in the annexed letter, which came to me in a neat but unknown hand, and which I publish without comment.

SIR—As I observe several others addressing you upon subjects which most concern themselves, I am bold to drop you a line upon a topic of a good deal of importance to all such as have claims to gentility. You must know pa is having a carriage built, and wants to find out something about his great-great-grandfathers and mothers, so that he can get a coat-of-arms to be painted on the coach, cut on the silver, &c. It is very queer, but we cannot, for the life of us, discover where we came from. Pa says, he thinks we belong to the family of a Scotch lord, who, if the plain truth was known, is connected with a young man by marriage who is believed to be a member of a family who are cousins to a person related to the Pretender. If that is the case then, I have royal blood in my veins, have not I?—and I think pa ought to get something expressive of a princess in disguise. A person in England, to whom pa wrote on the subject, answered him that he could not tell him anything of the family of the Batterkins, but that for a moderate sum of money he could trace them back to the Botherkins, which was corrupted from Bolingkins, which, in fact, was no other than the Bolingbroke, who seem to have been great people in England. For my part, I do not see the use of traveling so far for a name, and wonder folks here do not set up names for themselves, and titles, and coats-of-arms too. I should like to know what makes Bolingbroke a better name than Batterkin? Is it not the divine Shakspeare that says, "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet?"—and so would Bolingbroke or Batterkin. I think we had better stop sending abroad for these things, as well as others, and manufacture our own titles, &c. as we do our cloth and hats. Let General Jackson open a great United States' shop, and sell titles and mottoes, &c. to the richest people. My pa made his money trading between here and New Orleans for sugar, molasses, and I do not know what. So let him be called the Duke of Brown Sugar. Then the tobacconist would be Count Pigtail; and the broker Lord Shaver, and so on. Or rather, let them adopt the appellations of the places of their birth, and I am sure our history would make as good a figure as any other, informing posterity how the Count Quogue challenged Lord Musquito Cove, or the Duke of Poughquag was arraigned for high-treason at the instigation of Lord Passadunk, &c. &c. we should then be upon a par with other nations, and have enough to do in admiring our own noblemen, without going crazy about those of other countries. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours, &c. SUSAN BATTERKIN.

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

TETE-A-TETE CONFESSIONS.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

FLORENCE! cousin Florence! will you speak to me, or shall I open your lips with this pearl folder—my own silly gift to a lady who would not read the last and best novel ever written, if she was to be troubled to cut the leaves. Are you very indolent to-night, or is your heart broken, or your bird dead? What ails you? There you sit with your great shawl about you, and your great black eyes fixed on that little foot imbedded in the ottoman, as if you were planning a flirtation, or inventing a mouse-trap, or what is more probable, musing on the constancy of your amiable cousin, and very humble servant. Well! I see how it is. Bring the pastille into this corner, Bettina, get me the deep chair and a cricket, and leave the room. And now, carissima, tell me the class of your devils, and I'll select something to read to you for their particular annoyance.

"I have been thinking, cousin, that I am growing old. Nay—never laugh—indeed I am serious. Leave burning my nice alumets, and reflect, as I have been reflecting for the last half hour, that this very moment—this—while I am speaking—is gone—irreparably gone! Think that life is made up of so few such that a child may reckon them, and then remember that an eye, eternal and unsleeping, keeps watch upon their lapse, and notes every waste and blot of their holy uses. Ah, cousin, I sometimes wonder if I am not mad to live the life I do—mad to forget death even for a moment. Heigho! come! read to me. I do not know what to make of this mood of mine. If I am in my senses, it is a lucid interval in a lifetime madness. Read, cousin, or the dark curls you have wasted so much poetry on will grow gray with this dull thought."

Cupid defend us! what a homily! Well, now do you know, Florence, I never suspected you of a thought before? It's quite surprising how one may live a century near a pretty woman, and know no more about her, till the gods enlighten him, than the moth knows of the star he flies at for a candle. Who would have dreamed that a raging belle—a gay, saucy, magnificent romp of a belle, would ever have conjured up such a vulgar, every-day sadness!

"And were you never sad?"

Ehem! when I was a boy, Florence—a musing, dreaming, melancholy schoolboy—I used to think of such things till the stars grew pale. Spring made me extravagantly happy, and summer deliciously poco curante, and autumn—oh, in autumn, the gods made me poetical! I fed upon existences, and visions, and all the mysteries of philosophy, till I was well nigh mad. Life was a rain-drop, a very bubble in my regard, and as for the glories of Dr. Kitchiner and Pelham, the "nare" of an olive, or the subtle differences in sheries—you will scarcely credit me when I tell you I thought them very insignificant. I built a bower of hemlock in the depth of a secluded wood, and filling the floor with leaves, I went there in the summer mornings, and lay all day gazing up at the flecked sky through the latticed roof, and weaving visions out of my little store of knowledge that would have staggered the hallucination of an opium-eater. Oh, what poor deluded creatures seemed to me then the fashionable and ambitious and industrious of this world! How wonderful I thought it that they could set their hearts for a moment on things which death might at any time take away, or the slightest change of fortune shift to the waiting hands of another. Beauty, rank, riches, every thing perishable—every thing that the stars would outlive, or the soul shake from its recovered wings with its mortal fetters, was, to my boyish esteem, as the gold colors of the clouds to the eagle that sails through. (Shadow of Pelham! forgive me for the poetry of that last sentence!) Well—from Epictetus I took to Epicurus. I reasoned that if life was so brief, it was not worth while to improve it—concluded to wait till I could travel to the stars before I studied them—renounced solitude till I could get a by-corner of the universe—and pulling down my bower, and selling my vellum Plato for an eye-glass, I fell in love with my cousin Florence! There was a metempsychosis! Since then, my sweet coz, as thou very well knowest, the "dum vivimus" of the gardens has been my motto; and truly, up to this my twenty-third mortal year, I find myself a most contented disciple.

"But, cousin, do you never regret those early days? Do you never feel that your childish philosophy was the better of the two? Do you never, in a sudden pause of music, or when passing out from the crowded dance into the clear, still air of midnight, feel that you are desecrating your own nature, and perverting your own once active faculties by such a life as yours? Nay—do not answer me—I know it is so. I know that I—even I, cousin—who never knew the impassioned days which you describe, and who have been a common child, with the common and artificial nurture of my sex—even I, never am checked for a moment in the whirl of gaiety without a sudden coldness of heart—never look on the quiet night in coming from a ball without a sinking reproach which sleep only can silence."

Very prettily romanced indeed! Why, Florence, you should write for the Souvenirs. Which of your one hundred and one victims ever suspected peerless perfection of such a drawback as this? Since you have betrayed yourself, however, I will tell you in a whisper, that I—(you won't tell—honor bright!) I—repent now and then—I do, indeed. Sometimes of a rainy day, or when the clock strikes one at midnight, or on coming suddenly upon moonlight, or a sweet place in the country, or on seeing unexpectedly a gorgeous sunset—my boyish heart comes back to me, and makes me a very child, with its silly weaknesses. Whenever I am taken thus, I go into my own room, and with a locked door and curtains drawn, sit down and read over my old diary—a book in which, besides recording every feeling of my heart, I wrote constantly in rhyme. It would amuse you to look over it. It is crowded with nonsense, of course, the inflated notions of a boy; but when "bit by the dipsas" of childhood, it is to my feverish feelings like water from a cold spring. I have not looked into it now for a month, but so well are its loose rhymes graven on my memory that I could repeat it from end to end. Shall I give you a specimen? You will remember that it is from a diary, and written by a boy—for there are both carelessness and egotism to excuse. Thus runs a page of recollections:

"My childhood has been happy, yet
I had some hours of shadowed thought,
Some hues from darker passions caught,
Some feelings I may not forget.

I have been wandering when the sky
Was black with tempest—when the air
Was rent by the loud thunderer—
And I have felt that I could die

To utter my defiance. Storm
Has been, at times, my passionate,
My ardent love, and I have sate
And wept that I was such a worm
Having no power to meet or dare
The stalking spirits of the air.

I have had softer feelings. Night
Has pour'd her flood of silver light
Into my very soul; and wings
Have come, in my imaginings,
And fanned the fever of my brow.
I do remember, even now,
How I have gazed till soul and eye
Were fixed in deep idolatry
On that pure planet—how I pray'd
That life's warm pulses might be stay'd—
Pray'd—to give heaven, and hope, and all
To be one hour ethereal.

And I have gazed on woman's eye,
And kindled at its hallowed fire,
And felt her fresh breath passing by
In tones as sweet as Jubal's lyre;
And I have seen her bosom swelling
To hear the softly whisper'd vow,
As if the soul in its deep dwelling
Were all too full for stillness now.

And then I felt as every drop
Of my heart's blood were backward rushing,
And drowning spirit, life, and hope,
In the wild tumult of its gushing.
I cannot tell you how it is—
But one pure glance from woman's eye
Will waken feelings like to this,
And give me deeper, holier bliss
Than a whole world's idolatry.

I never interchanged with men
My deeper feelings. I have kept
My sanctuary closest when
Their eyes would scan it. They ne'er wept
As I would wish to weep. They never Have felt a longing wish to die,
But feel as they could live for ever
In this world's hollow pageantry.
How can I hold communion? Still
It sickens at the heart to keep
The fountain seal'd—its waters will—
Ay, must—or the swell'd heart will break—
Flow full and freely. I have felt
As I would give a world to shed
One burning tear, and yet have dwelt
As if I were among the dead—
Myself the only living thing
Left of a total perishing.

And yet there is a pride in feeling
That thoughts are mine they never knew—
That though my heart may need their healing,
Grief never can my soul subdue.
There is a pride in self-communion
On things men cannot feel or share;

In soaring on a nobler pinion
To some bright home of purer air
Where man hath never been. They waken,
Such thoughts as these, an energy,
A spirit that will not be shaken
Till frail mortality shall die.
They make man nobler than his race,
And give expansion, strength to thought;
The tears they start leave not a trace,
For they are fragrant tears, and fraught
With soothing power—they heal and bless
The spirit in its loneliness.

I have peculiar feelings when I hear sweet music. I can find
No sympathy but silence then,
No kindred eye, nor kindred mind
To give me back my thoughts. Men are Too tame, too passionless. They deem
My holier feelings singular,
My heart's delirious joy a dream,
Myself a strange enthusiast: Still
It is a source of pride to me
To feel my blood tumultuously
Career at the minstrel's will;
To feel the warm unbidden tears
Press gently through the lash, and know,
That, though it shame my sterner years,
There is a luxury in the flow
Too full for their communion. Strange
That minds of an immortal birth,
Formed through the universe to range,
Should so ignobly cling to earth—
Having no passion but of sense,
No eye for moral loveliness,
No hate for mental impotence,
Degraded, earthly, passionless—
Just living and no more—like worms,
Eating the earth their soul deforms.

I have met here and there a heart
Whose passion pulses beat like mine;
Some few who lived, like me, apart,
And learned their feelings to enshrine
Like holy things. I have lived years
In one short hour spent blissfully
In their communion—mingling tears
Till I had been content to die,
My spirit was so chastened. One
I do remember now—a maid
Whose voice came o'er me like a tone
From some lost Peri. I have said
How much I worshipped melody—
And, sure I am, that all the strings
Which I have ever heard will die,
Ay, fade from my remembrings,
Ere I forget that tone. We parted—
I fear—forever! for her cheek,
Save when some thought the life-blood started,
Wore not the fresher hues which speak
Of life's continuance. Her eye
Was fraught with too much eloquence;
Its full, fixed gaze was too intense,
Too passionate, not soon to die.
She'll fade ere long—Oh how the flowers,
The fairest flowers of earth, do fall!
How young that hollow grave devours
Life's rosy hopes;—how soon that pall,
Like heaven's broad mantle, covereth all.

That was a kind of rhyme I was fond of then. Its ease and freedom won on my unpractised ear, and I wrote in it exclusively. The thoughts, as you see, are perfect midsummer madness, just such as a boy would nourish, who had lived alone till he believed himself a hero. And yet with all its folly it was a splendid delusion! I must confess, Florence, I have less enthusiasm now than I felt in those days when walking wet to the skin, bareheaded, in the thunder-storm. To climb to the top of a tall pine, and sit and rock for hours in the strong wind, or to pace the dark paths of the woods when the flash of the lightning was my only guide, were passions which filled me with thrilling delight, though, at the same time, a vague suspicion that they might be ridiculous made me indulge in them with guarded secrecy. It amuses me to remember the feelings with which I received the conjectures of my schoolfellows upon my solitary habits. I had naturally a singular kindness for those about me with which my pride was constantly at war, and when my oddities were sneered at, if I could not find cause for resenting it openly, I went away and brooded over it with all the dignified grief of a Marius. I will repeat you a heroic verse or two which I remember inditing on one of these occasions:

There are some things I cannot bear,
Some looks which rouse my angry hate,
Some hearts whose love I would not share
Till earth and heaven were desolate.
I cannot bear to be with men
Who only see my weaknesses;
Who know not what I might have been,
But scan my spirit as it is:
And when my heart would gush with feeling
To catch one kind, one sunny look,
When love would be a leaf of healing,
But scorn a thing I will not brook—
Oh, it is hard to put the heart
Alone and desolate away,
To curl the lip in pride, and part
With the kind thoughts of yesterday—
To wear a cold, repulsive brow,
While kindly feelings throng beneath,
To know that my proud heart must bow
Or live in solitude till death—

And all because men will not see
That pride is my infirmity.
'Tis strange they know not that the chill
Of their own looks hath made me cold;
That though my words fall seldom, still
Their own proud bearing hath controll'd
My better feelings—They forget
I have a heart of kindness yet.

"But where was la belle passion among all these extravagancies? Such a prurient fancy as yours could not have been all engrossed in the Platonism of woods and solitudes. Confess, cousin, that there was a softer shade in this boy picture."

I do—I do! Cytherean Venus! how I did love Miss Polly D. Low, the pride of the factory on the romantic Shawsheen! I saw her first in the tenderest twilight of a Saturday evening, washing her feet in the river. I was a lad of some impudence, and I sat down on a stone beside her, and by the time it was dark we were the best friends possible. She was beautiful. I think so now. She was about eighteen, and though four years older than I, my education had more than equalized us. At least, if not the wiser of the two, I was the most skilled in the subtlety of love, and practised with great success "les petits ruses." She was a tall brunette, and I sometimes fancied, when her eye exhibited more than ordinary feeling, that there was Indian blood under that dark and glowing skin. The valley of the Shawsheen just below the village where I was at school, is a gem of solitary and rich scenery, and the overhanging woods and long meadows afforded the most picturesque and desirable haunts for rambles who did not care to be met. There, on Sunday afternoons, when she was released from her shuttle and I from my Schrevelius, did we meet and stroll till the nine-o'clock-bell of the factory summoned her unwillingly home. I could go without my supper in those days, though I doubt if I would now, on such slight occasion. By the time vacation came, I found myself seriously in love—declared my passion, and left her with my heart half broken. We were gone four weeks, and, when I returned, the butcher's boy was engaged to Miss Low, and I was warned to avoid the factory at the peril of a flogging. The threat was, of course, superfluous. Her inconstancy was a serious grief to me, and, after being miserable a week, I had recourse to my usual panacea for all ills—poetry. If you will look away, Florence, I will try to repeat the verses with becoming gravity. Imagine the heroine's name to be Clementina, or Saccharissa:

Farewell—the tie is broken. Thou
With all thou wert to me hast parted—
I feel it on my burning brow—
I could not else be broken-hearted.
I may not weep—I cannot sigh—
A weight is pressing on my breast,
A breath breathes on me witheringly,
My tears are dry, my sighs suppress,
I almost wish my spirit were at rest.
Farewell—I've loved thee much!—I feel
That my idolatry was deep;
I know my heart can never heal
Till in the grave my passions sleep.
Yet—I upbraid thee not—my love
Was all I had to offer thee—
Love in its lone simplicity;
How could I deem thou wouldst approve?
How hope to draw an angel from above?
I cannot hate—although its gall
Would bind my wounded spirit up,
Ay, sweeten mine embitter'd cup—
I love thee still. I feel thy thrall
Like chains that sear, but bind me yet;
I feel that I could die to bring
To my crush'd hopes a withering—
Could die—if I could all forget
That thou hadst spurned my love—nor felt regret.
Farewell—my blessing on thee! Live
Still in thy hallowed loveliness—
I've tried—but no!—I cannot bless
Another too! I may forgive,
But oh the tie to life would part—
My heart would burst to bless him. Go!
We may not meet again below—
But wipe not out my memory from thy heart.

That's bathos—but it was pathos when it was written. I remember thinking at the time that I should stifle with the sick, leaden, oppressive closeness about my heart. I can scarcely realize now that the passion was real; but that is not so much a wonder. I was speculating on that subject a day or two since, while giving some advice to a young literary friend of mine. He is a genius, a real positive, genius, and has qualities of a personal character, which, in connection with his talents, will one day elevate him to the first rank of society. He had fallen in love with a pretty brunette, however, and, though poor, and without prospects, he was balancing the question of the desperate step. I was fortunate enough to reason him out of it, and have thus saved him, I doubt not, a life-time repentance. One of the greatest phenomena I know of, Florence, is the deluded sincerity of every stage in the progress of taste. Who ever brought himself to believe that his present impressions were incorrect and would alter with time? Who ever sat down deliberately and put aside his enthusiasm with the thought that it would become ludicrous hereafter? Who that is young (and I suspect it is as true of the old) does not think himself, now, at this passing moment, in his zenith? if not wiser, at least fresher than he will ever be—if not richer, more content—if not so complete in his accomplishments or so manly in his bearing, still more original, and vivid, and graceful, and therefore, on the whole, happier and better. It is difficult for any one to understand the relative standard of life. The ascent through the many strata of rank and consequence, by one who is born to rise, is so slow, that the heart finds time in each to put out its tendrils and cling. This is so true, that you cannot find an ambitious and successful aspirant in any walk of glory, (save such as deaden the heart,) who is not fettered with by-gone and inferior attachments—the dignity of his fame affected constantly by early, and, to the world, unbecoming and unaccountable partialities. In the passion of love, for instance, the school-boy, who is born to wealth and distinction, thinks the village beauty peerless; the student who is to honor his country's scholarship, worships the eternal daughter of his professor; and the new lion of a blue-stocking circle wastes his sonnets on the patronizing and intellectual "Miss Brown." There is a perpetual hallucination about genius, which colors every thing goldenly. If its possessor is kept low, the vulgar beings about him are always the heroines of his fancy, and if he rises to cultivated society, the first high-bred woman who notices him, be she ugly as Leonarda, in his grateful enthusiasm becomes the queen of grace and dignity.

"Very true, but very didactic, mon cousin! I pray you abandon that vein. I am in the humor for any thing else. Have you no more jets de l'amour in your memory to let off for my amusement? The mock heroic of your youth is quite like a comedy."

Comedy to the spectator, but tragedy to the actor—a very pretty inversion of things. No, Florence, I'll show up no more of my live Amaryllises to you. But I was addicted to ideal passions which were scarcely less violent, and to which I look back with a far more pleased dignity of remembrance. Sappho—"burning Sappho!"—with what a glowing idolatry of imagination I mused upon the immortal story of the beautiful Grecian, and in what impatient, though inadequate poetry I painted and sung my conceptions of her character and fate! I remember attempting, among other things, her "Last Song." A part of it ran thus:

My life has been a rapid stream
Made deeper by the rain of tears;
My hours have fled like a dream,
And yet those hours to me were years,
So fraught were they with feeling. Love
Has lent life's wings a rosy hue;
But ah! Love's dyes were caught above—
They brighten—but they wither too.
Still do I not regret the fire
Which, while it burnt, has purified;
I would not change this glorious pyre,
My burning love, for all the pride
And pomp of glittering heartlessness;
I would not break my golden lyre,
Nor love its hallow'd tones the less,
Though all my woman's hope expire
Upon its fevered chords. Oh life
Should never linger in the heart
Of injured woman. She should die
Ere one bright, rosy hue depart
From the lip's loveliness, and fly
At the first breath which stirs her wing,
The very hour her heart is riven,
Ere tears have come, or sorrowing,
All spotless as she is, to heaven.

I love to look upon that sea
Where I shall find my early grave;
It is so like my life and me—
There is so much in its wild wave,
Like what I've always been. Beneath
There ever is an icy chill,
A dark, drear flow, a living death,
A nameless, ceaseless tide of ill;
And yet upon its surface ride
The splendors of the white wave-crest,
And o'er its holy moonbeams glide,
Or on its bosom sink to rest,
And beautiful, bright things are sleeping,
Ay, in stormiest hour, beneath,
And Peri forms their vigils keeping
O'er maids who breathe but passion's breath,
And who are troubled not, nor wake
At the loud waves above them breaking,
While thirst for love no thought can slake,
And yet whose love knows no forsaking.

Passion!—passion! It is the history of a boy's life. When is there a time in manhood, when a dream—an idea only, of beauty—can engross the whole tide of existence? I have loved Sappho, and the "quaint, delicate Ariel," Juliet and Endymion, the gentle Rosalind, and chaste Florimel—every creation of poetry that won upon my boyish fancy, without distinction of sex, by the mere force and sweetness of poetic beauty. It has followed me—that same disposition for imaginary passions—up to this very moment. Every fine character of the novelist haunts me for a time with an inevitable affection. Di Vernon, and Flora Melvor, and Catherine Seyton, and Allston's painted Beatrice—all have had their hour.

"Speaking of 'hours,' cousin, do you know that its twelve?"
You should not have known it when I was so eloquent, Florence! It would be a little more a la spirituelle in you, to prefer waking in

"These lone and silent hours,
When night makes a weird sound of its own stillness."
But good night! Sweet dreams to you, "an' you will sleep!"

"Whatever draws a man out of himself, makes him wiser, and better, and happier; at least if it does not, the fault is his own, and he has to answer for abusing one of the most effectual means of improvement which Providence has placed within his power. He cannot benefit others without being himself benefited in return, either by the influence of his action, his own feelings, or by the gratitude with which it is more than repaid on the part of its fellow-creatures. Ascetics may say what they please, but seclusion is neither favorable to wisdom nor to virtue, and least of all to enjoyment."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Eulogy on the Life and Character of the Hon. Samuel Latham Mitchill, M. D.
By Felix Pascalis, M. D. New-York. 1831.

If we have delayed till now a notice of this address, it is not, by any means, because we deem the subject uninteresting, or the writer not fully competent to his task. His eulogy is a clear, unaffected, and extremely well written outline of the life and character of a very eminent and uncommon scholar. It is not unusual to hear of an individual as a great literary character, while the mass of the people are unable to explain the grounds on which his claims to that distinction are founded. If any are thus unacquainted with the causes of Dr. Mitchill's high and very widely extended reputation, this pamphlet furnishes them with every requisite information in the shape of numerous facts respecting him, and honors elicited by his science and learning from distant quarters of the globe. He was born in 1764, in Queen's county, Long Island, near New-York; and was, even in his early years, so well appreciated by his uncle, Dr. Samuel Latham, that he adopted him as a son, and "appropriated a liberal legacy" for his education.

"So intense was his eagerness for improvement," says Dr. Pascalis, "that during the long winter nights, when candlelight was not allowed him according to his wishes, it was his custom to make a preparation of brushwood and other light fuel, by the flame of which he continued his studies long into the night, to the great injury, however, of his eyes, which never entirely recovered their previous strength of vision."

"After the return of peace and the victorious achievement of American independence, and before the completion of the twentieth year of his age, Mitchill was directed to repair to Europe, to attend at the courses of one of the most celebrated schools of medicine."

"This second period in his education was destined to be as remarkable as the first had been fortunate; for in this he became the pupil of some of the greatest physicians and philosophers that the university of Edinburgh, in its palmy day, could boast of; the celebrated John Brown, of whom it was said in parliament, that he deserved a statue of gold for the new and philosophical character he had given to the study of medicine; the venerable Cullen, who is ranked among the first European masters of the healing art; a Home, a Monro, a Gregory, a Nesbitt, and an Alexander Hunter, whose works constitute such important text-books, and the great John Black, one of the fathers of the science of chemistry.—Young Mitchill diligently attended to the lectures of these, and of several others, and the courses of natural history, for three years, not only as a matriculated student, but as a mace-bearer of the university. This appointment of mace was no small honor, conferred on an American citizen, after the late struggle which had resulted in the separation of the two nations. Mr. Mitchill was received in this new circle with a consideration beyond even the claims of his personal recommendations and suavity of manners."

His profound knowledge of chemistry, natural history, and agriculture, of mineralogy, botany, and medicine, called forth acknowledgments of the highest authority; and, in conjunction with two other gentlemen, he was an efficient editor of the American Medical Repository, a work of established reputation. As a legislator his friend proves him to have been both a liberal patriot and rational statesman, and he possessed both facility and grace as a poet. As an extended biography is in preparation, we will not detain the reader with further particulars respecting him, but cannot lay down the present production without calling attention to its close, wherein the survivor, with affectionate and amiable feeling and simplicity, comments upon the domestic character of his departed companion:

"The affability of Mitchill and his simplicity of manners were proverbial; there naturally were time, indeed, when after long application, he found it difficult abruptly to unbend from deep study, and to counterfeit or assume the easier tone of mind of the occasional visitor; he then was apt to be slow of speech and absent in address. Yet it was admirable to see with what equanimity he bore the unreasonable demands upon his time, called on, as he was, as umpire of all merits, in inventions, discoveries, projects, arts, sciences, literary subjects and schemes, new books and publications, professional cases, acts of charity or public spirit; to decide on most multifarious topics, to give advice, or to bestow recommendation, as if his versatile and applicable talents, alike in books or the business of the world, possessed ubiquity of perception. Of this slavery he would sometimes petulantly complain to a friend; but he was never disconcerted by intruders, however ignorant, or idle, or indiscreet—and managed to send each away contented; nor was he ever perplexed by the bright and hurried wit of men of parts, seeking his society to measure their faculties with his. No man was ever more universally accessible than he—holding so high a place in society, yet he condescended to the lowest without ostentation—descending even to the capacity of a child, to instruct, to encourage the love of study, or to amuse. And notwithstanding the solidity and magnitude of his acquisitions, yet he was unequalled in the cheerful and light operations of the mind, which he used as his defence against antagonists, for enemies he had none. With moral dignity and true goodness of heart he forebore all haughtiness of demeanor, acrimony in censure, or heat in disputation; but when pressed by attack, he was unsurpassed in fine raillery, neat satire, and keen sarcasm; and all the artillery of wit, and mirth, joke and epigram, were ever at his command in repartee. Chaste in mind and conversation, and trained in early habits of guarded speech, he neither permitted nor encouraged the smallest departure from decency and purity of language, nor could he be detected in the utterance of vulgarisms or profane swearing. The morality of his habits was depicted in his household; in his affectionate regard for his excellent and true goodness of heart he forebore all haughtiness of demeanor, acrimony in censure, or heat in disputation; but when pressed by attack, he was unsurpassed in fine raillery, neat satire, and keen sarcasm; and all the artillery of wit, and mirth, joke and epigram, were ever at his command in repartee. "Enough
For me, if, when envelop'd in a cloud
Of steam, hot from the griddle, I perceive,
On tasting, no rude mixture in the cake,
Gravel, or sandy particle, to the ear
Ever painful, and most fearful in effect:
For should the jaws in sudden contact meet,
The white, within a luscious morsel hid,
Some pebble comes between, lo! as the gates
Of hell, they 'grate harsh thunder,' and the man
Aghast, writhing with pain, the table spurns,
And looks with loathing on the rich repast."

It is pervaded generally by a vein of tenderness and pensive meditation, which betrays the author to be evidently of a poetic and melancholy turn. He delights to lead on the imagination to mournful catastrophes; as, for example, after having advised the cook to leave the batter a sufficient length of time before proceeding to action, he adds:

"Much less do thou neglect
The auspicious moment! There, nor business then Must urgent claim, nor love the while engross:
For, ever to the skies aspiring still,
The fluid vivified anon ascends,
Disdains all bound, and o'er the vase's side
Flows awful! till, too late admonished, thou
Shalt frantic see the miserable waste,
And, in the acid draft within, perceive Thy lutes all frustrate." Thus Vesuvius, in
Some angry hour, mid flames and blackening smoke,
From his infuriate crater pours profuse
The fiery lava—deluging the plains,
And burying in its course cities, and towns,
And fairest works of art! * * *
With like intent, the porker's salted rind,
Moved to and fro, must lubricate the whole;
And this perform'd, let the white batter stream
Upon the disk opaque, till silver'd o'er,
Like Cynthia, it enchants the thoughtful soul."

What hungry poet, who has a heart attuned to fine feelings, whom nature has endowed with those graceful and thrilling susceptibilities, and who, moreover, has even seen buckwheat cakes baked, but must melt at this. Then his butter, (perhaps Philadelphia butter)

"Delicate and firm,
And golden like the morn."

Only one other thing within the range of human fancy could heighten the picture. We trembled for the fame of the poet who at this crisis had elevated our fancy to a pinnacle, which we considered a nil ultra; but observe how he still goes on, and while he makes the genuine buckwheat cake cater smack his lips, also brings tears into his eyes, as he pours out the honey—that

"Liquid amber which, untired, the bee
From many a bloom distills for thankless man;
For man, who, when her services are o'er,
The little glad purveyor of his board
Remorseless kills."

Affecting Scenes; being Passages from the Diary of a Physician. Second volume, 18mo. New-York: J. & J. Harper. 1831.

The second volume of these popular sketches has been published in a neat dress. As it is merely a collection of pieces already familiar to the reading world, we only make space to say they have appeared in the present form.

A Compliment for the Season. 18mo. p. 216. New York: N. B. Holmes.

An enticing and appropriate volume for the young, and apparently more pervaded than annuals in general by a character of cheerful morality and religion. It contains some pretty lines, and will prove an acceptable gift at this season of approaching festivity, when a present is almost the right of the young from their parents, guardians, and friends. The editor, in a well-written introduction, informs us that it has been compiled with the view of making its readers "amiable, cheerful, and happy." We must not omit to notice its numerous engravings and attractive binding, nor the charming lines by J. A. C. entitled "The Gospel."

American Girl's Book: or Occupations for Play Hours. By Miss Lealie. Boston: Munroe & Francis. New-York: C. S. Francis. 1831.

A neat-looking little volume, full of pretty pictures, and apparently excellent devices to pass away the time in a manner not uninteresting. Among the games therein described are, "The hen and chickens," "Frog in the middle," and the noble and renowned play of "Hunt the slipper." All who love children will appreciate this book, and many a wild burst of irrepressible glee do we anticipate, called forth by its humble pages.

In press. Fashionable Satires. A Poem.

The subjoined lines have been handed us, as an extract from a poem which Peabody & Co. have in the course of publication:

"And now adieu most 'gentle reader, and
Still gentler purchaser,' again we meet
If these good gentry take me by the hand,
And with all proper praise my numbers greet.
If not, 'tis no great matter, in a land
Where bards may turn to grocers, and complete
Their fortunes in a manner less divine;
Instance the 'cotton trade and sugar line.'
If Halleck turns 'to sugar,' may not I,
Whose wings of song are hardly yet in feather,
(If that the muse her gracious aid deny,
To bear me on through storms and cloudy weather,
In some such 'line' my rising fortunes try?
And if not laurels, gems as solid gather;
Oh yes, I will, like the immortal 'Croaker,'
Turn from a poet to a 'cotton broker!'
"Farewell my little book," good luck betide—
'I launch thee on the waters,' fare thee well;
There is a breeze upon the ocean wide,
Will bear thee out—but where, the fates can tell.
Some craft to friendly ports of favor glide!
Others, alas! to some 'trunk-maker's' cell;
In the first port he found my gentle cantos,
But never let me catch you in port-manteaus."

"When cold in the earth lies the friend we have loved,
Be his faults and his follies forgot by us then;
And for a moment the veil be removed,
Drop a tear o'er his weakness, and close it again."

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

Among the multifarious attractions of the Park, we cordially greet the appearance of Miss Clara Fisher. Phoebe, in Paul Pry, is one of those characters to which she imparts a charm probably not conceived even by the author of the piece. It is replete throughout with humor and grace, and never fails to draw forth frequent and simultaneous plaudits. In Victoire she is also at home. Nothing can be more precisely elegant and natural than her "your honor's cloak," when discovered in the act of bearing it to her mistress. We do not greatly admire Burke in long plays, though his Paul Pry is neat and clever; but the Irish tutor always convulses the house with laughter. Miss Fisher appeared again for Mr. Simpson's benefit, with Sinclair and a host of other attractions. No one who has seen her in "Sweet Home" requires our opinion, and they who have not, do not deserve to be enlightened upon one of the prettiest pieces of acting on the stage. The house was crowded.

Mrs. Anderson, at the American theatre, is evidently a favorite with the audience, both as an actress and a vocalist. A want of power in her singing is in a measure compensated by considerable taste and sweetness. In the popular song, "Away, away to the mountain's brow," she was much applauded, and several of her duets with Mr. Spencer were quite pretty, particularly "Plighted faith." An improvement is evident in the orchestra of this house. The experience of Mr. Taylor, the leader, is well known. It struck us, however, that the gentleman with the trombone, although a good player, uses his instrument too vociferously. This theatre has distinguished itself by the production of splendid spectacles, and several new ones are announced in rehearsal.

The exertions of the Richmond-Hill managers are also praiseworthy. Some fine actors are at present treading its boards. Finn, Kilner, and the best tragic actress in the country. We have seldom, if ever, beheld a lady capable of arousing and touching the feelings more than Mrs. Duff. With a noble person for the stage, and a face full of soul, she addresses herself to the hearts of her hearers in a voice, which for plaintive tenderness, and thrilling expression, we have never known equalled. Two young gentlemen recently made their debut here. The one in Pescara, in the play of the "Apostate," the other in the "Turnpike Gate," as Crack. The former, through the usual ignorance of the business of the stage, betrayed a few sparks of talent, and the latter followed rather too closely in the style of Mr. Cowell, an excellent comedian, for us to venture upon any decided opinion touching his intrinsic merits. Mr. Russell improves much upon acquaintance, and Mr. C. Thorne in the "Robber's Wife," sustained a character, with one or two exceptions, extremely well. We have not yet been able to see Miss Coleman.

FRICANDEAU, OR THE CORONET AND THE COOK.

A new farce, by Mr. Howard Payne, was produced at the Theatre Royal, Haymarket, London, a short time since. There was an attempt made, (which, by-the-by, we are given to understand, has been systematically done lately against all plays known to be the work of this author) to obstruct it on the first night; but it was overpowered by the good sense and fairness of the majority, and not a shadow of opposition has been offered since. The Morning Post, from which we extract the following, takes no notice of the party attack to which we have alluded; but we have it from other papers and from private information. Indeed, it was so obvious, that one of the noisiest of the foe was very unceremoniously ejected from the house. Here is the account to which we refer from the London Morning Post:

"A new farce, entitled Fricandeanu, or the Coronet and the Cook, was produced here last night. The plot is as follows:

"Ellen, (Mrs. Ashton) a beautiful orphan girl, has been sheltered and educated by Fricandeanu, (Mr. Harley) a notable and good-natured person, who, from a scullion in Paris, has risen by industry to the proprietorship of a cook-shop. Fricandeanu has two passions—the one to become the husband of his protégée, and the other to ascend from the dignity of a cook-shop to that of a restaurateur. The former passion is about to be gratified; Ellen consents to become the wife of her patron: and the latter might be gratified were Fricandeanu a little richer. The house of a first-rate restaurateur facing the cook-shop is for sale, but at too high a price for our hero, and over his delight at his approaching union with Ellen his disappointed ambition is perpetually casting a shadow—he cannot be a restaurateur. So beautiful a girl as Ellen is not to be supposed to have been about a cook-shop in a conspicuous part of Paris without attracting observation. Two noblemen, one the Duke de Valois, (Mr. Vining) and the other the Marquis St. Albe, (Mr. Brindal) have been, unknowing to each other's admiration, equally attracted by her charms. The latter has endeavored to win her attention but being foiled, has withdrawn; the other, Valois, more persevering, disguises himself as a cook, and enters into the service of Fricandeanu, who takes much interest in his education for the scullery. Ellen, however, sees that the pretended apprentice is better bred than he would be thought, although entirely unsuspecting who he really is; and fearing the power he is gaining over her affections, it is arranged that her marriage with Fricandeanu shall take place forthwith, and she warns the false cook to quit the house instantly, and never think of her again. The duke, much to the regret of Fricandeanu, affects to submit, but arranges with his myrmidons to watch their opportunity for conveying the bride, after the marriage ceremony, to a sporting pavilion of his in the suburbs of Paris. During these occurrences the first admirer of Ellen, the Marquis St. Albe, happening to pass Fricandeanu's with the Chevalier de Courcy, (Mr. Bartlett) a young friend of his, to whom he wishes to teach what he calls 'life,' forces his companion into the cook-shop to see his quondam flame; here the friends recognize Valois under his disguise; explanations follow, when the marquis, insisting that the duke's labor of love will be lost, having himself failed in the same enterprise, Valois wages fifty louis that ere the expiration of twenty-four hours the marquis shall dine with her he fancies so invincible, at the sporting pavilion of his grace. The duke writes an order to his steward to prepare a banquet there on the following day; his steward is an old acquaintance of Fricandeanu, by the name of Lambert (Mr. Webster.) No sooner has the duke, as the cook, taken his formal leave of his master, than Lambert makes his appearance. Fricandeanu learns the high standing in the household of Valois of his old crony, who, to the cook's great delight, gives him an order to prepare the banquet to be given at the sporting pavilion on the morrow. The wedding of Fricandeanu proceeds; Ellen's bridemaid is a young Soubrette, by the name of Rose (Mrs. Humby), who takes great delight in tormenting Fricandeanu. Ellen, overcome by the heat of the room where the bridal party are carousing, comes into the garden for air with Rose, who disembarrasses her of her veil and wreath, and she at length retires into the little pavilion opposite the cookshop, prepared for the abode of the new-married couple. Rose, in the spirit of mischief, locks her in, and takes the key, for the sake of teasing the bridegroom, who, infinitely disconcerted at not being able to get access to his wife, darts out for a ladder to scale the balcony; while he is gone, Ellen tries on the bridal veil and wreath left behind by her friend. At this moment the retainers of the duke enter, and, mistaking her for their destined victim, convey Rose to the sporting pavilion. Her screams alarm the night patrol, who, on arriving, find Fricandeanu breaking open the pavilion window. They seize him as a robber, just as he discovers the carrying off of a female, whom he takes, from her dress, to be his wife. He escapes them, and flies to his friend Lambert, on whose influence with the duke he relies for protection, and for the recovery of his supposed stolen wife. Though puzzled with the likeness of the duke and his late cook, on receiving the promise of a recommendation to the head of the police for aid in regaining Ellen, he is pacified until he finds the pretended kindness to be only an injunction to detain him, that he may not obstruct the duke's designs. Instead of delivering the order, therefore, he returns and climbs over the garden-wall up to the window of the duke's apartment. In the interim Ellen arrives in search of Lambert, hoping, through him, to get her lost husband out of the trouble in which she supposes him. Rose steals a sight of her friend, and apprises her of the plot and the mistake, which she enjoins upon Ellen to humour. The duke appears, and Rose vanishing, he finds only Ellen. Her husband overhears their conversation, with which he is greatly disturbed, until on the duke insisting that Ellen shall name the dearest object of her ambition, she mentions the house of their neighbor, the restaurateur, for her husband, which the duke promises; but, presuming upon her delight to become more affectionate, Rose makes a noise in the adjoining room, which alarms his grace, who turns to call his servants: at this moment Rose flings open the door of her hiding-place, receives Ellen, and they lock themselves in: Fricandeanu, maddened at seeing his wife run thus at the signal of a stranger, rushes down from the window. The duke, returning with the servants, finds him there. The parties are brought together, the mutual blunders are explained, the visitors enter to see the bet decided, the duke acknowledges himself outwitted, Fricandeanu is rewarded for his sufferings by the attainment of his great ambition, the establishment of the restaurateur;—and all terminates in a laugh and a banquet.

From the above description it will be seen that this is an exceedingly pleasant piece. It is well contrived, and ingeniously worked up, and full justice being done to it by the performers, we need scarcely add that it was entirely successful.

Spirit of the Age.—A new weekly paper, under this title, has been established in this city by Messrs. Porter and Howe. The first number is ornamented with an engraved head, and the contents are various and amusing.

Percival's Poems.—We perceive it announced in several journals—says the Evening Post—that Dr. Percival proposes to publish his poems by subscription. They will make their appearance in two duodecimo volumes of three hundred and fifty pages each. Percival's brilliant imagination, and his command of poetic diction and poetic numbers are universally acknowledged. He has cultivated the art of verse with a more entire devotion than any living author on this side of the Atlantic whom we now recollect. Slight as is the encouragement held out to poets by the public in this country, we cannot doubt that claims like those of Percival will be fully admitted.

Life preserver.—A London paper gives the following account of an invention, which may be the means of saving many lives:—An interesting experiment of a new but simple mode of assisting the inmates of a house when on fire to escape from impending destruction, took place in Bridge-road, Borough, near the police station. The apparatus consists of a broad sheet of canvas, with numerous loop-holes at the border, to admit the grasp of persons in attendance in the stretching of the sheet. The firemen, numerous police constables, and a considerable number of scientific and other individuals were present. The canvas, being stretched, a number of persons leaped several times from the roof, and other parts of the house, and alighted in perfect safety. Those who witnessed the proceedings seemed convinced that, of every means of rescuing the inmates of houses, when on fire, from the risk of perishing in the flames, the simple canvas sheet is the most effective, the most portable, and the most certain of being adopted as an effectual life preserver.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

In looking over Milton the other day, it struck me that I detected an inconsistency which has not been taken notice of by any of the previous critics. It occurs in that wonderful poem, Paradise Lost. After having informed the reader of the defeat of Satan, whom

"the almighty Power
Hurled headlong flaming from the ethereal sky,
With hideous ruin and combustion down
To bottomless perdition,"

the poet makes him cast around "his baleful eyes" to examine the nature of his new abode.

"A dungeon horrible on all sides round,
As one great furnace flam'd: yet from those flames
No light, but rather darkness visible
Served only to discover sights of woe,
Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace
And rest can never dwell, hope never comes,
That comes to all."

This idea of the entire absence of hope is a fitting one to express the misery of hell, but the writer cannot carry on his plot without the agency of this all-pervading passion, and therefore we presently find Satan, in the opening of the second book, making the following speech:

"Powers and dominions, deities of heaven!
For since no deep within her gulf can hold
Immortal vigor, though oppressed and fallen,
I give not heaven for lost. From this descent
Celestial virtues rising, will appear
More glorious and more dread than from no fall,
And trust themselves to fear no second fate.
Me, though just right, and the fixed laws of heaven,
Did first create your leader, next free choice,
With what besides, in counsel or in fight,
Hath been achiev'd of merit; yet this loss,
Thus far at least recovered, hath much more
Established in a safe unenvied throne,
Yielded with full consent. The happier state
In heaven, which follows dignity, might draw
Envy from each inferior; but who here
Will envy whom the highest place exposes
Foremost to stand against the thund'rer's aim
Your bulwark, and condemns to greatest share
Of endless pain? Where there is then no good
For which to strive, no strife can grow up there

From faction; for none sure will claim in hell
Precedence; none, whose portion is so small
Of present pain, that with ambitious mind
Will covet more. With this advantage then
To union, and firm faith, and firm accord,
More than can be in heaven, we now return
To claim our just inheritance of old,
Surer to prosper than prosperity
Could have assured us: and by what best way,
Whether of open war or covert guile,
We now debate: who can advise, may speak."

Notwithstanding the "hope never comes" in the first extract, it is evident this infernal assembly are animated with hopes of a very strong kind. It may be said that Satan does not actually hope, but only feigns to do so. Yet why should he feign but with the hope of accomplishing some purpose? But he does not feign, for it appears he has already conceived a vast design, which he eventually effects. Even if we grant that the great leader of the fallen angels played the part of a hypocrite in his arrangements, as indeed would be most consistent with his character, yet there is no reason why Belial, though "false and hollow," should express other than his real feelings. He says,

"I laugh, when those who at the spear are bold
And vent'rous, if that fail them, shrink and fear
What yet they know must follow, to endure
Exile, or ignominy, or bonds, or pain,
The sentence of their Conqueror: this is now
Our doom; which if we can sustain and bear,
Our supreme Foe in time may much remit
His anger, and perhaps, thus far remov'd,
Not mind us, not offending, satisfied
With what is punished: whence these raging fires
Will slacken, if his breath stir not their flames.
Our purer essence then will overcome
Their noxious vapour, or, inur'd, not feel;
Or, chang'd at length, and to the place conform'd
In temper and in nature, will receive
Familiar the fierce heat, and void of pain," &c.

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

LOVE KNOWETH EVERY FORM OF AIR.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

Love knoweth every form of air,
And every shape of earth,
And comes, unbidden, every where,
Like thought's mysterious birth.
The moonlight sea and the sunset sky
Are written with Love's words,
And you hear his voice unceasingly,
Like song in the time of birds.
He peeps into the warrior's heart
From the tip of a stooping plume,
And the serried spears, and the many men
May not deny him room.
He'll come to his tent in the weary night,
And be busy in his dream;
And he'll float to his eye in morning light,
Like a fay on a silver beam.
He hears the sound of the hunter's gun,
And rides on the echo back,
And sighs in his ear like a stirring leaf,
And fits in his woodland track.
The shade of the wood, and the sheen of the river,
The cloud, and the open sky—
He will haunt them all with his subtle quiver,
Like the light of your very eye.
The fisher hangs over the leaning boat,
And ponders the silver sea,
For Love is under the surface hid,
And a spell of thought has he.
He heaves the waves like a bosom sweet,
And speaks in the ripple low,
Till the bait is gone from the crafty line,
And the hook hangs bare below.
He blurs the print of the scholar's book,
And intrudes in the maiden's prayer,
And profanes the cell of the holy man,
In the shape of a lady fair.
In the darkest night, and the bright daylight
In earth, and sea, and sky,
In every home of human thought,
Will love be lurking nigh.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF BOWLING.

BY THE SAME.

WHAT a glorious place is a bowling-alley for observing characters and passions—there is no place like it; you may judge there of a man's manners, of his self-possession, of his ease, of his energy, of his temper, and in a single item, of his whole character. Like walking and smoking, bowling is a matter in which but few men come to any perfection. To arrive at grace in it, is, in my opinion, a more difficult matter than to do so in dancing. And if you will look with me at some half-dozen of my acquaintances you will say so.

There is a certain tall, broad-shouldered, graceless friend, of mine, whom you will see shambling about the street any day. I never knew him roll a ball in my life without hitting it upon the board so that it bounded at starting; and it is one chance in three that he rolls off at the side of the board. The way in which he gets on the board, too, and takes the ball, and recovers himself after throwing, are all ludicrous. He throws, too, with a vehemence; and I have known him follow the ball a rod after it left his hands. Now he does not enjoy bowling; how can he?—without using any grace or any ease in it. And bowling is a perfect development of his character.

Then there is another;—he throws a curved ball—and that, too, with an impetus. In his own mind, now, that man is superb at bowling; and you'll hear him ejaculate—exquisite! capital!—at any good hit, as though he were playing first trumpet to his own praises; and yet, withal, he is rather poor at it; to tell you the whole truth, he is a collection of vanity—and in the same proportion as he prides himself upon being graceful and elegant, is he distant from being either. I don't think that he enjoys bowling—he is too careful—there is too much aiming—and he rolls too vehemently.

Then here is another who is continually changing. At one time he rolls a swift ball—then a slow one—now he stands to the right of the board—now to the left—and in consequence he will average eight always—he is too uneasy to enjoy bowling—he is not well enough satisfied with himself—and he is the same everywhere. I never knew him keep to one thing a week in my life—and for a friend, I would as soon choose a flying squirrel.

Here is another, who does very well. You see he rolls rather slowly, and with one hand on his side; he rolls his ball off the ends of his fingers though, and does not throw it out of his hand—and that is a most slovenly way of rolling; and rather unpleasant, by a slight turn of the thumb, to send the ball whirling off the side of the board. I think he likes it very well, and enjoys a roll—for if you speak to him when on the board, and more especially, if you make him laugh, you get him into a tremendous passion.

Here is one who throws his ball like a stone from a catapult; and it will go whistling through the pins, tearing out two or three of them, and leaving the rest standing; he ought to know that great force is often useless, and become convinced of the superiority of mind over matter—for the man might as well go to work by the job at once.

Here is another that tosses his ball half way, and then stamps and pulls his hair if it does not go right, as if a tossed ball could go right. That is just his nature; he is always for plunging “in medias res,” but he does not find the “in medio tutissimus,” for he often gets into hot water; and at last by getting in and out, he has tumbled into the “medias res” of the neutral ground, where neither party will own him—and any man who tosses a ball may expect the same fate.

But here is a man to whom bowling is a luxury—he has every requisite for a bowler—he is a poet you may know by his eye; and lazy you may know by his motions. If you get him to write you some half a dozen lines, Hercules' labors were nothing to it—but when you get it, it is superb. You may see by the way in which he goes on the board, and takes his ball, that he will enjoy it; there is a peculiar sway of body in his moving, that shows an indolent ease—and he rolls beautifully too—throwing his ball out, not letting it slide from his hands—rather swiftly, but not very, and always striking where he aims; he makes nothing of a double, and is sure of twelve and a half for an afternoon's average—and that after all is the poetry of bowling.

To a man troubled with gentlemen in blue, your bowling-alley is a specific—for indeed every toss of the ball throws out some portion of their influence at the finger's ends; it is infinitely better than suicide when you are in debt and cannot get out of it—a pistol is nothing to it—and a voyage of discovery among fishes, and lumps of gold, and great anchors, should not be spoken of in the same breath.

There is an unwritten bowling, too, when you are dreaming, broad awake—perhaps under the stars, or over blue water, with the moonlight all about you—when you bowl in a vision with some whom you know by the impress of their soul upon their pages. I have seen Byron in my mind's eye a hundred times—he rolled a fiery, straight-forward ball, with a springing forward when he threw. Coleridge must throw a straight ball too; swift, very, but quiet. Keats—blessings on his spirit, whether it be in air or earth—must have rolled a curve, with a quiet, slumbering motion. Shelley, a fiery, bounding ball, with an eye like an eagle's following it. Croly, I think I see him now, with his sleeve rolled up, and his brow bare, tossing the ball as though he were a king. Crabbe would throw a grovelling ball, stooping to the ground while he did it. Wordsworth, a great, ugly, lumbering ball, yet always taking the head pin. There goes my dream—and I am broad awake.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

POPE GREGORY AND THE PEAR TREE.

HUGO BON COMPAGNO was one of the gayest of the gay children of the south. He had archness and vivacity—a bright eye and a ready tongue. He was the favorite of the neighbors, and was predestined by the monk who taught him Latin, to make a great figure in the world. Hugo had formed a close friendship with a youth about his own age, the son of a gardener; in all respects his inferior, save in that plastic quality of temper that moulded itself to the will of others, and which by its docility made, very frequently, a far deeper impression on those who knew him, than the more apt and vivacious qualities of his patronizing companion. However, the two lads were firm friends, and in the day-dreams of boyhood, ere the warm impulses of our nature become chilled in the school of selfishness—ere, in our progress through the world, we imperceptibly imbibe so great a portion of its clay, the youths had but one hope, saw but one fortune for both. Wealth, if they gained any, was to be equally shared by them—honors, if they came, must be participated by either. So dreamt they in the delicious time of youth, so lived they in one of the loveliest spots of Italy, at a village some few miles from Bologna. The world as yet lay before them, an undiscovered country; they saw it, as the great navigator saw in his dreams, the distant yet unknown land; a halo of glory was about it—it was rich in fruits and flowers, and spicy forests and mines of gold.

At length the time arrived when this romantic region was to be explored. Hugo was to go into the world. At the period of which we write, the church was the surest road to honor: and Hugo, as we have before implied, had that keen and subtle temperament, that untiring perseverance, and that aptitude for book learning, which in those days were considered the indispensable requisites for one who, in ostensibly devoting himself to God, sought to grasp at temporal sway; and who, as he bowed with a seeming inward reverence to the cross, leered with a miser's eye at Mammon and his heaps. Hugo was devoted to the church: he quitted his native village, and grown beyond childish years, and having cast away “all childish things,” he became a monk, and in his function pored over that awful volume so blotted with crime, or stained with tears—so confused, so scrawled with error—that mystery of mysteries—the human heart. Thus he labored, all his thoughts and feelings attuned to one purpose—worldly ambition. His home, his relatives, the companions of his youth, the scenes of his boyhood—all, all were forgotten—the monk had killed the man.

“Well, Hugo,” said Luigi, with a saddened air, “to-morrow you quit us: to-morrow you leave the village, and the saints alone know if we shall ever meet again.”

“Meet again, Luigi, and why not? you will come and see me—I shall sometimes come here. We shall see one another often—very often.”

“Yes—see one another? But you will only be to me as the ghost of a dead friend?”

“The ghost of a friend? Can I ever forget Luigi—my earliest playmate—the brother of my heart, though not of my blood? Trust me, I shall ever love you.”

“A monk love!—a monk has neither parents nor friends!”

“No; he loves, with an equal affection, all mankind!”

“Ay—and only with all must Luigi take his share. Farewell, Hugo, and the Virgin bless you;” and Luigi turned away with unconcealed emotion, and endeavored to proceed with his work. Hugo was likewise sensibly affected by the sincere passion of his friend. And let not the reader too hastily condemn the scene as weak and puerile—hitherto Luigi, although he had known and conceded to the superiority of Hugo, yet felt proud of the excellence that had cast its favor upon himself. He now saw in it the cause of separation; he now felt that he was the humble Luigi, the gardener; destined to eat from his daily toil—and that Hugo, his earliest and choicest friend, was to be severed from him to pursue a path, it might be, of glory and renown. Luigi continued at his work.

“A pear tree—and it is said to be of a rare kind.”

“Stay, let me help you,” rejoined Hugo; and, approaching Luigi, he assisted him in planting the young shrub, for it was little more. While thus employed, they uttered not a word—each drew a sombre picture of the future, and for the time Hugo felt that he could give up all hopes of the power and splendor, promised to him in his dreams, and in those reveries more delicious, though often as equally vain, as the visions of the night—that he could forego all temporal pomp, all spiritual dominion, rather than wound the honest heart beside him. For a moment, the genius of the place seemed to ask him—“Why not abide here in the home of thy father—why not rest with us, and get thy food from the earth—why pant for the commerce of the world, ‘as the hart panteth after the water-brooks?’” Ere the young tree stood supported by the earth, this feeling had subsided, as it had never risen, and Hugo stood again about to say farewell to Luigi, who looked at him with a look of mingled sorrow and distrust.

“Luigi,” exclaimed Hugo, with sudden animation, “let this tree be as a covenant between us. As it stands, it is no unapt type of your friend. The rich earth is about its roots, and the ‘dew will lie upon its branches,’ with the blessings of the saints, it may put forth swelling buds and leaves, and rich and odorous fruit—and men may pluck refreshing sweetness from its boughs, and rejoice beneath its shade. So it may grow up, and so it may adorn the land that doth sustain it; and, Luigi, it may be that it may pine and shrink, and never put forth one green leaf—or blight may eat its buds, and canker gnaw its heart, and so, cut down, it may be cast upon the fire, and so may perish. Thus stands your friend: I shall be planted in the church, Luigi—in that soil, rich with the flesh and blood of saints—heaven may rain its dews upon me, and I may put forth glorious fruit—and, Luigi, (the voice of the speaker became slightly tremulous)—these hopes may be a melancholy mockery of my fate—for I may perish, unknown, unhonored, unregretted. I know not how to account for it, my mind is possessed by a sudden superstition—I feel, and it is an odd, perhaps an unchristian fancy, that this tree will be the symbol of my destiny: if it flourish, I shall prosper; if it fade, Hugo will decay too. But, however it may be, Luigi, the hearts of our youth shall, in their friendship, be the hearts of our old age. And though we shall meet, yes often meet, yet here I promise that there is no time so distant, no state so high, that even though, parting here as youths, we never meet but as gray-headed men—that here embracing in this humble garden, we next encounter in the halls of kings—I give my solemn word that you shall be to me the same Luigi, I the same Hugo.”

Luigi grasped the hand of the speaker—“Heaven prosper you, Hugo—and forget not your friends. Remember, remember the pear tree.”

Hugo quitted his paternal home; years passed on, and whilst Luigi, a happy and contented man, tilled his ground and propped his vines, and saw his ruddy offspring flourishing around him—whilst he enjoyed that great gift of paradise, “a country life,” and lived in an atmosphere of serenity and sweetness, Hugo was toiling through the devious paths of church-craft, a childless man. He was a politician and a priest—then, more than ever, twin-flowers upon one stalk—he had advanced in dignity, and had almost within his grasp that bright reality, the shadow of which had shone like a star upon his tide of life, and tempted him to ford all depths, to dare all dangers, to hold all toil as nought.

And Luigi lived on, and became an old man. His children's children frolicked under the shadow of the pear-tree, which shot up, and spread out, as though some spirit were specially charged to tend it.

"Ha!" cried Luigi, "'tis a rare crop;" as two of his grandchildren, perched in the boughs, plucked the fruit, and threw it into the laps of their little sisters, who piled it into two large baskets—"tis a rare crop," repeated Luigi, "and if Hugo bear but half as much, there are few richer among the brotherhood. He said, as the tree flourished, so should he prosper: he was a true prophet; though 'tis well he left something behind to inform me of his increasing greatness—it seems I should never have known it from himself."

Hugo had, shortly after his departure, forgotten his friend, who, however, continued to tread the same humble, happy path in which he had at first set out. He had nothing to disquiet him, no losses, no family afflictions; the dove, peace, had always nestled in his cot—and it was not until the old man was bending downwards to the grave, that misfortune threatened his hearth-stone.

A man of high birth and immense wealth had built a magnificent palazzo in the neighborhood of Luigi's cottage. This man was connected by marriage with the family of Hugo. He was pure-proud and despotic, making of his gold a sword against the poor. One day, it was his arrogant whim that the cottage of the gardener interfered with the beauty of the prospect from the palazzo. It was almost instantly conveyed to Luigi, that he must seek another abode, as the land on which the house was built, together with the gardens, belonging to his potent neighbor, were to be devoted to other purposes. The intelligence fell with a heavy blow upon the old man. To leave the cottage—the roof under which himself, his fathers were born—to quit his gardens, his trees, things which, next to his own children, he loved with a yearning affection—the very thought of it appeared to him a kind of death. He refused to quit—he remonstrated—implored: it was of no avail—the cottage interfered with the prospect.

One evening the old man, half bewildered, had returned from a fruitless journey to the palazzo. He sat down in his garden, and looked with swimming eyes upon his mirthful children (heedless pretty ones, whose very happiness gives a deeper melancholy to a house of sorrow;) shocked and wounded by the tyranny of his landlord, he glanced at Hugo's pear tree, (for so he always called it.) The old man leapt from his seat—his resolution was taken—he would go to Rome—he would, as a last hope, strive to find some part of his boyish playmate Hugo, in the wrinkled, politic churchman. All things were soon ordered for his journey, and he quitted the cottage, bearing with him a small basket, filled with the finest pears plucked from Hugo's tree. Luigi arrived in Rome—and now, with a sinking heart, now with a confidence based on honest pride, he sought the presence of the holy father. Appearing before the servants of his holiness, Luigi asked for an audience of Messer Hugo Bon Compagno? When reminded of this unbecoming familiarity, Luigi replied, that he knew not Pope Gregory XIII., but was a dear friend of Hugo's, and therefore demanded to see his companion, not caring, he said, to trouble the pope.

To this Luigi obstinately adhered, continually urging, with great earnestness, that he should be admitted to the presence of his early comrade. There was a simplicity in the old man's manner that for once won upon the minions of the great; and the strange demand of Luigi being reported to his holiness, he was with great ceremony ushered before the sovereign pontiff—before the man who was courted by emperors, flattered by kings. All retired, and the rustic and God's vicar upon earth were confronted.

How changed, since the friends had last met! Then they were, at least in fortunes, almost equal. Now, one was bent beneath the load of empire—worshiped as one only "a little lower than the angels"—the triple crown upon his head—St. Peter's keys within his hand. What has the poor gardener to show against all these? A basket of pears!

"Now, my son," said Pope Gregory, "you sought Hugo Bon Compagno, you find him in Gregory the Thirteenth. What ask you at his hands?"

"Justice, most holy father—justice and no favor."

"Speak."

"I made with another, in my time of youth, a mutual compact of kindness and protection—we vowed that which ever should prosper in his fortune, should serve and assist the other."

"It was a christian promise. Well? Stand you in need of succor?"

"Most grievously—oppression has come upon me in my old age."

"And your friend forsakes you in your need? Have you witnesses to the compact of which you speak?"

"Yes—this basket of pears."

"Pears!" cried the pontiff, and light darted from his eyes as he fixed them earnestly on Luigi.

"We planted the tree on which they grew—'Let this tree be a covenant between us'—were the words of my companion. He and the tree have flourished; for forty years that tree has never failed; for every year it hath brought forth a crop of luscious fruit, and I have sat beneath that tree and wondered how it could be so bountiful to me, when he who helped to plant it, he who was bending beneath his honors and his wealth, had forgotten to send me even a single pear."

"Luigi—Luigi," exclaimed the pontiff, and with a face crimsoned with blushes, he threw his arms about the rustic! Their gray heads lay on each other's shoulder. Thus they continued for some moments, and then Luigi, stooping to the basket, presented a pear to Gregory: he took it, and looking at it, burst into tears. Luigi kept his cottage.

ARCHBISHOP CRANMER.

Severe only to himself, he was as unwearied in his attention to business as in his pursuit of learning. His time was thus employed: at five o'clock he usually rose, and till nine continued in his study; after breakfast, part of the morning was spent in business, public or private; at eleven was the chapel-hour; at twelve the call to dinner; after which he devoted an hour to conversation with his friends, or to the amusement of the chess-board. Again to his study he then resorted, until the evening chapel-bell rang at five; and after the service, he usually walked till six, which was the hour of supper, when he took little, often no refreshment; then from seven to eight again walked, gave the next hour to his books, and at nine retired to his bed. Fox relates that the archbishop always accustomed himself to read and write in a standing posture; esteeming constant sitting very pernicious to a studious man. Of his domestic habits, and private character, all that we know is amiable. As a master he was much beloved. His hospitality and charities were great and noble, equal to his station; greater often than his ability. We have witnessed him almost always poor; for his generosity to strangers, as well his countrymen, was boundless. His hospitality, indeed, we have seen suspected; but we have also seen it vindicated. Among other instances of his charity, he is said to have fitted up his manor-house at Bekesbourne, in Kent, for the use of wounded soldiers, who should be landed on the southern coast of the island, supplying it with a physician, a surgeon, nurses, and every thing proper as well for food as medicine; and the patients, on their recovery, with money to convey them to their homes. To the establishment of hospitals, indeed, as well as grammar-schools, his was the noble wish to have seen a very extensive appropriation of the alienated monastic revenues.—Todd's Life of Archbishop Cranmer.

A HAPPY INSTANCE OF PRESENCE OF MIND.

It has been related of (Cello Secondo Curio, a distinguished reformer, in the time of Cranmer, that when pursued by the familiars of the inquisition at Rome, he was sitting at dinner in an inn; and the captain of the papal band, called in Italy Barisello, suddenly making his appearance, commanded him, in the pope's name, to yield himself as a prisoner; Curio, despairing of escape, rose to deliver himself up, unconsciously retaining in his hand the knife with which he had been carving. The Barisello, seeing an athletic figure approaching him with a large carving knife, was seized with a sudden panic, and retreated to a corner of the room; upon which Curio, who possessed great presence of mind, walked deliberately out, passed without interruption through the armed men, who were stationed at the door, took his horse from the stable, and made good his flight.—M'Crie's History of the Reformers of Italy.

TENACITY OF LIFE IN A SNAIL.

The study of natural history is well calculated to cure us of the habit of speaking of things as impossible, merely because they are strange. Travellers tell us few things more extraordinary than the fact that animals have been known to live months, and even years, apparently without food. Bingley speaks of a gentleman whose father, a fellow of the Royal Society, left him a small collection of fossils and other curiosities, which he had in his possession many years; among them were a number of snail shells. About fifteen years after his father's death, this gentleman gave some of these shells to his little boy to play with. The boy put them into a basin of water, and the living snails were seen to come forth from them, after a confinement, not only of fifteen years, but also of those years in which they had been in possession of the collector. The number of years, however, is of little consequence—that they should live twenty years is little more surprising than that they should live one.

LINES BY A LADY.

Female correspondents multiply upon us. Heaven knows that many of the dear creatures write the most ineffable nonsense that was ever penned. Yet have we a love for them all; and whenever we see a light flowing hand covering a sheet or two of gilt letter paper, we instantly shut our eyes, and as, like Coleridge, "our eyes make pictures when they're shut," we see our gentle contributor seated at her desk, with a half-conscious blush upon her cheek, a deeper animation in her eye, a shower of dark ringlets upon her neck, and a little silver pen in her hand, which yields to the motion of the fairest fingers in the world. Heaven help us! it may be all a delusion. That very contribution may come from some ancient dame, either married or single, with a nose like a pen-knife, and a wig like a wisp of straw. But we augur better things of the authoress of the following poem, in which we discover marks of a grateful mind and true feminine feeling. There is something attractive in the very title.—Edin. Lit. Journal.

TO HIM I LOVE.

If ever the dew-drop was loved by the flower,
When panting it droop'd in its hot summer bower;
If e'er to the peasant soft evening was dear,
When his calm cottage home in the valley was near;
If ever the heather was sweet to the bee,
Beloved! thy affection is dearer to me!

If ever the eagle was proud of his might,
As his eye met the sun in his heavenward flight;
If ever old ocean was proud of his waves,
As foaming they roll'd over brave seamen's graves;
If captive e'er triumph'd when ransom'd and free,
I am proud of thy truth—thy devotion to me!

If ever the exile on far foreign shore
Sigh'd for friendship's kind smile, he might never see more;
If e'er the sweet nightingale wail'd in the grove,
When she miss'd the soft call of her answering love,
I pine for thy presence so blessed to me,
And waste my young spirit in weeping for thee!

But still in my sorrow one ray pours its light,
Like the moon when it bursts on the darkness of night;
If ever the bow spann'd in glory the heaven,
If ever the bark through the blue deep was driven,
If ever the summer brought calm to the sky,
Our souls are unchanged in their faith till we die!

THE "AMENDE HONORABLE."

This was an ignominious punishment, termed "honorable," on account of its being inflicted only on persons of high rank. The offender was led through the streets, bare-headed and barefooted, with a burning link in his hands, to the seat of justice, or some other public place, where he confessed his offences, and begged forgiveness of the injured party. The celebrated financier, Jacques Cœur, according to Monstrelet, was condemned to make the amende honorable to the king, by the proxy of his attorney, "bare-headed and ungirdled, having a lighted link of ten pounds weight in his hand; and he was to declare that he had falsely, disloyally," &c. The Damsel of Mortagne suffered the same ignominy, in the person of her attorney.

HIGH VOICES.

The Spaniards were particularly celebrated for the extraordinary height of their falsettos, and were sought after to sing the upper parts. They were succeeded by the artificial soprano, whose race, it is to be hoped, is well nigh extinct. The last falsetto Spaniard of the pontifical chapel, Giovanni di Sanctos, by name, died 1625; and the first soprano, Padre Girolamo Rassin, was admitted in 1601.

THE PLEASURES OF MADNESS.

A remarkable peculiarity in many cases of insanity, is a great rapidity of mind, and activity of conception,—a tendency to seize rapidly upon incidental or practical relations of things, and often a fertility of imagination, which changes the character of the mind, sometimes without remarkably distorting it. The memory, in such cases, is entire, and even appears more ready than in health; and old associations are called up with a quickness quite unknown to the individual in his sound state of mind. A gentleman, mentioned by Dr. Willis, who was liable to periodical attacks of insanity, said that he expected the paroxysms with impatience, because he enjoyed, during them, a high degree of pleasure. "Every thing appeared easy to me—no obstacles presented themselves, either in theory or practice. My memory acquired, all of a sudden, a singular degree of perfection. Long passages of Latin authors occurred to my mind. In general, I have great difficulty in finding rhetorical terminations, but then I could write verses with as great facility as prose."—"I have often," says Penil, "stopped at the chamber door of a literary gentleman, who, during his paroxysms, appeared to soar above the mediocrity of intellect that was peculiar to him, solely to admire his newly-acquired powers of eloquence. He declaimed upon the subject of the revolution with all the force, the dignity, and the purity of language, that this very interesting subject could admit of. At other times he was a man of very ordinary abilities."—Dr. Abercrombie.

A CHINESE DINNER PARTY.

When a Chinese invites to a ceremonious dinner, a large red paper is sent several days before the time. On this is written the invitation, in the politest terms of the language. On the day before a feast, another invitation is sent to the guests, on rose-colored paper, to remind them of it, and to ascertain whether they are coming. Again on the next day, a short time before the hour appointed, the invitation is repeated, to inform them that the feast is prepared and awaits them. When the guests are assembled, the first thing presented is warm almond milk, in large cups. Every table is served with exactly the same food, and the same number of dishes, at one and the same moment. (Only four or five or six persons sit at each table. In very fashionable houses, not more than two or three.) The tables are mostly of polished ebony, or Surat black wood, and are double; for, as they use no table-cloths, the upper table is removed, with all that is on it, at the end of the first course, to give place to the second. For the first course, the tables are laid out with chop-stick, wine-cups, china-ware, or enamelled spoons and stands, and two little plates with fruits, nuts, &c. Several small cold dishes, such as dry salted fish, shred fine, and made into a salad with mushrooms, &c. are spread over the board, only leaving room in the centre for a cup, about the size of a breakfast-cup. The dinner now commences, and all the wine cups are filled with seu-heng-leow, (a weak acidulated liquor, distilled from millet-seed, and always drunk hot,) and the master of the feast rises, as well as all the guests; he holds the wine-cup in both his hands, saluting them with it, after which they all drink together, and sit down again. A cup with hot food is now served in the centre of every table. After the first course the upper table is removed, and the table remaining is spread with spoons, wine-cups, chop-sticks, vinegar, soy, and sweet sauce, with some plates of sliced radishes, pears, oranges, and various other fruits and vegetables, placed before each person; and all the large fruits are sliced, as well the vegetables. While the second course is preparing, those who are tired of sitting, rise and walk about the room. The second table being prepared, the guests are all seated again, when bird's-nest soup, the most expensive and the greatest delicacy a Chinese can offer, is served up, with pigeon's or plover's eggs floating upon it, to each person. When entertaining any of the high constituted authorities, the master puts the first dish of the second course on every table himself, as it is brought in by the servants. After all, tea is served up in covered cups, as before described; on the leaves, and without milk or sugar; and thus closes the entertainment. On the day following the feast, the host sends a large red paper to each of the guests, apologizing for the badness of the dinner; and they answer him on the same sort of paper, expressing in the most exalted and extravagant terms the pleasure and unbounded satisfaction his feast has afforded them.

DRUMMED OUT.

Ledelius tells of a woman who was very much incommoded by crickets, and tried, but in vain, every method to banish them from her house. She at last accidentally succeeded; for, having one day invited several guests to her house, where there was a wedding, in order to increase the festivity of the entertainment, she procured drums and trumpets to entertain them. The noise of these was so much greater than what the little animals were used to, that they instantly forsook their situation, and were never heard in that mansion more.

TRAVELLERS DIFFER.

The visit to the antiquities was not effected without attracting the curiosity of the inhabitants, especially of the female portion. One of them, a beautiful girl, apparently about seventeen, followed me at some little distance. On my turning round, I saw her with a veil in her hand. The moment our eyes met, she threw it over her face with well-acted confusion, her object being, evidently, as much to be seen, as to see. It is the fashion for travellers in Turkey to speak of the horror the women have of being unveiled before men, and especially before christians. My own observations leads to the opposite conclusion: I consider it as a general rule, that no Turkish lady, having a convenient opportunity, objects to show her face, always provided that she considers her face worth showing.—Major Keppel's Journey across the Balkan.

A DRAMATIC INCIDENT.

One of our party had been employed against the Fehrees (rebellious mountaineers, whose chief, Kelmehmet, is a sort of Robin Hood.) He told us that a short time ago, a horseman staid to breakfast at a neighboring village, and consigned his steed, in the meanwhile, to the charge of one of the villagers. On remounting, the stranger asked him what he should give him for holding his horse. "Oh!" said the fellow, "I would not have charged you anything, but I am a poor man, and am obliged to leave my fields uncultivated, to go in pursuit of that scoundrel of a Kelmehmet." "But what harm has he done you?" "The trouble he gives me is quite harm enough; and if I catch him, I promise you I'll kill him." "Don't believe he'll be such a fool as to allow himself to be caught," said the stranger, as he pressed the horse's sides, and set off at full gallop. He was scarcely out of sight, when a crowd entered the village in pursuit of the Kelmehmet. By the description it was discovered that the Febee chieftain was the identical horseman who had just quitted the town on the opposite side.—Ibid.

CURIOUS MODE OF TRAVELLING.

In the evening I returned to Bologlou's, where I found a large party of catholics assembled to meet me at dinner. Many of them were on their return to Constantinople, from banishment, and were in a state of glee very much at variance with the usually steady demeanor of this people. One of the guests was a young man who was returning with his grandmother, a woman upwards of eighty. When the order for banishment arrived, not knowing what to do with her, he put her into a panner slung across a horse, and in this manner she had travelled upwards of a hundred miles in the most inclement weather. The good grandson had often given up his aged relative for lost; but she weathered all the storms, and was now not a jot worse for her country jaunt.—Ibid.

TURKISH COURTSHIP.

When a Turk feels disposed to get married, he communicates his wishes to his mother, or any other near female relative, to whom he gives a description of the kind of woman whom he would wish to make his wife. The lady applied to then sallies forth, accompanied by a host of female friends, to visit every house in the neighborhood where young unmarried women are likely to be met with. Those who appear to answer the purpose undergo a thorough examination; their hair is regularly combed, to see that it is all their own; their mouths are opened, that it may be seen whether the teeth therein contained are the legitimate property of the jaws on which they appear; almost every part of the body is viewed, to ascertain whether it is not disfigured by any deformity; and finally, they are made to walk up and down the room, to show that they are exempt from lameness. After these examinations, a faithful report is made to the proper quarter; the choice is fixed upon immediately, and the same messengers are sent back to make formal proposals. The special bearer of the commission appears, shod with slippers of two different colors; and this outward mark indicates at once the errand on which she has come. The other preliminaries are then speedily adjusted, and the nuptial-day fixed.—Journal of a Nobleman.

AN UPRIGHT JUDGE.

In the time of Judge Holt, there was a riot in London, occasioned by the practice of sending young persons to the plantations, who were confined in a house in Holborn, till they could be shipped off. Notice of the riot being sent to Whitehall, a party of the military were ordered out; but before they marched an officer was sent to the chief justice, to desire him to send some of his people with the soldiers. Holt asked the officer what he meant to do, if the mob refused to disperse. "My lord," replied he, "we have orders to fire upon them." "Have you so?" said Holt; "then observe what I say. If one man is killed, I will take care that you and every soldier of your party shall be hanged. Sir, acquaint those who sent you, that no officer of mine shall attend soldiers; and let them know, likewise, that the laws of this land are not to be executed by the sword. These things belong to the civil power, and you have nothing to do with them." So saying, he dismissed the officer, proceeded to the spot with his tipstaves, and prevailed upon the populace to disperse, on a promise that justice should be done, and the abuse remedied.—Biographia Britannica.

THE INDIAN SPARROW.

It seems that the pigeon is not the only letter-carrier of the feathered race, for it is said of the Indian sparrow, that "he may be taught with ease to fetch a piece of paper or any small matter that his master points out to him. It is an attested fact, that if a ring be dropped into a dry well, and a signal be given to him, he will fly down with amazing celerity, catch the ring before it touches the water, and bring it up to his master with apparent exultation; and it is confidently asserted, that if a house, or any other place, be shown to him once or twice, he will carry a note thither immediately, upon a proper signal being made." What an invaluable treasure must be such a bird to any unfortunate Mrs. Knibbs, who is reduced to the necessity of a clandestine correspondence with her lover! Hard-hearted guardians should have an eye upon him, for he would assuredly be preferred to any other messenger—not only for the romance of the thing, but for his sure secrecy; and for his wings, which seem swift as even the impatience of love could desire. It seems, however, that he is in the habit of playing wicked tricks; for, Sir William Jones further tells us, that young libertines train them to steal the plates of gold which the young Hindoo women at Benares wear between their eyebrows. Upon a given signal, they pluck these golden ornaments from the foreheads of the ladies, and carry them in triumph to their lovers. This is the bird of which it has been said that it illuminates its nest at night with fire-flies, which it affixes to the walls with clay. That the fire-flies are so placed, and at night, there seems no doubt, but naturalists differ as to the intention, and probably will continue to differ until the bird himself shall declare it. Some say it is for their light; others, that they feed upon these insects. Sir W. Jones leans to the latter opinion; but a letter from a gentleman, long resident in India, quoted in the "Architecture of Birds," favors the former, which is certainly the more agreeable notion, and would be as pleasing as it is poetical, could we, as Mrs. Wakefield observes, divest our minds of the idea of the sufferings to which the brilliancy of the flies subjects them.

PARADISE.

Where paradise was, has been much debated and little agreed; but what sort of place is meant by it may perhaps easier be conjectured. It seems to have been a Persian word, since Xenophon and other Greek authors mention it, as what was much in delight among the kings of those eastern countries. So that a paradise among them seems to have been a large space of ground, adorned and beautified with all sorts of trees, both of fruits and of forest, either found there before it was enclosed or planted after; either cultivated like gardens for shades and for walks, with fountains or streams, and all sorts of plants usual in the climate, and pleasant to the eye, the smell, or the taste; or else employed, like parks, for enclosure and harbor of all sorts of wild beasts, as well as for the pleasure of riding and walking; and so they were of more or less extent, and of different entertainment, according to the several humors of the princes that ordered and enclosed them. Semiramis is the first we are told of in-story that brought them in use through her empire, and was so fond of them, as to make one wherever she built, and in all or most of the provinces she subdued—which are said to have been from Babylon as far as India. The Assyrian kings continued this custom and care, or rather this pleasure, till one of them brought in the use of smaller and more regular gardens: for, having married a wife he was fond of, out of one of the provinces where such paradises or gardens were much in use, and the country lady not well bearing the air or enclosure of the palace in Babylon, to which the Assyrian kings used to confine themselves—he made her gardens, not only within the palace, but upon terraces raised with earth, over the arched roofs, and even upon the top of the highest tower; planted them with all sorts of fruit-trees, as well as other plants and flowers, the most pleasant of that country; and thereby made at least the most airy gardens, as well as the most costly, that have been heard of in the world. This lady may probably have been a native of the provinces of Chasimer or of Damascus, which have, in all times, been the happiest regions for fruits of all the east, by the excellence of soil, the position of mountains, the frequency of streams, rather than the advantages of climate: and it is a great pity we do not see the history of Chasimer, which Monsieur Bernier assured me he had translated out of Persian, and intended to publish; and of which he has given such a taste, in his excellent Memoirs of the Mogul's country.—Sir William Temple on Gardening.

BAYLEY'S SONGS OF ALMACK'S.

It is impossible, says the Literary Gazette, to conceive a more elegant and attractive publication than that which has just made its appearance under the above title. The work consists of a series of ballads, founded on incidents that have taken place in the Almack's rooms, and worked upon in playful or pathetic manner, as the occasion might require. Bishop and Addison have composed the music in their very best style; indeed, one of the songs may be accounted as among Bishop's happiest productions, and for sweetness of melody stands unrivalled. The songs of Almack's are from the pen of Mr. F. W. N. Bayley, and dedicated to the queen on her coronation. Portraits of the nobility after Beechy and Lawrence, embellish the volume. We quote the following beautiful ballad:

A rose dropt from her bosom,
And he caught it as it fell—
Was there no tale that to his heart,
That drooping rose could tell?
Did he not look upon her cheek,
And see one fading there,
That once had worn as deep a blush,
And look'd as young and fair?
And when her small and trembling hand,
Replaced the proffered flower,
O'er the bright heaven of her brow,
Did no dark shadows lower?
Started no tear to her full eye,
Heaved not her virgin breast—
Gushed there no feeling on her heart,
To speak it ill at rest!
And now when he has left her there,
And ta'en another's hand,
And led her forth to move with him,
Amid that mirthful band,
Must he not feel that his neglect
Has touched her to the core,
And from her heart-fount turned away
Joy's tide for evermore!

The incident upon which the above song is founded, was at the moment at which it occurred, the subject of fashionable remark. The Hon. Mr. R., a professed roué, and a character in more than one celebrated novel, had made considerable progress in the affections of Lady —, when some other object attracted his attention, and he suddenly neglected her. On the occasion alluded to, the young lady was crossing the room to speak to a friend, when she unwittingly dropped a rose which she wore at her bosom, and R., who was passing at the time, picked it up, and presented it with his usual sang froid. Lady — could hardly conceal her emotion.

THE IRON CHEST.

The "Iron Chest" is founded on the story of "Caleb Williams," one of the best novels in the language, and the very best of the modern school: but the play itself is by no means the best play that ever was written, either in ancient or modern times, though really in modern times we do not know of any much better. The great beauty of "Caleb Williams" is lost in the play. The interest of the novel arises chiefly from two things: the gradual working up of the curiosity of Caleb Williams with respect to the murder, by the incessant goading on of which he extorts the secret from Falkland, and then from the persecution which he undergoes from his master, which at length urges him to reveal the secret to the world. Both these are very ingeniously left out by Mr. Colman, who jumps at a conclusion, but misses his end.—Hazlitt's Criticisms.

LEGAL PRECAUTION.

The late Lord Clonmel, who never thought of demanding more than a shilling for an affidavit, used to be well satisfied, provided it was a good one. In his time the Birmingham shillings were current, and he used the following extraordinary precaution, to avoid being imposed upon by taking a bad one:—"You shall true answer make to such questions as shall be demanded of you touching this affidavit, so help you God. Is this a good shilling? Are the contents of this affidavit true? Is this your name and hand-writing?"

PRESSURE AT GREAT DEPTHS IN THE SEA.

If an empty bottle, or rather one containing only air, be tightly corked, and sunk by weights attached to it, to a considerable depth in the sea, the pressure of the surrounding water will either break the bottle, or force the cork into it through the neck. On drawing up the bottle, it will be found to be filled with water, and to have the cork within it below the neck. If the bottle have flat sides, and be square bottomed, it will be broken by the pressure, the form being unfavorable to strength; but if it be round, it will be more likely to resist the pressure, and to have the cork forced in. The shape in this case is conducive to strength, partaking of the qualities of an arch.—Lardner's Cyclopaedia.

SUCCESSIVE CHANGES OF WIND.

Kites made of paper, such as are usually flown by boys, may be converted into useful prognostics of the wind. When several of them are let up together, the higher ones being successively tied to the back sticks of those below them, they will ascend to a vast height. We have known the upper kite in these cases ascend to above one thousand feet. When the upper one gets a different direction from the lower one, the wind will frequently be found to get into the quarter indicated by the upper kite. This law respecting winds is more strikingly manifested by means of small air balloons, whose varying directions, as they ascend, portend the successive changes of the wind, which often take place first in the higher regions of the air.—Forster's Natural Phenomena.

VISION OF THE MOLE.

Does the mole see? Aristotle, and all the Greek philosophers, thought it blind. Galen, on the other hand, maintained that the mole saw. He affirmed that it has all the known means of sight. The question has been resumed in modern times. Naturalists have found the eye of the animal. It is very small—not larger than a millet seed; its color is an ebony black; it is hard to the touch; and can scarcely be depressed by squeezing it between the fingers. Besides the eyelid which covers it, it is protected by long hairs, which crossing each other, form a thick and strong bandage. Such an eye ought to be destined to see. But anatomists do not find the optic nerve. What use could an eye be of, deprived of a nerve, which in other animals transmits the visual sensations to the brain, which nevertheless exist?—Atlas.

MINING IN SOUTH AMERICA.

For three hundred years mining has been the favorite pursuit of the Spanish Americans; it is a species of gambling in which they delight; but the wiser of their race have a good saying on the subject, to this effect:—"If a man find only dirt on his land, he may grow rich—if he find silver, he is sure to become poor—and if gold, to be ruined."—Beaumont's Buenos Ayres.

PLEASURE OF BEING AN EMPEROR.

When the emperor Joseph the Second was in Paris, in the reign of Louis the Sixteenth, he was in the habit of walking about the city incognito. One morning, he went into an elegant coffee-house, and asked for a cup of chocolate. He was plainly dressed, and the waiters insolently refused it, saying it was too early. Without making any reply, he walked out, and went into a little coffee-house, nick-named the one-eyed. He asked for a cup of chocolate, and the landlord politely answered that it should be ready in a moment. While he waited for it, as the coffee-house was empty, he walked up and down, and was conversing on different subjects, when the landlord's daughter, a very pretty girl, made her appearance. The emperor wished her a good day, according to the French mode; and observed to her father that it was time she should be married. "Ah!" replied the old man, "if I had but a thousand crowns, I could marry her to a man who is very fond of her—but, sir, the chocolate is ready." The emperor called for pen, ink, and paper; the girl ran to fetch them; and he gave her an order on his banker for six thousand livres.

THE MODERN HEROINE.

Major Keppel, describing the fete given by Sir Robert Gordon, at Constantinople, gives the following account of the lady of the French ambassador to the Porte:—"In this instance, the choice of the French minister may be considered doubly fortunate, inasmuch as Madame la Comtesse is a military woman, in every sense of the word. Herself and her sister, the Demoiselles Ferring, animated with the glorious desire of serving their country in arms, enlisted as privates in Domoriez' army. They bore a distinguished part in the very first engagement, where they fought amongst the bravest, shortly after which they rose from the ranks, and obtained commissions. The sister of the ambassador was killed at the battle of Valmy. One of the two, I know not which, received a sword of honor for her chivalrous conduct. In the feminine manners of her excellency, it is difficult to trace the gallant hueser of the early times of the French revolution.

ANOTHER ANECDOTE OF DR. JOHNSON.

The world is flooded with anecdotes of Johnson. Let us record an anecdote of one of his hearers:—He and Burke were one evening, I believe, at the Misses Cotterells, when the conversation turned upon the great poets of antiquity. At length it was settled on the comparative merits of Homer and Virgil. Johnson was for Homer, Burke for Virgil. Johnson poured out a prodigious quantity of thought upon the vividness, originality and grandeur of the Greek. Burke delighted in the sustained majesty, the mingled pathos and vigor, and mellifluous eloquence of the Roman. The argument went on for hours, while no one present thought of interrupting so noble a display of genius on both sides. At length, a young lady's eye glanced on her watch, and to her surprise, finding that it was past midnight, she whispered the hour to her mother.—"Child," said the mother, indignant at being disturbed, "tell me that the house is on fire, for nothing else can be an excuse for leaving such conversation."—

FLORAL CALENDAR.

By a familiar acquaintance with flowers, we may know not only the coming weather, but the time of day, and the time of year. Linnæus is said to have possessed such a knowledge of the period and indication of flowers, that he wanted neither a watch, a calendar, nor a weather-glass.—Forster's Natural Phenomena.—[It is very true that those who are surrounded by a variety of plants may gain all this information from them; but then it should be observed, that this natural calendar or time-piece varies with the climate, not only of different countries, but of different parts of the same country.]

AN ILL OMEN EXPLAINED.

When an owl hoots or screeches, sitting on the top of a house, or by the side of a window, it is said to foretell death. The fact seems to be this:—the owl, as Virgil justly observes, is more noisy at the change of weather, so the owl seems, by a mistaken association of ideas, to forebode the calamity.—Forster's Phenomena.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

ALTHOUGH we do not subscribe to all the opinions expressed in the following article, and never mingle in party politics, we still feel no hesitation in complying with the writer's request, and give it a place. It being our constant endeavor to make the Mirror a paper of general interest, we do not feel ourselves altogether at liberty to reject well-written essays, discussing in a frank and temperate manner, any subject of political economy, merely because some of their sentiments may clash with our own private opinions, or, if the reader prefers the word—prejudices. In the present instance the author is a gentleman of elevated standing in the republic of letters, and, as his name is published with his communication, the reader will be kind enough to hold him, and not the editors of this journal, responsible for what he has here written.

THE SOUTHERN STATES.

BY JUDGE BRACKENRIDGE.

The soil and capacity for the reception of population of this portion of the Union form an interesting theme of observation. From the Chesapeake to the St. Marys, a distance of seven hundred miles, the sea coast is uniformly flat and sandy, with occasional pastures of rich swamp land near the mouths of the rivers. The sandy and sterile character of the soil increases in proceeding to the south, but is in some measure compensated by the greater value of the agricultural products. By far the larger portion of this extensive sea coast consists of very poor low pine lands, dreary and uninhabited. In the lower part of Virginia and North Carolina, the surface of the country, although of a better soil, is in general so flat and low as to be almost covered with water in seasons of heavy rains. These lands are, perhaps, more adapted to grasses than to culture, and I believe, at some future day, they will be the Holland of America. The whole of the southern low country is unhealthy, and in the rice region, as much so as the Campagna of Italy.

The second belt, or region, extends in like manner across the southern states, and together with that just described, may occupy a space of about two hundred miles in width. It is in general a region of poor silicious pine woods, at least to the south of the Roanoke, with a small proportion of fertile upland in spots, and of river alluvion. This immense pine wood belt extends across Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana to the Sabine; but this country is more diversified by a hilly surface, in Florida especially, and abounds in rapid streams of excellent water, but of a soil much inferior. The untraveled inhabitant of the northern, middle, or southern states can form no idea of the proportion of poor and scarcely habitable land in this immense zone, extending from the Potomac to the province of Texas. Thousands of acres may be purchased at this time, even in Georgia and South Carolina, for less than a dollar an acre; and further south, millions may be had in tracts of unvarying quality, which would not sell for six cents the acre. The northern and western portions of the Union have a continual intermixture of different qualities, first, second, or third rate; but here, tracts of vast extent are met with of little or no value to the mere cultivator of the soil. The population, of course, must be influenced by the nature of the country. Instead of farmers and industrious planters, instead of having towns and villages, those lands must be almost entirely abandoned, especially to the south, to the raising of horned cattle, unless the silk worm, or the culture of the olive, or the grape prove sufficiently successful to rescue them from their present fate, as the vicinity of large towns warrants the expense of manuring and reclaiming. Pine lumber and naval stores afford but little encouragement at present, and except in the immediate proximity of navigable waters, were never of much profit.

The third region extends from the falls of the rivers to the mountains, perhaps a hundred miles in width. The pine too now disappears, and with it the general surface of sand and sterility. The face of the country is hilly and diversified, susceptible of continued and contiguous population, is likely to abound in villages and towns, and to be inhabited by farmers instead of planters. It is the abode of Ceres and Pomona. It is generally well watered and healthy, abounds in iron and other ore, and in mills and mill seats, and in time will have manufactures. It is also the gold region, now become so celebrated. A glance at the map will show that the space between the Appalachian mountains and the sea, grows wide to the south, leaving a tract along the mountains as wide as that of Maryland or Virginia, besides the two zones already described, and supposed to be alluvial.

From this view of the southern states, it will be seen that each presents, on a smaller scale, the same features which characterize the surface of the whole territory of the Union: that is, we find in the Carolinas and Georgia, as well as in Virginia, an eastern, or sea coast region, a middle region, and a western country. The permanent interest of these different sections will be as difficult to reconcile as those of the northern, middle, and southern states. The soil and climate, the population and its pursuits, the public and private economy must give rise to different views of policy and of legislation. The western portions of the southern states are flourishing; many of their settlements have been formed since the revolutionary war, while the sea-board has been gradually declining since that period; the smaller planters or farmers have been constantly retiring to the western parts of the states, or removing to the new countries to the west, while a monopoly of the lands has been gradually lessening the white population and increasing that of the blacks. The sea-coast of the four southern states is generally in the hands of wealthy planters, and it is not uncommon for them to own from one hundred to five hundred slaves. The policy of the great planter is to pursue a system of entire independence of the contiguous population or territory. He endeavors, in order to make his establishment perfect, to have as little connection with the adjacent country as possible. So far from desiring neighbors, especially of poor whites, he purchases large tracts of inferior lands, in order that they may remain uninhabited. Of course, he gives but little support to neighboring towns or villages, and to their common mechanics; the latter he generally has of his own. Excepting some occasional supplies of horses, hogs, or corn, and this is bad policy on his part, he contributes but little to domestic circulation or trade. His produce is shipped at stated periods to some distant mart, and he obtains from abroad, and it is immaterial from what country, his supply of manufactured articles or luxuries. His interest in internal improvements, internal trade, and manufactures is, of course, less than that of those more remote from the sea-board. The inhabitant of the interior desires a good road or navigable water to enable him to reach the sea-coast, or to connect him with countries still farther west. But to the great planter of the sea-coast, the ocean is his road and highway, and this readily accounts for the similarity of interests which is now manifested by him with the ship-owners of New-York and Boston. It is certainly not an accidental concurrence of patriotic sentiment which thus brings them together, but interest, and this they have undoubtedly a right to pursue. To the ship-owner his ship is his home; to the great planter his plantation is his country; not that I mean to convey the idea that these highly respectable portions of our countrymen are devoid of the amor patriæ, but that their great interests are thus situated. These remarks do not apply to the same extent to the middle region, where there is a greater mixture of small planters, and where, except in the case of the more wealthy and extensive cultivators, the dependence on foreign commerce is not so immediate.

Judge Tucker, in one of his notes to Blackstone, exhibits in relation to Virginia, the three divisions I have described, and gives a very interesting table of the relative state of free and slave population. The eastern division has a large majority in favor of the slaves; this is less in the middle countries; but to the west the majority is on the side of the whites, thus rendering the proportion in the whole state nearly equal. Further south, the disproportion in the eastern districts increases, and requires a greater number of whites in the western countries to restore the equilibrium. The population of the west consists of farmers and small planters, who encourage the growth of towns and villages, and of course of mechanics and manufactures, for their supplies are obtained occasionally, and not once or twice a year from beyond sea: hence the vicinity to a town, or home market is all important. The farmer cannot sell his surplus to his neighbor farmer any more than the shoemaker can make shoes for his neighbor of the same calling; and to make inland towns, all sorts of pursuits and employments, especially mechanical, are necessary. What is consumed by one mechanic, may afford to a dozen farmers the means of obtaining purchased articles, when it would be out of their power to send any thing for the purpose to a sea-port or to a foreign country, especially to a country whose natural productions are the same. In case of negro insurrections, the sea-coast must look to the hardy yeomen of the west for security, and there is no doubt it is fully able to afford it, without aid from the other states.

In the remarks I am about to make on the effect of our national legislation, I disclaim all intention of favoring the opinions of any party, or of attempting to sustain any particular dogma of political economy. They are the result of reflections suggested by repeated journeys through the whole extent of the southern states. I incline to the belief that the tariff policy has materially affected their prosperity, but not in consequence of the weight of indirect taxation; for I am well satisfied that the amount is less than that paid by an equal population to the north. But this effect has been mainly produced by the extraordinary extension of manufactures in the other states, in consequence of the protection. I think it susceptible of proof, that the manufacturing country will have an advantage in trade over the planting country, and will be its creditor. The interior towns of the south, especially in the middle region, instead of increasing, are almost invariably on the decline, and this from the inability of their mechanics to compete with those of the north. In the small shops or stores, which have taken the place of local mechanics, we find the most common productions of mechanical labor; such as hats, boots, shoes, ploughs, axes, hoes, buckets, tin-ware, ready-made clothing, and a thousand articles of the first necessity, which every well assorted community provides for itself. The local mechanics, with such competition, are unable to subsist; the towns dwindle to nothing; and the poor farmers of the surrounding country feel the want of a domestic market. It is in this tone Mr. Jefferson is to be understood when he observed that the manufacturer should be placed by the side of the farmer. The money of the southern farmer is at present collected and carried away, to reward the industry of the northern manufacturer; southern notes are taken, sold to the north at a discount, and sent back to cramp the operations of the southern banks. If the four southern states were to form a separate confederacy, it would not be long before the majority would oppress the sea-coast planters, by adopting a protecting tariff against the manufactures of the northern states. Nothing but a radical change in the public and private economy of the south, can reach such an evil as this. It seems strange to me for statesmen to talk of abandoning the protecting system, when no nation in Europe has abandoned it. Let any one turn to Clitty's Commercial Law, and see the number of British statutes on this subject, and their extraordinary severity; let him look at the policy of France, and the other continental powers, and he will see that if their philosophers wrote in favor of free trade, their statesmen pursue an opposite practice. The great war between France and England about the continental system of Napoleon, had for its ostensible object the establishment of home markets, by the means of manufactures. The money received by the southern farmers, instead of remaining and circulating in the country, or re-appearing in improvements, of a public or private nature, may be traced in the improvements of the manufacturing states. The tariff has, it is true, aided the cotton market, perhaps to a great extent; but the advantage is lost by the tribute paid to northern labor and capital in the profits on the manufactured articles received in return. Perhaps the person least affected by the tariff is the great planter of the sea-coast, unless the reduction in price of the great staples, cotton and rice, is to be ascribed to the tariff. The income of the rice and cotton planter is but little felt by the adjacent country; it goes to the farther west, is taken abroad, or is evaporated in absenteeism. The real sufferers by the tariff are the small planters and farmers; and this not on account of an oppressive tax on the foreign articles they consume, but in consequence of the immense amount of articles of American manufacture purchased by them, on which they pay no tax, but whose introduction prevents the establishment of manufacturing towns and villages, and the consequent action and re-action in the intercourse of the farmer and mechanic. These ideas, however, are suggested with all possible respect and deference to the opinions of the enlightened and patriotic statesmen of the south, who hold the contrary.

In regard to the health of the climate and defects in the agricultural system, the general opinion seems to be, that tracts of rich land in the second and part of the third regions, uniformly become unhealthy after a few years of cultivation, on account of the quantity of decayed timber. There can be no doubt that this is an obvious cause, especially where it is permitted to remain in moist situations, and subject to rapid decomposition in the warm seasons of the year: but in elevated and dry situations this cause operates to a much less extent. The first five or six years are generally observed to be healthy on the uplands. Those beautiful districts of country, neither too flat nor too hilly, and covered with magnificent forests, possessed, in the first instance, a deep vegetable mould, from rotten leaves and trees, the gathering of ages; yet, when this vegetable earth was exposed to the sun and rain, by clearing away the woods, it was not at once observed to produce disease; on the contrary, it was after this cream of the earth had been exhausted by exposure to the sun, by being burnt, by continual cultivation without rest or manure, and by washing rains; that is, after ten or twelve years of cultivation, that the unhappy change took place in its character for health. This usually occurred after the dead timber had been entirely decomposed, and had disappeared, and scarcely any thing remained to fertilize the soil by decomposition. The rapid disappearance of the vegetable surface is, in a great measure, to be ascribed to the mode of culture. Tobacco and cotton require that the ground should be kept perfectly clean, until a very late period of the year, when it has neither stubble, nor a coat of grass to protect the soil from the heavy autumnal rains. In consequence of this, where the lands are hilly and broken, or have long slopes, the finer parts of the soil are washed into the hollows, or are carried off by the streams. These deposits, consisting of sand, loam, and half-decayed vegetable matter, are obviously the cause of bilious fevers, although not of so malignant a character as those occasioned by the milldams in the midst of the oak and limestone lands. But it is in the vicinity of the old exhausted fields, where the soil has been entirely washed away, the crust of the earth broken by deep gullies, that disease appears in its most alarming forms. Whether any importance is to be attached to the idea of mineral exhalations, which is strongly supported by the instances of fevers in the canal excavations, I must leave to be determined by the scientific. It is observed, that the most elevated places in these districts are most unhealthy; probably because the miasma of the vallies rise at night and settle on the hill-tops.

The fatal character of the diseases of the country must, in part, be ascribed to improper diet, and to the disregard of prudent precautions. We are a northern race; that is, we derive our origin from the north of Europe, and are transplanted, with northern habits, into a southern climate. Our food is like that of northern countries, whereas it ought to resemble that of the inhabitants of the south of France, Spain, or Italy. It is almost universally remarked, that foreigners from those countries enjoy health, while disease is committing its ravages on all around them. The point to be attained in southern cookery is to prepare the food in such a manner as to extract its nutritive properties, and at the same time to render it of easy and quick digestion. In hot weather this process cannot be too speedily performed; the stomach is irritable and debilitated, and when loaded with food difficult of digestion, the unsuccessful efforts of nature, are followed by acidity, indigestion, head-ache, and fever. According to the southern cookery, the food is so divided by the action of fire, that the business of the stomach is already half-performed. Soups, and meats well done, (boiled or roasted, not baked,) vegetables reduced to mucilage, bread perfectly baked, together with the use of olive oil; fruits cooked, or perfectly ripe, form the diet of southern nations. They are careful not to overload the stomach, and instead of ardent spirits, drink nothing but water, or light wines. What a contrast to the ordinary fare of the descendants of our Saxon ancestors! Every man must be sensible, from his own experience, of the difference in the process of digestion in winter and in the summer, when the thermometer stands for weeks at blood-heat. In the latter case, the whole study should be to render this important process as easy and as rapid as possible. And what is the common mias of the farmers of our country? It is a piece of fat pork, half baked corn-bread, scalded cabbage leaves, collards, and sour milk; with other mixtures no less heterogeneous, and often followed by a glass of bad whiskey, or worse rum, to inflame the already irritable stomach! Place a compound like this half an hour in a vessel exposed to the sun, and then look at it through Rand's solar microscope! The unfortunate man whose stomach is worried by this mixture is soon agonized by the inflammable gas, ready to burst with flatulence; and if caught in idleness or inactivity, (for labor and constant exercise undoubtedly lessen the bad effects,) he becomes a case; and then comes the physician, often more to be dreaded than the disease. He administers calomel—it is the Sampson of medicine—by following a routine he is saved the trouble of consulting the constitution of the patient, of studying the disease, of watching symptoms, of nursing, or repetition of visits; it places the sciolist on a footing with the experienced and skilful, and takes the blame from the physician; for if the Sampson of medicine cannot cure, who can? Sound judgment, patient inquiry, and profound observation are requisite in all professions, and in none more so than in that of the physician. But the patient must do more for himself than can be done for him by any one; and he must begin by temperance and proper diet. It is lamentable to see how little attention is paid to these important preventives, and how little advanced we are in what we might suppose to be the first of all arts, the art of cookery, which is still in its rudest and most barbarous state.

The tracts of rich upland to which I have alluded, were extremely beautiful in a state of nature, as well as possessed of an uncommonly fine soil. They have a delightfully diversified surface, and by no means as hilly and broken, or rocky as the more durable lands further west, towards the mountains. They have but few steep hills, the surface for the most part presenting long and gentle slopes, clothed with noble forests. But these advantages of nature have been lost by the mode adopted for clearing and putting this fine country under cultivation, which was altogether influenced by views of temporary advantage or convenience. Few, even of the most judicious planters, looked as far before them as one short generation. It was common to assume it as a principle that the best uplands must be worn out at the end of ten or twelve years, and that they must therefore be forced to yield enough to indemnify the owner for the loss of his capital in that time. I shall not attempt to show the fallacy of this reasoning—it must be obvious to any man of reflection. But the effect of this system on the health, appearance, and ultimate prosperity of the country, has now forced itself upon the attention of every one. For the sake of economy in fencing, and for the convenience of cultivation, the planters have pursued the plan of making fields of great extent—from one to six hundred acres. In a plain, or river alluvion, where there is no washing of the soil, there is certainly an advantage in this, especially in the culture of cotton; but it must be injurious in a hilly country, particularly where the slopes are long, where the rains increase in impetus and quantity in their descent. To speak to the planter of picturesque appearance, of rural scenery, and to tell him that his country would be more beautiful by suffering the groves which crown the summits of the hills to remain untouched, or to reduce the size of his fields to twenty, or at most forty acres, leaving a judicious distribution of the native woods between the portions of cleared lands, or to convert into permanent pastures those spots which, after being cleared, show a disposition to wash rapidly—if, I say, any one were to suggest these ideas to a practical planter, he would meet with but little encouragement, if not expose himself to ridicule. If he were to suggest theories of obvious, but of somewhat remote advantage, such as the preservation of the land by rotation of crops, or by fallow, by planting trees, by horizontal ploughing, by turn rows half way down the longer slopes, he would meet with but little more encouragement from one whose maxim is that land must be worn out in ten or twelve years at any rate, and that soils which require manure are not worth the trouble of cultivation. To tell him that to strip a country of its forests, especially on its hill tops, and to open large spaces without leaving an intermixture of woods has a tendency to dry up the springs, to render the atmosphere more arid and hot, and to influence the seasons: to tell this to persons who do not consider themselves bound to the soil for more than a few years, would be equally useless. In twenty years more our population, unless arrested by the power of the Almighty, must attain to twenty-four millions—and where are the additional twelve millions to be placed? As great a population as that which now exists in the whole extent of the Union must be provided for. Their abode will certainly not be the sandy pine land of the southern sea-coast, at least it will not be in the increase of a white population in this quarter. In that short period, power and numbers will be found in the west, and what will then become of the subjects of protecting duties and internal improvement? The short period of ten years may produce an entire change in the situation, and consequently in the opinion and policy of those portions of the Union, which are now either passive, or sustain the southern views of national policy. I have sometimes thought that the worn out lands from the Potomac to Georgia, will in less than half a century, fall into the hands of the German race of Pennsylvania and Maryland, who move in a slow but solid body, with their careful and economical husbandry, laboring with their own hands, and getting rich where a southerner will starve.

The captain of a privateer writing to his owners an account of an engagement, felicitated them on the general safety of his crew, having had only one of his hands shot through the nose.

Translated from the German of Schiller, for the New-York Mirror.

THE WREATH ON THE STREAM.

A youth was crowned with a wreath of flowers,
As he sat by the river's side;
When the wreath was born by the breeze away,
And dashed in the restless tide;
And thus the course of my days rolls on,
As the stream runs swiftly by,
And my youth is a garland of summer flowers,
That is beautiful—only to die.

And ask'st thou why I am sorely sad
In green youth's early spring,
When every thing breathes of life and joy
In the time of blossoming?
The many voices which breathe around,
From earth and air and deep,
But stir the waters of bitterness,
That still in my bosom sleep.

But sorrow is writ on the brow of man,
And clouds ever rest on his way,
And the object I've twined my love about,
Though before me, is far away.
The image I see is fair and bright,
But I follow it on in vain,
The beautiful shadow illudes me still,
And the heart is left cold again.

Come hither, my loved and lovely one,
And the sheen of a palace forget;
The glows of the field still shine for thee,
And the wild flowers blossom yet.

Hark! the song of the brook as it gleams thro' the grass,
Of the bird in the branches above;
In the lowliest cottage is peace, my dear,
And happiness where there is love.

LITERARY NOTICES.

We feel pleasure in perceiving that the opinions we expressed respecting the "Dutchman's Fireside," which has passed to a fourth edition, have been corroborated by the uniform language of the English critics, who, in noticing its republication in London, speak of it in terms of high approbation. We extract the following article entire, from the last number of the Westminster Review, a publication which, though, perhaps, not quite so notorious as the Edinburgh and Quarterly, is no way inferior to either in learning, talent, and critical capacity, and far above them in manly impartiality. It is sufficiently known that these latter have long been the mouth-pieces of the two great parties of whig and tory, and that their estimate of books has too often been founded in politics, rather than in taste and judgment.

The article is written with a discriminating, scholar-like elegance, and is free from the taint of common-place puffing, as well as from that supercilious air of superiority in which some of the small fry of English critics occasionally indulge in treating of American literature, in favor of writers who, as we sometimes suspect in reading their compositions, owe at least as much of their reputation to their booksellers as to their books.

It is gratifying to those who cherish a national feeling, to perceive that Mr. Paulding, who, we have sufficient evidence in his works, has never courted the applauses of British critics by sinking his identity as an American, is thus gradually becoming known and appreciated abroad as he has long been at home. Those acquainted with his productions generally, and with that which is the subject of the article below, must be satisfied that the approbation there bestowed has not been gained by any sacrifice of principle or feeling on the part of the American writer.

(From the October Number of the Westminster Review.)

The Dutchman's Fireside. A tale, by the author of "Letters from the South," "The Backwoodsman." Two vols. post 8vo. London: Colburn and Bentley. 1831.

The author of this tale is Mr. Paulding, one of the pleasantest writers of the new world of Transatlantic-English. His style is chaste and elegant; sufficiently ornamental to be agreeable, and in no other point sinning in the prevailing sin of America, viz. exaggeration. Mr. Paulding is neither too elaborate, like Irving, nor diffuse, like Cooper, nor wild, and all but frantic, like Neal; he is just, neat, fanciful, and descriptive.

The Dutchman's Fireside has caught our attention by the interesting character of its subject, which aims at a lively representation of the manners of the early American settlers, and a contrast between the scenes then presented to the eye, and those which now meet the curious gaze of the traveler. The scenery on the Hudson is even now said alone amply to repay the voyage from Great Britain, and when first seen in its solitary beauty, it must have far exceeded that of the more classical, but scarcely faded, streams of antiquity.

We cannot enter into any account of the story of the Dutchman's Fireside, beyond saying, that it possesses much incident of an interesting nature, and a good deal of well-drawn, and well-conceived character. Incidents and character, indeed, abound in this great laboratory of fiction and romance, but we shall long look for greater freshness and originality than those which distinguish Mr. Paulding's work. Our attention has, however, been chiefly arrested by some descriptions of great interest, and some moral and social remarks, which deserve, at least, to be pointed out. It is not in every tale that fiction is set in truth, or that incidents are narrated in a style which for itself alone deserves to be rescued from oblivion.

The rapid rise of English America, where cities and towns, a civilized population, extensive commerce, and national power, have risen up as by enchantment, puts a comparison between the primitive and present state of numerous parts of the country within the grasp of a single individual's memory. Thus the contrast of what was and is, is rendered easy and accurate, and in proportion to the violence of the changes, more interesting than elsewhere. The fact of having traced the wild beast of the forest to his lair, on the very spot where now the domestic hearth is lighted up, where families are born, and all the cares as well as the blessings of social life are thickly germinated, is a reflection which strikes the rudest bosom with sensations of a pleasant wonder. The description, for instance, of an island in the Hudson, which follows, and which is as perfect a landscape as the fancy of a painter could conceive, will strike the reader with more perfect feelings of satisfaction and repose, if accompanied by the reflection that this secret little corner of beauty is now drowned and overwhelmed by the tide of civilization. That its forest trees are turned into rafters, its pastures into pavements, its savannahs into market-places, its bosquets and nooks of lonely loveliness into populous streets and squares.

"This little paradise, to speak in learned phrase, was an alluvial formation of times long past, composed of the rich spoils of the surrounding lands deposited by the river. It was level as the surface of the stream in which it was embosomed, and covered with a carpet of rich luxuriant verdure, which, when it was not pastured, yielded to the scythe a glorious harvest three times a year. On every side, and all around, the banks were fringed with light silvery foliage of water-willows mingled with tufts of wild roses, and growths of nameless wild flowers, of every hue, and various odors, and canopied at intervals with clau-bearing vines, whose long tendrils sometimes bent down, and waved to and fro on the gliding waters as they passed slowly by. Within this leafy barrier was nothing but green sward, shaded at various intervals by the vast giants of the alluvial growth—elms and plane trees, of such towering majesty, that they overlooked the gentle eminences which bounded the flats on either side. The wailing murmurs of the waters, as they glided along under the willow branches and nodding vines, mingled with the chorus of a thousand birds, who remained all summer in undisturbed possession; and though the pipe of the shepherd was never heard in these pleasant shades, it was aptly supplied by the music of harmonious nature, the murmuring waters, and the warblers of the woodlands."

A few lines, every word of which is almost a picture, describes the Sacondaga.

"Accordingly, early the next morning they embarked on the sluggish Sacondaga, the Indians in their canoe, and Bybrandt with his trusty squire in his, and paddled their way along the devious windings of the lazy solitary stream, that seemed a vast serpent asleep in the high grass that skirted its sides. After proceeding some miles, they became, as it were, lost in the pathless monotony of the vast meadows, which presented in the hazy obscurity of a cloudy day, no distinct outline or boundary. The silence all around them was as the silence of a winter's night, when the wind is hushed to a freezing calm, save that the dipping of the paddles at measured intervals was heard and scarcely heard, like the clicking of the death-watch when all else is still. Sometimes, at rare intervals, a solitary heron would raise his long neck above the grass along the stream, and make a strange discordant noise, which was echoed by the Indians in mockery, but otherwise, it was the dead form of nature; the world of sound was still, and the world of sight presented nothing but a landscape of dreary sameness, a sky of one dim unvarying shade of motionless clouds."

Is not this poetry? Can the imagination paint a deeper solitude? Does not the description steal over the senses, and oppress them drowsily, as if by opium? The reader starts as he comes to the close, and seems to shake himself, and wonder how long he has been in a state of stupor.

In the next passage we have some dubious philosophy mixed up with description. Mr. Paulding seems to lament the exceeding haste which his country has made in the race of wealth and prosperity. There may, however, be some justice in his contrast; the balance of comparative happiness, in the aggregate, is a nice question, and not to be settled in an instant. The author's view is at least a poet's.

"Who, indeed, that hath gathered from history and tradition a picture of the manners, modes, and morals of the ancient patriarchs of Albany and its neighborhood, but will be inclined to contrast them dolefully with those of the present times? Who but will sigh to behold their places usurped by gilded butterflies, ostentatious beggary, empty pretence, and paltry affectation? In the room of men independent of the smiles and frowns of bankers or bankrupts, he will find speculators glittering in their borrowed plumage for an hour or two, then passing away, leaving nothing behind them but the wrecks of their unprincipled career. Where once sat the simple magistrates, administering the few simple laws necessary to regulate the orderly community over which they presided, is now collected a body of avaricious, ignorant, visionary, or corrupt legislators, parricide their own private interests at the expense of the public good, and sacrificing the priority of one portion of the state to the grasping avidity of another. In the room of prosperous yeomanry, and independent mechanics, we behold crowds of hungry expectants, neglecting the sure and only means of competency, and begging, in the abjectness of a debased spirit, permission to sacrifice their independence for a wretched pittance, held under the wretched tenure of a man who has no will of his own. The once quiet city, where the name and the idea of political corruption was unknown, is now a whirlpool of intrigue, where empty bubbles are generated and kept a live by the agitation of the waters, and boiling and conflicting eddies gather into one focus all the avarice, and chicanery, and feignings, and worthless nothings that float upon the surface of the stormy puddle."

A comparison of the attachment felt by mountaineers and the inhabitants of the plain, is a more pleasing subject than the contrast above, and one moreover less likely to lead a poet into error.

"The river in front slept between its verdant banks, for its course was so slow, so quiet, and so almost imperceptible, that it seemed to partake in that repose which it diffused around. Beside the elms and sycamores which the rich alluvium fostered into majestic exuberance, its borders were fringed at intervals with silvery willows, drinking its pure moisture, and other dwarfish fry, from whose branches hung grape vines, and vines of various other names, forming canopies, through which the pattering shower could scarcely find its way. The stream was about a quarter of a mile wide, so that every rural sight and rural sound could be clearly distinguished from side to side; and at the extremity of the rich meadows, on the opposite shore, there rose a bold precipice of greybeard rocks, enamelled with light green mosses, and bearing on its summit a crown of towering pines of everlasting verdure."

"There is certainly in the majesty of nature, its hoary rocks, its silent shadowy glens, foaming torrents, something that awakens the soul to high contemplation, and rouses its slumbering energies. But there is in her gentler beauties, her rich and laughing meadows, enamelled with flowers, and joyous with brightly birds, her waving fields of grain, her noiseless glassy streams, a charm not less delightful, and far more lasting, than the high-wrought enthusiasm of the other. Both have, without doubt, their influence on the human character. He who dwells in the rude regions of the mountain solitude, will generally prefer dangerous and difficult enterprise to easy and wholesome labor. He would rather risk his safety for a meal, or go without it entirely, than earn it by the sweat of his brow, in the cultivation of the earth. But the inhabitants of the rich plain, that pours from its generous bosom an ample reward for every hour of labor he bestows, is enamored of security; he hates all changes but those of the revolving seasons: is seldom buffeted by extremes of passion, never elevated to enthusiasm, or depressed to despair. If left alone, his life will, probably, glide away as noiselessly, if not as pure, as the gentle stream that winds its way unheard through his lowland domain. It has been said a thousand times, that the inhabitants of mountains are more attached to their homes than those of lowlands, but I doubt the truth of the observation. Take any man away from his home, and his accustomed routine of life, and he will sigh to return to them—the native of the plain, as well as the sojourner among the hills. The former, no doubt, would be as wretched among the rocks and torrents, the wild beasts, and hunters equally wild, as the latter in the laborious quiet of the fruitful valleys."

It cannot be denied, at least, that this is very pretty writing, and that whether Mr. Paulding be a philosopher or not, he is a poet. There are, however, remarks of another kind, which prove him to be a thinker, as well as a fancier, and show that he is at least an observer who can express himself strongly; such as his remarks on the excessive length of school-hours, and the ruinous consequences of "too early and exclusive attention to learning." His reflections on courage, and the surprise he expresses that any body possesses any at all, considering that all education tends to pave the way for making cowards of us.

"The nurse begins by frightening children with stories of ghosts and hobgoblins, and making them afraid to stir in the dark; and the priest ends by frightening the man with horrible pictures of the agonies of death, and the torments of futurity."

And again,

"A bashful man is like a tiger; he makes but one effort, and if that fails slinks away to his jungle, and essays no more."

In short, we may conclude this brief notice by stating, that this tale is an exception to tales in general, and is as much worth reading for its style, its moral remarks, and veracious descriptions, as for the interest of the narrative, the striking character of its personages, but, above all, for its correct and spirited views of Red-Indian manners and morals.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE PLEASURE ISLANDS,

NOT HITHERTO DESCRIBED BY ANY TRAVELLER.

FAR out in the Pacific ocean, we came to an island of sugar, with mountains of stewed fruit, rocks of sugar-candy and barley-sugar, and rivers of syrup which intersected the country. The inhabitants, who appeared very sweet-toothed, licked the dust off the roads, and sucked their fingers after having dipped them in any of the adjoining rivers. There were also forests of licorice, and large trees whence fell abundance of sweet cakes, which the breezes were constantly puffing into the mouths of travellers.

We soon got tired of this island. So many sweets cloyed us, and we told the inhabitants that we longed for some plainer and more substantial species of food. They assured us, that there was about ten leagues off another island, where they had mines of hams, sausages, and well-seasoned ragouts, which they dug as people dig the gold mines of Peru. They said there were also rivulets of onion-sauces, that the walls of the houses were of pie-crust, and that in bad weather it rained wine of a strong body, while on fine days the morning dew resembled Greek or other white wine.

To enable us to reach this island, we caused to be placed on the quay we were about to leave, twelve men of a prodigious size, who were fast asleep, and they blew so strongly in snoring, that they filled our sails with a favorable wind. As soon as we arrived on the other island, we found on the shore merchants who wished to sell us appetites, which are often wanted amidst so many ragouts. There were people, too, who sold sleep; the price was so much an hour: but they had sleeps at all prices, according to the dreams one chose to have. The finest dreams were very dear. I demanded one of the most agreeable for my money, and, as I was fatigued, I went to rest. Before falling asleep, however, I heard a terrific noise. On inquiring its cause, they told me it was the earth opening. I thought myself lost; but they re-assured me, by informing me that it opened thus every night, at a certain hour, to vomit forth boiling rivulets of frothed chocolate, and iced liquors of all kinds. I rose in haste to taste them, and found them delicious. Afterwards I went to bed again, that I might not lose the money I had given for my dream. In my sleep I believed that I saw that every one was of crystal; that men nourished themselves with perfumes; that their usual motion was running, and their usual mode of speech singing; that they had wings to cut the air, and fins to enable them to pass through the sea.

I was hardly awake, when a seller of appetites came to ask if I wanted any hunger, and if I wished him to sell me relays of stomachs, to enable me to eat during the whole day. I accepted the proposal. For my money, he gave me twelve little taffety pouches, which I immediately put on, and which were to serve me for twelve stomachs. No sooner had I put on the pouches, than I was ready to die of hunger. I passed my day in making twelve delicious repasts; as soon as one was finished, I began another. In the evening, feeling fatigued, with having spent the day at table like a horse at his rack, I resolved to take nothing next day but fine scents. They gave me orange-flower for breakfast; and for dinner, tuberoses and Spanish heather, with jonquils for a dessert; at supper I had frankincense.

Having heard that there was in this country a very singular city, I desired to be taken thither. They put me into a little chair, very light, and garnished with large feathers; they fastened to this chair, with silk cords, four great birds, as large as ostriches, with wings proportioned to their bodies. These birds flew off, and, with the reins, I guided them towards the east, as I had been instructed. I saw high mountains at my feet; and we flew so fast, that I almost lost my breath in cutting the air. In about an hour, we arrived at the celebrated city. It is all of marble, and three times larger than Paris. The whole city is but one house. There are twenty-four great courts, every one of which is as large as the largest square in the world; and in the middle of these twenty-four courts there is a twenty-fifth, which is six times larger than any of the others. All the apartments of this house are equal, for there is no inequality of condition among the inhabitants of this city. There are neither domestics nor lower sort of people; every one serves himself; nobody is waited on; there are only wishes, which are nimble little hobgoblins, who give every one what is desired in a moment. On arriving, I received one of these spirits, who attached himself to me, and let me want for nothing. I began, ere long, to be fatigued with the new desires which this facility of gratifying them excited in me; and I learned by experience, that it was better to dispense with superfluous things, than to be unable to remain in the tranquil enjoyment of any pleasure. The inhabitants of this city were polite, gentle, and obliging. I observed that they never spoke amongst themselves; they read in each other's eyes all that they thought, just as one reads a book; and when they wished to hide their thoughts, they had only to shut their eyes. They carried me to a hall, where there was a concert of perfumes; for they unite perfumes, as we do sounds. A certain assemblage of perfumes, some powerful, others sweet, form a harmony which pleases the sense of smelling, as our concerts charm the ear, by sounds sometimes loud, and sometimes soft.

In this country the women govern the men; they decide lawsuits, they teach the sciences, and go to the wars. The men paint themselves; they remain at the toilette from morning till night; they spin, they sew, they work embroidery, and they dread being beaten by their wives when they have not obeyed them. They say, that formerly matters were conducted in a different manner, but the men, served by the wishes, became so idle and ignorant, that the women were ashamed to allow themselves to be governed by them. They assembled to repair the evils of the republic; they established schools, to which the most talented persons of their sex resorted; they disarmed their husbands, who asked no better than never to come to blows; they released them from deciding on lawsuits, watched over the public order, established laws, and caused them to be observed, and saved the country, of which the supineness and levity of the men would certainly have occasioned the total ruin.

Afflicted by this spectacle, and fatigued with so many fêtes and amusements, I concluded that the pleasures of the senses, however varied, cannot give happiness. I left these regions, in appearance so delicious, and returning home, found in a temperate life, in moderate labor, in pure morals, and in the practice of virtue, that happiness and health which I failed to obtain when all appetites and wishes were at my own control.

THE FRONTIER ROVER.

BY GEO. D. STRONG.

"A romantic love of wild independence not unfrequently induces the daring pioneer of the western frontier of the United States to recede from the intrusion of civilization, and seek a home in the untrodden region beyond him."—Letters from the West.

My hand is on the trusty rein,
My good steed snuffs the wind;
I tread the woodland's maze again,
And leave the world behind:
My course is to that distant land
Where nature's forms sublime
Peers forth in state majestic, grand
As at the birth of time!

Who scales the dizzy steep with me,
Or scours the prairie's plain,
No laggard may his courser be,
No dastard guide the rein:
For where the eagle builds his home
My trusty barb must pass,
And scorn the river's raging foam,
Nor heed the deep morass.

Rich are thy vales and vine-clad bowers,
Beloved and gallant France!
And beautiful as breeze-winged flowers
Thy maidens lead the dance.
And merry England round thy hearth
The gay and joyous throng—
Thy festal halls that wake to mirth
Are redolent of song!

Isle of the harp and shamrock, thou
Art beautiful and fair,
And beauteous pure, of lofty brow,
Thy daughters, Erin, are:
And Scotia, o'er thy storied name
Th' enthusiast lingering stands,
And marks thy bright career to fame
Amid thy mountain bands.

But lovelier far my native hills,
Where deer and panther stray;
I rove beside their gurgling rills
As reckless, free as they.

The wild hawk, as on tireless wing
He sails, in upper air,
Pauses to hear my steed's hoof ring,
And break the silence there!

When night its sable drapery throws
O'er mountain, vale, and stream,
The red man in his wigwam knows
My watchfire's lurid gleam;
For oft where white man's foot ne'er trod,
Together we would rove,
Bowing to nature's sovereign God
In gratitude and love.

One hand upon the saddle bow,
One bound—and now farewell,
Where mountain winds o'er wild flowers blow
The rover soon will dwell.
One sigh to eyes of heaven's own blue,
One glance to boyhood's home,
One pang to well tried friendship due,
And now afar I roam!

ΤΑ ΣΠΟΡΑΔΗΝ,

OR NOTICES OF ANTIQUITY, APOTHEGMS, CUSTOMS, ANECDOTES.

NUMBER TWO.

Magnificent and large as are our modern steam-vessels, they are inferior, if we may judge from description, both in size and splendor, to the vessels constructed by the kings of Egypt and Syracuse, on a scale of grandeur corresponding to the immense preparations of their sculpture and architecture. Ptolemaeus Philopater, king of Egypt, built a vessel four hundred and twenty feet long, fifty-six broad, seventy-two feet high from the keel to the top of the prow, but eighty to the top of the poop. She had four helms of sixty feet; her largest oars were fifty-six feet long, with leaden handles, so as to work more easily by the rowers; she had two prows, two sterns, seven rostra, or beaks, successively rising, and swelling out one over the other, the topmost one most prominent and stately; on the poop and prow she had figures of animals, not less than eighteen feet high; all the interior of the vessel was beautified with a delicate sort of painting, of a waxen color. She had four thousand rowers; four hundred cabin-boys, or servants; marines to do duty on the decks, two thousand eight hundred and twenty; with an immense store of arms and provisions. The same prince built another ship, called the Thalamegus, or Bedchamber-ship, which was only used as a pleasure yacht, for sailing up and down the Nile. She was not so long as the preceding, but more splendid in the chambers, and their furnishings. Hiero, king of Syracuse, built an enormous vessel, which he intended for a corn-trader; her length is not given. She was built at Syracuse, by a Corinthian ship-builder, and was lanced by an apparatus devised by Archimedes. All her bolts and nails were of brass; she had twenty rows of oars; her apartments were all paved with neat square variegated tiles, on which there was painted all the story of Homer's Iliad. She had a gymnasium, with shady walks, on her upper decks; garden-plots, stocked with various plants, and nourished with limpid water that flowed circulating round them in a canal of lead. She had, here and there on deck, arbors mantled with ivy and vine-branches, which flourished in full greenness, being supplied with the principle of growth from the leaden canal. She had one chamber particularly splendid, whose pavement was of agates and other precious stones, and whose pannels, doors, and roofs, were of ivory, and wood of the thya-tree. She had a school-sterium, or library, with five couches, its roof arched into a potus, or vault, with the stars embossed; she had a bath, with its accompaniments all most magnificent; she had on each side of her deck ten stalls for horses, with fodder and furnishings for the grooms and riders; a fish-pond of lead, full of fish, whose waters could be let out or admitted at pleasure; she had two towers on the poop, two on the prow, and four in the middle, full of armed men, that managed the machines, invented by Archimedes, for throwing stones of three hundred pounds weight, and arrows eighteen feet long, to the distance of a furlong. She had three masts, and two antennae, or yards, that swung with hooks and masses of lead attached. She had, round the whole circuit of her deck, a rampart of iron, with iron crows, which took hold of ships, and dragged them nearer, for the purpose of destroying them. The tunnels or bowls on her masts were of brass, with men in each. She had twelve anchors and three masts. It was with difficulty they could find a tree large and strong enough for her highest mast. Great Britain—an ominous circumstance for the superiority of British oak!—had the glory of bestowing upon her a sufficient tree for that purpose; it was discovered amid the recesses of Albion's forests by a swineherd. What is remarkable in the construction of this gigantic vessel is, that her sentina, though extremely large and deep, was emptied by one man, by means of a pump invented by Archimedes. Hiero, on finding that the Syracusan was too unwieldy to be admitted with safety into the harbors of Sicily, made a present of her to Ptolemy, who changed her name to the Alexandrian. We may add, as a panegron to this long tale of a ship, that Archimedes, the Greek epigrammatist, wrote a little poem on the large vessel, which was rewarded by Hiero with one thousand measures of corn—a premium proportioned, if not to the poem, at least to the magnitude of the theme celebrated.

CRITICA SACRA.

AN INQUIRY CONCERNING AARON'S BEARD.

(From the Edinburgh Literary Journal.)

I REMEMBER, when a boy, that I thought, "lead us not into temptation," meant neither more nor less than a direct allusion to the "teetotum," with which the fate of various large and small pins were determined. I have some recollection likewise of mistaking the phrase, "he took up this parable, and said," for "he took up the sparable, and said;" as if that small headless nail had been the thing taken up previous to the saying mentioned. The "chief priests of the Jews," I read the "thief priests;" and "he died in a good old age," was to me, he expired in a good old egg. Such things were to me in my infancy; but since I attained the age of manhood, I have never heard of such a mistake so firmly and pertinaciously supported as the following:

A conversation took place, in the presence of some divines, or established clergymen of the church of Scotland, together with a sprinkling of learned and distinguished professors, respecting beards. It was alleged by a venerable and critical individual of the party, that Knox's beard must have been somewhat lengthy; but it was at the same time affirmed, that, long as it was, it was nothing to that of Aaron, which descended even to the skirts of his garments. An individual questioned immediately and directly the longitude of the beard mentioned, in consequence of which an appeal was made to the text.

Now the text, according to the verse translation sung in our churches, is as follows:

"Behold how good a thing it is,
And how becoming well,
Together such as brethren are
In unity to dwell.
Like precious ointment on the head,
That down the beard did flow,
Even Aaron's beard, and to the skirts
Did of his garments go." Vide Psalm 133.

It being evident from this version that it was not the beard, but the ointment, which reached the skirts of the garments of the chief priest, recourse was had to the prose translation in the Old Testament, which, as far as the beard is concerned, runs thus:—"It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard; that went down to the skirts of his garments." Here a triumph was proclaimed by the advocate of beards, he very knowingly concealing the semicolon, which shows, at least, the opinion of Dr. Hardinge, Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Holland, Dr. Billy, Mr. Smart, Mr. Pratt, and Mr. Farcellane, (translators, at Oxford, of the Hagiography,) upon this subject.

Being driven from this point, the advocate of five-and-a-half foot beards took refuge in the "Septuagint," which runs thus:

Ὁς μὲν ἐπὶ κεφαλῇ κατὰ χάριν ἐπὶ πύλαις τοῦ πυλῶνος τοῦ Ἀαρὼν, τὸ κατὰ χάριν, &c.

Here the accuracy of the Greek translation of the ancient Hebrew triumphed, with its "TO," over every doubt; but the enemy was not thus suddenly to be dislodged, so recourse was had to the Vulgate, which runs thus:

"Sicut unguentum in capite quod descendit in barbam, barbam Aaron, quod descendit," &c.

These "quods" again ousted the opponent, who now appealed to the old English translations of the Bible. The following hereupon were produced:

"Cranmer's Bible, 1566."

"Behold how good and joyful a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity; like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down unto the beard, even unto Aaron's beard, and went down to the skirts of his garments."

"Bishop's Bible, 1572," the same.

After a long and warm altercation, an appeal was at last made to the original Hebrew, and to a learned professor of that language, whose written document in answer is couched in the following words:

"Dear Sir—I have examined, in the original, the passages to which you allude; it gives you no farther assistance than the English translation does, in determining the point. The term for ointment is masculine, and that for the beard appears to be common to both genders; the ו for וְ translated that, is indeclinable and common, and the verb is masculine. There appears, therefore, to be nothing in the grammatical structure of the passage determining precisely whether that refers to the first or last of the two terms. Yours, truly," &c.

Hereupon the advocate of "beards" assumed a new position, and began to crow accordingly, when the following reasoning on the nature of the passage was submitted.

It is evident, that the length or breadth of Aaron's beard is not the subject of assertion or illustration, but the advantage and beauty of unanimity amongst "brethren," in particular. This is illustrated by two comparisons; the first is "ointment," poured, according to the Jewish custom, on the head, and then flowing or descending over the whole person, "ad imos talos;" the second is, "the dew of Hermon," which descendeth upon Mount Zion, in consequence of which, a blessing is commanded by God. In the next place, it is physically impossible that any beard whatever could grow so long as to reach the ground, from the elevation of the chin of an ordinarily sized man. In fact, beards after shooting out to ten or twelve inches, get roughened, and split in the extremities of the hairs, and no power of oil, or combing, will induce them to descend farther. And, in the last place, had Aaron's beard (as his garments were flowing, descended to the skirts thereof, he must have provided himself, (as they do in some countries with regard to the tails of sheep) with a little cart or waggon, with a view of pushing along this immense redundancy of chin ornament.

Now, Sir Editor, that you have heard the cause stated, give your own opinion, or ask at Dr. Brown, of Eskdalemuir, "Did the beard of Aaron reach to the skirts of his garments, or did it not?" I please for a reply.

ANTIBARBATUS.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have never, like the Emperor Julian, written of misopogon; we are neither professedly nor practically, a beard-hater, yet we have no patience with so preposterous a beard as our learned correspondent's learned friend would give to the Jewish high priest. The scope of the comparison in the original is evidently to this effect:—"The mutual friendship of brothers is like the precious ointment with which the high priest was anointed, and which, being poured upon the head, flowed copiously down his beard, and dropped upon his garments, communicating its agreeable odor to his whole person." Thus Buchanan in his paraphrase:

balsamum, &c.
—Imbre læto prolucens barbam et sinus,
Limbis pererrat aureum.

Thus also the French:—"Une huile précieuse repandue sur la tête qui descend sur la barbe d'Aaron, et qui découle sur l'ouverture de la-haut de ses vêtements." The Spanish, indeed, mentions,—

"barba muy crecida," and has only a comma after Aaron; but the Portuguese decidedly support the common reading,—"Oleo, &c. cahe sobre toda a barba, &c. e vem descendo até á extremidade," (Pereira's Tr.) We need not quote Martini's Italian version, since it is literal from the Vulgate. Diodati, the most faithful and elegant of Italian translators, expresses himself decidedly against the beard advocate; "Come l'olio eccellente, &c. il quale gli scende, &c. e poi cola infino al lembo, &c. &c." In short, all authority seems unfavorable to the beard. Nevertheless, since the Hebrew is doubtful, our friend's friend may possibly be right, though the general sense of mankind is against him. In justice to him, we may hint, that what our translation calls the "skirts of his garments," need not signify the lower extremities. Poole on the passage says "per oram" (this is the literal translation of the Hebrew word) intellige foramen illud cui inditur collum, vel supremam vestium partem, cui barba incumbet." On the beard supposition, therefore, this ornament of Jewish priesthood need have been of no such inadmissible length as our correspondent supposes. But our own ex cathedra opinion is for the ointment.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND MATTHEW P. WELLS.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1831.

TO THE PATRONS OF THE EUTERPEAD.

Circumstances having rendered it expedient to discontinue the publication of the Euterpead, arrangements have been made for uniting its subscription list with that of the New-York Mirror. Those, therefore, who have heretofore patronized the former paper, are respectfully requested to transfer their support to the latter, which will be sent to all who signify their acquiescence in this arrangement.

All persons indebted to the Euterpead, are requested to settle their accounts without delay, as the undersigned is desirous of closing the concern with all convenient expedition. Those who have paid in advance, to the present proprietor, and not wishing to receive the Mirror as a substitute, shall have their money refunded for the six months' subscription due. J. ROBINSON.

Winter—fuel—the poor.—The present extremely high price of coal has elicited general complaint. Few, at a glance, can realize the immense mass of suffering, even already experienced in consequence of this, by the poorer classes of our population; and, it is well known that, during the most inclement period of the last winter, wood could only be procured at a most exorbitant price. The season is unusually premature and severe, as well as sickly; and, when we consider the horrors of cold added to those of disease, and all the evils attendant on poverty, we shudder to reflect on the privations and miseries to which many of our fellow citizens are exposed. If this were the mere result of accidental circumstances, it would be but the urgent duty of those in affluence to unite in affording relief to the poor. There are hundreds of laborers who earn no more than a dollar a day. Wood last winter was nearly, if not quite, six dollars a load, which was consumed in a week. Several wretched families came even under our own observation, totally destitute of fire in the bleak wintry nights, when the wealthy themselves complained by their blazing hearths, and in the midst of their listed doors and curtained windows. By the way, a touching and powerfully painted picture of a destitute family in such a situation may be found in the last volume of the Sketches from the Diary of a Physician, in that one entitled "Rich and Poor." We recommend it to the perusal of every reader.

Several of the aldermen propose that the corporation should petition congress to remove the duty upon Liverpool coal. Something should certainly be done.

We have heard it rumored that certain persons were employed in seeking wood wherever they could find any, and laying up large quantities for the purpose of selling it again at greatly advanced prices. The destitute may, indeed, turn their eyes to Providence when thus sorely beset with enemies, whose influence, though they themselves are unseen, is spread over them with unrelenting cruelty. It is very certain that splendid fortunes may be amassed by the prime movers in such unprincipled operations; and even readers, the most inexperienced in mercantile matters, need scarcely be informed of how many millions the laboring classes of commercial cities, especially London, are swindled out of by means of those wicked speculators. It proves little or nothing respecting the morals of a community that these attempts of individuals to enrich themselves unjustly, at the expense of others, should sometimes occur, but that they should occur with impunity would be a rebuke to the character of that part of our citizens who are contented to make money without wrenching it from the slender and hard-earned pittance of the wretched.

"I had rather drop my blood,
And coin my heart for drachmas, than to wring
From the hard hands of peasants, their vile trash
By any indirection."

But we fear the days of Brutus, like those of chivalry, are gone forever.

This is the first winter month. If already the difficulty of obtaining every species of fuel is sending many a despairing family shivering to bed, what are they to do as the season advances?—What will become of those unfortunate beings found in that dark and vast sphere of anguish explored by Mathew Carey—beings, who in the softest months of summer could scarcely struggle on from day to day?

We trust that our fellow citizens will inquire into the actual nature of the evil, and adopt some measures for ameliorating it.

Recent Publications.—Under the title of the "Annual Remembrancer," T. Ash, of Philadelphia, has published a neat little pocket companion for the ladies. Also "The Pearl, or Affection's Gift," an appropriate and handsome present for the young of both sexes.

"The History of ancient and Modern Greece"—illustrated with maps and copperplate engravings, edited by John Frost. A handsome octavo from the press of Lincoln and Edmands, Boston. This edition is intended not only for libraries, but for schools, academies, and colleges.

Carey and Lea, of Philadelphia, have published another volume of their valuable Cabinet Cyclopædia, containing biographical sketches of Sir Thomas Moore, Cardinal Wolsey, Archbishop Cranmer, and Lord Burleigh.

"A Memoir of the Life of Daniel Webster," by Samuel L. Knapp. Stimpson and Clapp, Boston.—The author of this well-executed duodecimo has completed his task with much ability. The volume is ornamented with a portrait of the American orator.

Peabody & Co. have issued a new series of caricatures, called the "Comic Sketch Book," designed and drawn by that prince of merry fellows, Henry J. Finn.

Poetry.—The following volumes of poetry have lately been announced as in the course of publication:—"A Collection of Fugitive pieces," by William C. Bryant; a work of the same description, by Dr. James G. Percival; "Manoka, an Indian Tale," by Willis G. Clarke; the "Last Night of Pompeii," in three cantos, by Sumner L. Fairfield; and "Fashionable Satires," by Arthur Craignell, gent.

Indians.—More than two hundred Indians, men, women and children, of the Seneca tribe, lately passed through Dayton, Ohio, on their way to the west of the Mississippi. They are from the Lewistown Reserve, recently purchased of them for the United States.

St. Thomas's church.—The Rev. Francis L. Hawkes has accepted a call to become Rector of St. Thomas's church in this city.

GRENADIER,

A BALLAD—WRITTEN BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY—ARRANGED BY T. MILLAR.

SECOND VERSE—Annette flew to welcome him home,
But he turn'd from the maid with disdain:
"False girl, I suppose you are come
To jeer me, and laugh at my pain;
Since scandal has blotted your name,
I deem you unworthy a tear;

I've been told by an elderly dame,
That you live with your own grenadier!"
"Grenadier! did you say? did you say grenadier?"
"Yes—I'm told by an elderly dame,
That you live with your own grenadier."
"O dear! O dear!"

THIRD VERSE—Quoth pretty Annette, "do you dare
To call me inconstant and frail?
Feware, master William, beware.
How you trump up an old woman's tale:
"Tis true, when such stories are told,
We should not believe half that we hear:

Yet, I own, that my granny is old.
So I live with my own granny dear!"
"Granny dear! did you say? did you say granny dear?"
"Yes—I own that my granny is old,
So I live with my old granny dear."
"My dear! my dear!"

THE LATE EMPEROR PAUL OF RUSSIA.

Travelling through a forest, with marsh on each side of the road, he recollected some reason for going back, and ordered the driver to turn. He did not do so instantly, and Paul repeated the order. "In a moment," the man replied; "here the road is too narrow." Paul flew in a passion, jumped out of the carriage, and called to an equerry to stop the driver and chastise him. The equerry endeavored to allay the storm by assurances that the carriage would turn as soon as possible. "You are a scoundrel as well as he," was the reply; "he shall turn, even though he break my neck; at all hazard he shall do as I bid, the moment I give the order." Meanwhile the coachman had done so, but too late to save himself from a sound beating.

He ordered a horse that stumbled under him to be starved. On the eighth day word was brought him of the animal's death; to which he merely answered, "Good." The same accident happened after his accession in the streets of Petersburg, on which he got off, made his equerries hold a court-martial, and sentenced the offending beast to receive a hundred blows with a stick, which were immediately inflicted in presence of the czar and the people. Worse anecdotes might be found. His passion for the strict observance of military minutiae has been often mentioned. One day, as he exercised his regiment of cuirassiers, an officer's horse fell. Paul ran to the spot in a fury: "Get up, you rascal!"—"I cannot, sire—my leg is broken." Paul spit upon him, and walked away swearing.

Coming down a street, the emperor saw a nobleman who had stopped to look at some workmen planting trees by his order. "What are you doing?" said he. "Merely seeing the men work," replied the nobleman. "Oh! is that your employment. Take off his pelisse and give him a spade. There—now work yourself!" Once, when he met an officer going to the palace, wrapped in his cloak, a servant following with his sword, he gave the servant his master's commission, and reduced the officer to the ranks.

A lady, wife of a general in the army, hastening into St. Petersburg, from the country, to procure medical advice for her sick husband, passed the czar inadvertently, and was immediately arrested and sent to prison. Alarm and anxiety threw her into a burning fever, which terminated in madness; and her husband died from the same causes, and for want of proper care and attendance. On being presented to Paul, it was necessary to drop plump on your knees, with force enough to make the floor ring as if a musket had been grounded, and to kiss his hand with energy sufficient to certify to all present the honor which you had just enjoyed. Prince George Galetz in was placed under arrest for kissing his hand too negligently. When enraged he lost all command of himself, which sometimes gave rise to very curious scenes. In one of his famous passions, flourishing his cane, he struck by accident the branch of a large lustre, and broke it; whereupon he commenced a serious attack, from which he did not relax until he had entirely demolished his brittle antagonist.

NEW-YORK ANTIQUITIES.

HISTORY OF THE OLD STUYVESANT MANSION.

BY S. WOODWORTH.

THE rising generation, in the city of New-York, those who have not yet attained to the respectable age of eighteen, have, by coming on the stage too late, missed the enjoyment of many privileges and pleasures of which we, their seniors, have freely partaken. Few, very few of them, can ever boast of having skated on "Stuyvesant's meadows" in the winter, or of catching gully-fish for bait, in the little gullies and creeks which meandered through them, in summer; both of which we have done, "many a time, and oft," we regret to confess, when we ought to have been at church.

But, oh! the fleetness of human enjoyments, and the mutability of all sublunary things! A spirit (of what character we will not attempt to say—whether it bring "airs from heaven, or blasts from" the other place, belongs to wiser heads than ours to determine—but a spirit of "questionable shape") has stalked through this city with giant strides, and laid waste almost every thing that bore the features of antiquity. Some of our sapient editors call it "the spirit of public improvement." There is certainly much virtue in a name; but a rose—"the proverb is somewhat musty," and we were speaking of "Stuyvesant's meadows," over which, at the present time, floats a combination of odors somewhat different from the otto of roses.

We have said "over which," for where, alas! are now the meadows alluded to? Buried—like the portly person of their original proprietor—buried, "fathoms deep," beneath earth to which they were ever before strangers! They once stretched their verdant surface between a number of sloping eminences, on the summit of one of which, was erected, about the year 1660, the country-seat or mansion-house of his excellency, Peter Stuyvesant, the last Dutch governor of the province, now called New-York. This edifice is still standing; but owing to the march of improvement, it appears to totter on its ancient base, for the earth around it having been removed to fill up the adjacent valleys and hollows, it now presents the appearance exhibited in the engraving* in the next column. The north-east corner, it will be seen, has actually been undermined, and fallen down from the commencement of the second story. The building is an oblong square, of brick painted yellow, comprising two stories, with a hipped or gambrel roof. It has two fronts, one facing the west, the other overlooking the East river. The latter is the one here presented, it being a south-east view of the house. Its site may be found on a map of the city, a little east of the point where the First Avenue and Fifteenth-street intersect each other. It is still occupied, we believe, but whether by any of the Stuyvesant family, we are not informed.

Peter Stuyvesant, the last Dutch governor of this country, entered on his administration the twenty-seventh day of May, in the year 1647. The inroads and claims upon his government kept him constantly employed. New-England, as well as Maryland, alarmed his fears by their rapid increase; and, at the same time, Long-Island was claimed for the dowager of Sterling. The Swedes, too, were continually encroaching upon Delaware. They took the Dutch fort Casimir, now called New-Castle; but it was re-taken four years afterwards by an expedition from this city, commanded by Stuyvesant in person. Another four years brought fresh trouble from the Maryland claims; and no sooner were they settled, than new encroachments were made by New-England. Of all these difficulties Stuyvesant informed his masters at length, in a letter, dated the twenty-first of July, 1661, in which he also mentions that the king of England had been solicited to invade their territories.

Early in the year 1664, having first made a treaty with the states-general, the merry monarch, Charles II., in a fit of good humor, gave the whole province, then possessed by the Dutch, in America, to his brother James, Duke of York, his heirs and assigns, &c. Of this, the duke, being in want of money, sold all that part which includes the present state of New Jersey, to two of his bon comrades, Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret. The remaining part of the grant, now the state of New-York, was so called in honor of the duke; and as Carteret's family came originally from the isle of Jersey, he named his recent purchase New-Jersey.

But it sometimes requires more than two persons to consummate a bargain. In the present case, Governor Stuyvesant, who perhaps had not been consulted on the subject, though he well knew that the negotiation was on foot, signified his resolution to hold on to the premises, and not "budge a single hair." The consequence was, that Charles had to dispatch an armed force to subdue the country, and give his brother possession, consisting of four vessels of forty or fifty guns each; having on board about four hundred soldiers. This alarming fact was communicated to the burgomasters in council, by Governor Stuyvesant, on the eighth of July, who ordered the fort to be immediately put in the best possible state of defence. The hostile squadron, after touching at Boston to solicit assistance, which they did not immediately obtain, arrived in the harbor of New-York on the twenty-sixth of August. The governor thereupon dispatched a polite note to the English commanders, desiring to know the reason of their approach; to which Colonel Nichols returned an answer the following day, with a summons to surrender on easy and honorable terms.

Stuyvesant promised a reply the next morning; and, in the mean time, convened the council and burgomasters. He was a brave soldier, had lost a leg in the service of his country, and was desirous of defending the place by all the means in his power. He, therefore, refused to make known the liberal terms of the summons either to the inhabitants or the burgomasters, lest they might be induced to capitulate. The people were called together at the stadt-house, in Dock, now Pearl-street, at the corner of Coenties [Coutessis] lane, and informed of the governor's refusal to give up the place. On the second of September, the burgomasters came into council, and demanded to see the summons, which Stuyvesant, in a fit of anger, tore to pieces. Upon this they protested against the act, and all its consequences. But on the following day our gallant veteran, having resolved on a vigorous resistance, sent the British commissioners a long letter, vindicating the justice of the Dutch claims to the territories which they occupied in this country, and his determination to support them.

In the mean time, however, the terms offered to the governor were published throughout the country by the English themselves, in a proclamation encouraging the people to submit, and promising them all the privileges of British subjects. This device had the desired effect; and the honest governor, being thus invaded by a foreign enemy, and not only deserted, but even threatened by those on whose friendship and assistance he had depended, perceiving that resistance would only occasion the wanton effusion of human blood, finally agreed to the appointment of certain distinguished citizens to meet the British commissioners, and conclude a treaty for the surrender of the colony. This instrument, which comprised twenty-three articles of the most liberal nature towards the Dutch, was soon ratified and signed by both parties, when the English standard floated over the battlements of Fort Amsterdam, which name was changed to that of Fort Charles, and subsequently to Fort George.

The terms of capitulation were so satisfactory to the people, that very few of them left the country in consequence of its change of masters. "Even Governor Stuyvesant himself," says the authentic historian from whom we have gathered and condensed these facts, "ended his days in peace on his own estate, situated about a mile and a half eastward of the city-hall—[it is about two miles due north-east]—which said estate is now possessed [1726] by Nicholas and Peter Stuyvesant, and their two sisters, the ladies of General Nicholas Fish and of Benjamin Winthrop, his descendants of the fifth generation."

But another historian, if not more authentic, at least more facetious, alludes to this estate in the following humorous manner. Most of our readers will readily recognize the style of "Knickerbocker's History of New-York."

"No sooner had that high-mettled cavalier (Peter Stuyvesant) signed the articles of capitulation, than, determined not to witness the humiliation of his favorite city, he turned his back on its walls, and made a growling retreat to his 'bowery,' or country-seat, which was situated about two miles off, where he passed the remainder of his days in patriarchal retirement. There he enjoyed that tranquillity of mind which he had never known amid the distracting cares of government, and tasted the sweets of absolute and uncontrolled authority, which his factious subjects had so often dashed with the bitterness of opposition.

"No persuasion could ever induce him to revisit the city—on the contrary, he would always have his great arm-chair placed with its back to the window which looked in that direction, until a thick grove of trees, planted by his own hand, grew up and formed a screen that effectually excluded it from the prospect. He railed continually at the degenerate innovations and improvements introduced by the conquerors—forbade a word of their detested language to be spoken in his family—a prohibition readily obeyed, since none of the household could speak any thing but Dutch—and even ordered a fine avenue to be cut down in front of his house because it consisted of English cherry trees!"**

"The good old Dutch festivals—those periodical demonstrations of an overflowing heart and a thankful spirit, which are falling into sad disuse among my fellow-citizens, were faithfully observed in the mansion of Governor Stuyvesant. New-year was truly a day of open-handed liberality, of jocund revelry, and warm-hearted congratulation—when the bosom seemed to swell with genial good fellowship, and the plenteous table was attended with an unceremonious freedom, and honest broad mouthed merriment, unknown in these days of degeneracy and refinement."**

"His remains were deposited in the family vault, under a chapel, which he had piously erected on his estate, and dedicated to St. Nicholas, and which was on the identical spot at present occupied by St. Mark's church, where his tomb-stone is still to be seen. His estate, 'or bowery,' as it was called, has ever continued in the possession of his descendants, who, by the uniform integrity of their conduct, and their strict adherence to the customs and manners that prevailed in the 'good old times,' have proved themselves worthy of their illustrious ancestor. Many a time and oft has the farm been haunted at night, by enterprising money-diggers, in quest of pots of gold, said to have been buried by the old governor—though I cannot learn that any of them have ever been enriched by their researches—and who is there among my native-born fellow-citizens, that does not remember, when, in the mischievous days of his boyhood, he conceived it a great exploit to rob 'Stuyvesant's orchard' on a holiday afternoon?"

Thus far our extracts. Now, these are interesting facts, pleasantly related; and some ten summers ago, when we were in the habit, "for our health's sake," of rising at an early hour to take a stroll with a friend out to "Burnt-mill Point," to pick mushrooms for our table, we well remember speculating on the probable object of those verdant mounds of earth which abounded in that part of the country, and which were evidently the result of manual labor. Our friend thought them to be the remains of revolutionary entrenchments; but we attributed them to the researches of money-diggers, and still believe that opinion to be correct. This region, however, is no longer country. It is intersected with streets and avenues, and cut up into squares, like a checker-board. The city has extended in that direction till the Stuyvesant mansion is no longer out of town; and, were the old governor still living, it would be difficult to place his great arm-chair in any position that would not afford him some prospect of this growing Babel.

Should any of our readers feel a curiosity to visit this venerable ruin before its final destruction takes place, which is an event that must shortly happen, their most pleasant route would be up the Bowery and Third Avenue to Stuyvesant-street; then down the latter to the First Avenue, where they will find themselves within three hundred yards of the building. Allen-street affords a more direct course, but not so pleasant.

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

THE SUBSTANCE OF A DIARY OF SICKNESS.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

ONE fine forenoon in the early days of May, a few years since, I left my books, after a confinement of several hours, and looking up to find the course of the wind, started upon one of those rapid walks in its very eye which are so peculiarly a refreshment after the closeness of a shut room. A moist, steady breeze came from the south-west, driving before it the white fragments of the dispersed clouds. The air was elastic and clear. A freshness that entered freely at every pore was coming up, mingled with the profuse scents of grass and flowers. The colors of the new, tender foliage, were particularly soothing to an eye pained with close attention, and the just perceptible murmur of the drops shaken from the trees, and the peculiarly soft rustle of the wet leaves, made as much music as a relaxed mind could relish. Altogether it was one of those rarely tempered days when every sense is satisfied, and the mind is content to lie still with its common thoughts, and simply enjoy. I strode on with an exhilarating vigor and elasticity of step. Every muscle was freely and strongly swelled, and every nerve vibrated sensibly with pleasure.

I had proceeded, perhaps a mile—my forehead and neck bared to the wind—my coat thrown open, and the blood, from the combined effects of exercise, and the raw damp atmosphere, glowing in my cheek with the most vivid color of health, when I saw coming towards me, with a feeble and slow step, a patient from a private hospital. He was a man apparently in middle life, but wasted by sickness to extreme emaciation. His lip was colorless, his skin dry and white, and his sunken eyes had that expression of inquiring earnestness which comes always with impatient sickness. He raised his head and looked steadily at me as I came on. My lips were open, and my whole air must have been that of a man in the enjoyment of the most energetic animal vigor. I was just against him, striding past with a springing step, when, with his eye still fixed on me, he half turned, and in a tone of inexpressible meaning exclaimed, "Merciful heaven! how well he is!" I passed on, with his voice still ringing in my ear. "How well he is," haunted me like a tone in the air. It was repeated in the sound of my tread, in the panting of my heart. I felt it in the beating of the strong pulse in my temples. As if it was strange that I should be so well! I had never before realized that it could be otherwise. It seemed impossible to me that my strong limbs could fail me, or the pure blood I felt bounding so bravely through my arteries could be reached and tainted by disease. How should sickness come? If I ate, would it not nourish me? If I slept, would it not rest me? If I came out in the pure, free air, would not my lungs heave, and my muscles spring, and my face feel the refreshment? I threw out my arm for the first time in my life with a doubt of its strength. I clenched my hand unconsciously with a fear that it would not obey. I drew a deep breath, to feel if it was difficult to breathe; and even my strong step, that was as firm then as a giant's, seemed, to my excited imagination, already to have become decrepid and feeble.

I walked on, and thought of death. I had never before done so definitely. It was like a terrible shape that had always pursued me dimly, but which I had never before turned and looked steadily on. Strange! that we can live so constantly with that threatening hand hung over us, and not think of it always! Strange! that we can use a limb, or enter with interest into any pursuit of time, when we know that our continued life is almost a daily miracle!

But how difficult is it to realize death! How difficult is it to believe that the hand with whose every vein you are familiar, will ever lose its motion and its warmth! that the quick eye, which is so restless now, will settle and grow dull! that the refined lip, which now shrinks so sensitively from defilement, will not feel the earth lying upon it, and the tooth of the feeding worm! that the free breath will be choked, and the forehead be pressed heavily on by the decaying coffin, and the light and air of heaven be shut quite out, and this very body, warm and breathing and active as it is now, will not feel uneasiness or pain! I could not help looking at my frame as these thoughts crowded on me, and I confess I almost doubted my own convictions—there were so much strength and quickness in it—my hand opened so freely, and my nostrils expanded with such a satisfied thirst to the moist air. Ah! it is hard to believe that we must die! harder still to believe and realize the repulsive circumstances that follow that terrible change. It is a bitter thought at the lightest.

At the time I speak of, my health had been always unbroken. Since then I have known sickness in many forms, and have had, of course, more time and occasion for the contemplation of death. I have never known resignation. With my utmost energy, I have merely been able to look upon it with quiet despair, as a terrible, unavoidable evil. Twice I have believed its approach certain—once under the miserable and depressing exhaustion of a long illness, and once in perfect, unshaken health. In the first instance, after severe suffering for weeks, I overheard the physician telling my mother that I must die, and from that moment the thought never left me. A thin line of light came in between the shutters of the south window, and with this one thought fastened on my mind, I lay and watched it, day after day, as it passed with its imperceptible progress over the folds of my curtains. The last faint gleam of sunset never faded from its damask edge without an inexpressible sinking of my heart, and a belief that I should see its pleasant light no more. I turned from it when even imagination could find it no more there, and felt my pulse, and lifted my head to try my remaining strength. And then every object, yes, even the meanest, grew unutterably dear to me—my pillow, and the cup with which my lips were moistened, and the cooling amber which I held in my hand and pressed to my burning lips when the fever was on me—everything that was connected with life, and that would remain among the living when I was gone.

It is strange, but with all this clinging to the world, my affection for the living decreased sensibly. I grew selfish in my weakness. I could not bear that they should go from my chamber into the fresh air, and have no fear of sickness and no pain. It seemed unfeeling that they did not stay and breathe the close atmosphere of my room—at least, till I was dead. How could they walk round so carelessly, and look on a fellow-creature dying helplessly and unwillingly, and never shed a tear! And then the passing courtesies exchanged with the family at the door, and the quickened step on the sidewalk, and the wandering looks about my room, even while I was answering with my difficult breath their cold inquiries! there was an inhuman carelessness in all this which stung me to the soul.

I craved sympathy as I did life, and yet I doubted it all. There was not a word spoken by the friends who were admitted to see me that I did not ponder over when they were gone, and always with an impatient dissatisfaction. The tone and the manner, and the expression of face, all seemed forced, and often, in my earlier sickness, when I had pondered for hours on the expressed sympathy of some one I had loved, the sense of utter helplessness which crowded upon me, with my conviction of their insincerity, quite overcame me. I have lain, night after night, and looked at my indifferent watchers; and oh, how I hated them for their careless ease and their snatched moments of repose! I could scarce keep from dashing aside the cup which they came to give me so sluggishly. There was such a cold cruelty in their eating and sleeping in the presence of a dying man!

It is singular that with all our experience of sickness, we do not attend more to these slight circumstances. It can scarce be conceived how an ill-managed light, or a suppressed whispering, or the gratification of a healthy appetite, in the presence of one whose senses are so sharpened, and whose mind is so sensitive as a sick man's, irritate and annoy him. And perhaps, more than all these to bear, is the affectedly subdued tone of condolence. I remember nothing which I endured so impatiently.

I think I would rather die untended in the open air, than be abandoned to a professed nurse. There is something horrible in their cold, unfeeling assiduities. They are always old, and you cannot forget, when their skinny hands touch you, how many have taken their nauseous medicine from them, and died, leaving no impression on their minds, but that their hiring services were ready for another. Oh! to hear the same unvaried monotone, drilled by the wear of years to an unconscious and wretched imitation of feeling, asking the same eternal questions, hour after hour—to watch the recurrence of the same vulgar personal habits—to see the same withered, wrinkled face leaning over you in offices for which the ministry of angels were scarce delicate enough—to shrink from the habitual touch of their dry fingers to your pulse—to see them tasting, with their yellow lips, the delicacies sent you, or handling the cup from which you are presently to drink, without the power to utter a word of the disgust that is smothering your very heart within you—this is what the sick sometimes suffer, when their friends think they have done all they could do for their comfort.

I awoke on the second morning after the hope of my recovery had been abandoned. There was a narrow sunbeam lying in a clear crimson line across the curtain, and I lay and watched the specks of lint sailing through it, like silver-winged insects, and the thin dust, quivering and disappearing on its definite limit, in a dream of wonder. I had thought not to see another sun, and my mind was still fresh with the expectation of an immediate change. I could not believe that I was alive. The dizzy throb in my temples was done. My limbs felt cool and refreshed; my mind had that feeling of transparency which is so common after healthful and sweet sleep, and an indefinite sensation of pleasure was trembling in every nerve. I thought that this might be death, and that with this exquisite feeling of repose I was to linger thus consciously with the body till the last day; and I dwelt on it pleasantly with my delicious freedom from pain. I felt no regret for life—none for a friend even, or my passionate pursuits. I was willing—quite willing to lie thus for ages. Presently the physician entered. He came and laid his fingers on my pulse, and his face brightened. "You will get well," he said, and I heard it almost without emotion. Gradually, however, the love of life returned, and as I realized it fully, and all the thousand cords that bound me to it vibrated once more, the tears came thickly to my eyes, and a crowd of delightful thoughts pressed cheerfully and glowingly on me. I will not attempt a description of my succeeding feelings. No language can do justice to the pleasure of convalescence from extreme sickness. The first step upon the living grass, the first breath of the free air, the first unsuppressed salutation of a friend—my lip trembles while I write down these thrilling recollections.

Some years after, an intimate friend and fellow student of mine was attacked with a malignant fever. He had taken it in the city; and returned to the small sea-port town where we were studying, with its symptoms just developing. It was soon detected by an intelligent physician. The news spread, and with it a universal panic. The mistress of the house where we lodged refused to keep him; and after searching in vain through the town for a place where he might be nursed, I laid him in a waggon, which I had some difficulty in procuring, and drove to a deserted building upon the seashore, which had formerly been used for a pest-house, a mile from any human habitation. Here I spread his bed upon the bare floor, in a corner of an upper room, and bringing what conveniences I could procure from the terrified towns-people, commenced the new offices of nurse and comforter. The last was very necessary. Fred was a clear-hearted spirited fellow, but the sense of his desperate condition pressed upon him overpoweringly. The decayed and unplastered walls, the yielding floor, the want of every comfort to which he had been used, even in health, struck cheerlessly to his heart, and, added to his entire abandonment, it was difficult to bear with even a becoming manliness. I made an arrangement, by which my food was brought daily to a spot a short distance from the house, and we commenced our solitary life. The law of the state, attaching a penalty to all communication with the inhabitants of a pest-house, would effectually have confined me, had I felt any disposition to hold communion with others, and with the exception of my walks to the place where our food was deposited, I was rarely absent. Even then, if Fred was awake, he waited for my return with so nervous an anxiety, that I could not find it in my heart to loiter.

The first, and the second, and the third days passed lingeringly away, and the fever assumed its most alarming aspect. Poor Fred grew weak and distressed, and looked into the face of the physician with a questioning earnestness he had not the courage to express. I followed him out on the fourth morning and asked his opinion.

"He must die," said the kind man; "it is a dreadful disease, and there is little hope of any one on whom it seizes."

His eyes filled as he spoke, and he felt my pulse and asked me if I was well. I had scarce had time in my constant care, to think of my own safety. The only attendant of a querulous and fastidious sufferer, whose pillow must be changed with every feeling of weariness, whose hot temples must be constantly wet, and, more than all, whose mind must, by every device of fancy, be constantly diverted from itself, how could I find leisure for reflection? I did not, and though the conclusion was not new to me, the sad tone in which the question was asked sank into my heart like ice. It was no indefinite foreboding. With my horrible dread of death, forever, even in health, pressing on me, it was but thrusting nearer to me a frightful but familiar shape of horror. I could not put it by. As I entered the room again, its stifled closeness oppressed by breath, and its bare and comfortless desolation made my spirit shrink fearfully from the idea of sickness there. And as I stood over the bed hesitating in what manner I should tell the terrible truth to my friend, it seemed to me that I could feel the subtle miasma creeping into my veins, and my knees trembled, and I lost for a moment the power of utterance. Fred stretched out his emaciated hand, and for the first time I shrunk from it. He had lain hours of every day on my bosom while I repeated poetry to him, and wiled him from his dismal thoughts, and now I could not look on his soiled and coarse covering, and his face spread with livid spots, without an unconquerable loathing. With a shudder which shook my whole frame, I suffered him to draw me down upon the bed, and taking his head on my lap, I parted his hair and repeated from Byron those exquisite lines, beginning,

"He who has bent him o'er the dead,
When the last ray of life has fled," &c.

I chose the passage to lead his thoughts to the subject, and prepare him for the melancholy disclosure, but he seemed to avoid it resolutely.

"Beautiful," he said, faintly, when I had finished, and pressing the hand which lay in his, he requested me to go on.

Instead of resuming it, I turned the conversation upon death, and finally told him, in a tone of assumed composure, that he would die. He turned his eyes quickly upon me as I spoke, and struggled a moment for breath:

"Die!" said he, in a voice like a stifled scream; "die!—impossible!" and he buried his face in the bed-clothes as if he would hide himself from the terrible conviction.

For some days and nights after this he lingered, growing weaker and weaker. He had subdued his feelings till he could look upon his approaching death with tolerable composure, and he now lay quietly on my bosom, hour after hour, without turning his eye once from the spot of the sky that was visible through the ill-closed window. He sometimes slept, and then, though I was sick for want of rest, and weary as I had never before known weariness, the thought of the contagion which every hour fastened more closely on me, rushed upon my mind, and preyed upon it like a vulture, with an ever restless tenacity. I had little opportunity for such thoughts in the day time, for then Fred was always awake, and it required a strong effort to pay him that constant and cheerful attention which is so difficult when the frame is exhausted; but at night the cool breezes quieted him and he slept.

The moment there was no necessity for exertion, I sat down by the open window, and gazing out upon the bay, or up to the clear, still sky, abandoned myself to my perpetual thought. It came in many different shapes. Sometimes I fixed my eye upon a distant vessel, slowly traversing the horizon with the moonlight lying soft and mellow upon its sails, and an inexpressible yearning to it, as something connected with the living, stirred sickeningly within me. And sometimes I gazed till midnight on the stars, and while an indefinite sense of their glory and number crowded on me, I shrunk from the thought of mingling my clogged and earthly spirit, so soon and so unprepared, with their intense purity. There was a severe holiness in their beauty which rebuked and humbled me, and I clung to life with a still closer affection. Sometimes I laid my head on the decayed window, and listened to the sound of the waves and the whisper of the wind in the grass, and a chill heaviness stole upon my heart as I thought how soon my ear would be deaf to their familiar music. It seemed impossible that there could be no healing in that delicious breeze, no medicine in the verdure that was sending up its night-fragrance so freshly. I could scarce suppress a murmur that the cool, sweet air should not arrest disease, and bring health on its fanning wings. And sometimes I looked up to the steeples and roofs of the distant town, lying distinct and silent in the light of the full moon, and outcast as I was, avoided and deserted by all those who slept healthily beneath them, I felt as if my very soul leaped to them in strong and unextinguishable affection. And my friends, one by one, came into my memory. And not these alone, but the meanest human being with whose face I was familiar, and those whose acquaintance was within my reach, and even they who had wronged me, and whom I might have forgiven—I forgave them and loved them all in my boundless desire.

The contemplation of death when in health, is very different from that in sickness. The natural strength of the mind unaffected by disease, overcomes the disgust of burial and decay, and sends it forward to the dividing of the affections and the soul's coming destiny. I will not, I have no right to describe my feelings at the thought of dying in that solitary place, and seeing those in whom my best affections were bound up, no more. I knew that I could not, except by a miracle, escape the pestilential contagion of that room, and I believed that when Fred was gone, and the excitement of duty could sustain me no longer, I should lie down on the same bed, and die miserably and alone. The thought unmanned me. I went out when I could no longer bear it, and while Fred slept, I walked to and fro upon the beach beneath the window, till the beauty of the night and the melancholy break of the waters on the shore restored me to my quiet despair.

I will not prolong this recital. On the fifth day, the physician, who had abandoned for some time all medicine but such as would soothe him, was surprised to find an evident change for the better. The fever had turned, and in a week his eye was clear and his pulse firm and regular. By that inscrutable Providence which so often protects those who are most exposed to danger, my own health was still preserved, and after a tour to the lakes in company, we sat down once more quietly to our studies.

VILLAGE SKETCHES.

THE RUNAWAY.

BY MISS MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

ONE of the most retired-looking spots in our thickly-peopled neighborhood, is the pretty little nook called Sandford Green; a small, very small patch of green-sward, formed by a casual receding of the fields at a place where two narrow shady lanes cross each other, leaving just room enough in one angle for a clear mirror-like pond, with glorious old thorns dipping into it from the surrounding hedges, whilst a village pound inclosing a noble oak, occupies another corner, and a third is completely overshadowed by two large horse-chestnut trees, standing like sentinels on either side of a gate, which leads through a short, deep lane to the only dwelling within sight or hearing. No spot is, apparently, so entirely out of the way, and out of the world, as Sandford Green! And yet the well-beaten footpaths, two or three of which, striking in different directions across the fields, meet in this spot as a common centre, intimated that the little green was a place of some resort, as indeed it actually was, not so much as a thoroughfare, but from its own independent attraction. The one solitary and unostentatious tenement of which it boasted, being famous all through the country for its home-brewed ale: the fine Sandford beer, most emphatically called strong, holding so high a rank amongst the consumers of that formidable beverage, that people sent for it far and near; and the liveried groom of two or three neighboring squires might often be seen galloping on their thoroughbred hunters to seek this only liquor worthy to wash down their master's Stilton, at the same moment that poor Dame Wheeler's little girl was crossing the stile for her sick grandmother's daily half-pint; and half the rustics in the parish pouring in from north, south, east, and west, to enjoy in Joseph Dobson's own tap-room, or beneath his honeysuckle porch, their own less moderate potations. "First come first served," was Joseph's motto, and although our moral Boniface was on the whole a man of impartiality, it is doubtful whether he had not some pleasure in keeping the lacqueys in attendance, and the grantees whom they served in expectation, whilst he administered to the wants of his humbler and more sociable customers. A chuckling, bustling, merry knave was our landlord, and a free spoken; had a vote for the county, which he regularly bestowed on the opposition candidate, be the ministers whom they might. Joseph thought no honest man could ever vote for the ministry; that was his creed—owed no one a shilling, and was too confident in the power of his ale to have any dread of the magistrates and the license act:—"Old Sir Thomas can't finish his dinner without a glass of my beer," thought Joseph; "and I may be as saucy and independent as I please."

Whatever might be the merits of the Sandford ale, of which I confess myself nowise qualified to judge, holding beer in all its varieties as an abomination even more flagrant than the other detestable drinkable called wine—whatever might be the charms of Joseph's beverage, there could be no question as to the beauty and picturesqueness of his habitation.

It was a high, narrow, tower-like house, with chimneys like turrets, and every sort of gable-end and inequality of which a building is capable, harmonized and enriched by an old vine, which after creeping up one side of the house nearly covered the roof, garlanding the very chimneys, and wreathing its luxuriant abundance of leaf and fruit and tendril wherever a shoot could find place, until it fairly hung over on the other side—until its rich festoons nearly met the branchy honeysuckle, (Milton's "twisted eglantine," which climbing up, shaded a rude, but fanciful and airy porch, such as is often seen in Wouverman's pictures, adding grace and lightness even to them. Nor was the garden which reached on one side to a small meandering brook, the large garden, full of beds of vegetables and berry bushes, almost hidden by wide flower-borders, very nicely kept; or the long strip of beautiful greensward, the meadow, orchard, or pleasure-ground (for it might pass for either of these), with its fine grove of old fruit trees, pear, plum, cherry and apple, terminated by its smooth bowling-green and goodly arbor, at all unworthy of the picturesque dwelling to which they were appended. The territory behind, a miniature farm-yard, with stabling for two, cart-room for one, a commodious cow-shed, and pigsties, goose-houses, and hen-houses out of number, its populous duck pond, and its abundance of noises—horses neighing, cows lowing, calves bleating, pigs grunting, geese gabbling, ducks quacking, cocks crowing, hens cackling, and doves cooing—was also a lively stirring scene, especially when animated by the presence of mine host, portly, sturdily and comely, an excellent representative of his own brown stout, with twenty pigeons fluttering about him (for Joseph, amongst other fancies, was a great pigeon fancier,) and two or three pet tumbler or fantails perched on his shoulder. In short, every thing about the place, from the two rosy smiling lassies, his daughters, down to the fat yard dog and sleek tabby cat, seemed emblems of rural plenty and English independence; meet appendages to the sign of the Foaming Tankard, which swung in creaking magnificence from a post in front of the dwelling.

By far the most interesting inmate, however, of this small village hostelry, was one, whose whole appearance formed the strongest possible contrast to the rest of that flourishing establishment. Mary Walker, the only child of the good landlord's only sister, was a tall thin young woman, with a pale, mild, serious countenance, great simplicity of dress and manner, and a general delicacy both of look and demeanor, belonging partly perhaps to ill health, but so much connected with a natural elegance of mind, that it hushed even her boisterous uncle, and his boisterous customers, into something like gentleness; just as the presence of a born gentlewoman might have done, if it were possible to fancy a born gentlewoman seated in the tap-room of the Foaming Tankard.

To say the truth, the tap-room was a place that Mary seldom visited. The noise, the talking, the singing, the smell of tobacco, or even the odor of the famous Sandford beer would have kept her from that well-frequented resort of the thirsty souls of the village; even if the dread of encountering some of her many lovers, (for Mary had as many suitors as Penelope,) had not been sufficient to hinder her from putting her foot across the threshold.

The cause of Mary Walker's many conquests might be found, perhaps, (at least, she certainly thought so,) in the circumstance of her being a rustic heiress, having just so many hundreds of pounds as made her a great match in her own degree; the cause of her being, at two and twenty, unwedded, and unlikely to wed, will take rather more telling, although the story be short enough, and common enough too.

Joseph Dobson had had a son, called William, as unlike his father as possible; a gay, lively, mercurial spirit, too quick, or as his poor mother used to say, too clever to learn, too ready at many trades to stick steadily to one; and so full of varying schemes and changeable resources, that every body except that dotting mother felt convinced, that in spite of William's acknowledged talents, his destiny would prove unprosperous.

The only chance for its being otherwise, lay in his strong affection for his fair cousin, Mary Walker. Her influence over him, especially after the death of his fond but misjudging mother, who had fostered his wild and expensive habits, by supplying him with money for their indulgence, formed the only counteraction to his natural and acquired unsteadiness of character. Even his father, although knowing him best and fearing him most, looked forward with some degree of hope to the period when he should be quietly married to Mary; and she herself (how strange it is, that the mildest and most reflective woman should be so often carried off her feet by the giddiest wild-goose of a man!) she herself idolized him; overturned all the disinterested objections of her uncle and guardian, to risking her money and her happiness with so flighty a swain, and even laid aside much of her own timidity to hasten as far as her natural modesty would permit, the proposed union.

On the very evening before the intended marriage, William, who amongst his other caprices, was frequently subject to the fury of jealousy, was seized with a violent fit of that amiable passion, the object being no other than George Bailey, my lord's gamekeeper, as good-natured a fellow as ever lived, and a constant visitor at the sign of the Foaming Tankard. He had brought two tame pheasants as a present to Mary, who was known to be fond of pet poultry; "a wedding present," as he had whispered at parting, and Mary unluckily had admired the beauty of the birds.

"You like the birds for the sake of the giver, Mary," said William, chafed at the warmth with which George had shaken hands with her in the moment of departure, and the mingled blush and smile with which she had received his whispered farewell; "you are thinking of the master's good looks, of his gay plumage, and not of the birds."

"The master thinks little of me, or I of him. You are quite mistaken as to both of us," replied Mary.

"You admire the beauty of the donor," pursued William pertinaciously; you talk of the pheasants, but you are thinking of him."

"Not I, indeed!" exclaimed Mary.

"But you are, I say, madam," resumed William, with increasing violence. "George Bailey is the beau of the parish, as you are the belle. We all know that; and, for my poor part, I think it a great pity that you should be separated."

"If you think so, William," said poor Mary, and then, unable to finish the sentence, burst into tears.

"Well, madam, if I think so!"

"Then—oh William! William! how cruel this is, when you know that I love you, and nobody but you, in this wide world!"

"If I think so, madam, then—pray finish what you were going to say. There is nothing I hate so much as these sort of scenes."

"Then," said Mary, resuming her firmness, "we had better part."

"Certainly, madam, we had better part, I agree with you perfectly," said the intended bridegroom, walking out of the house without listening to the threats of his father, the remonstrances of his sisters, or even the gentle assurances of Mary herself, that neither George Bailey nor she had ever thought of each other.

Joseph Dobson stormed, his little daughters fretted and wondered, and poor Mary cried; but all fully expected that that night at supper-time, or at latest by peep of dawn, William would re-appear, repent, and be forgiven; for a temper "which carried anger as the flint doth fire," had the redeeming grace of being eminently sweet and sunshiny, especially after one of these sudden storms; so that Mary, after feeling the exceeding delight of reconciliation, used sometimes to wonder whether she should like William as well, if he were always quiet and civil like other people. Mary cried, expecting to be comforted; but the comforter whom she expected did not arrive. The evening passed away—the night—the next morning, that which should have been the bridal morning!—the day—the intended wedding day! and still no tidings of William. His father traced him to London; and then came a report that he was gone on board ship; he had had such a fancy in his boyhood engendered by reading Robinson Crusoe; and then came rumors of shipwreck, at first doubtfully listened to, but gradually believed, as, month after month, and year after year glided by without any tidings arriving of the unhappy fugitive. Surely if he had been alive he would have written, was the secret thought and feeling of all.

In his own home, long absence had produced its usual effect, and things had returned to their ordinary course with little reference to the life or death of the young man. His father, first immoderately angry, then intemperately grieved, had resumed his former jovial temper and bustling habits; his light-hearted sisters had ceased to hope or fear, or lament; and his old companions had well nigh forgotten that he had ever existed. Forgotten indeed he was by every body except poor Mary, who cherished his memory with the gentle sadness of a young widow, and turned from love and lovers with the fond fidelity of a dove that has lost its mate. Never was heart more devoted and true: as Ben Brown, the fat exciseman, and Aaron Keep, the lean shoemaker, and tall Jim Ward, the blacksmith, and little Bob Wheatley, the carpenter, besides at least a score more of rejected suitors, could testify—George Bailey being nearly the only young man in the parish who had never made Mary Walker an offer, having, within three months of the pheasant present, brought home a very sufficient reason for not doing so in the shape of an exceedingly pretty black-eyed wife. Poor Mary! she would have done wisely in following the example of the rest of the world, and forgetting William Dobson; but, as she used to say, when urged on the subject, she could not.

Meanwhile time rolled on, and it was now some years since any thing had been heard of him. May was drawing towards its close—that loveliest month, which joins the spring flowers with the summer leaves. The country was in its prime of beauty, and Sandford Green, with its pearly bunches of hawthorn overhanging and reflected in the clear bright pond, the horse chestnuts covered with their pyramidal flowers, the golden broom skirting round the meadows where the young lambs were at play, the orchard one glow of blossom, the lilacs and laburnums scenting the arbor, and the honeysuckle perfuming the porch. Sandford was the sweetest and prettiest of all country places; and Mary was standing under the honeysuckle, looking at the blue sky and the green grass, and the flowery fruit-trees so gay in the sunshine, and thinking how wrong it was in her not to be happy; when all on a sudden the good landlord advanced from the farm-yard with a troubled countenance, calling for Mary and Bessy and Kate, a mess of milk, a jug of ale, and a bottle of brandy. "There's a man lying dead or dying in the cart-house," added he; "make haste, lasses!"

Mary, catching at the hope of life, hurried into the house to despatch some messenger for medical assistance; his daughters flew to his assistance, and half the customers in the tap-room followed with instinctive curiosity to the cart-house.

The man was not dead; and mine host and little Kate were administering, or rather offering (for he seemed incapable either of speaking or swallowing,) their various remedies.

"Who can he be?" said Kate; "what can have brought him here?"

"How should I know, child?" replied the man of the Tankard; "'tis a poor famished wretch, as you see, who I suppose could crawl no further. But I think he'll live! He's looking about him! and he seems likely to come to. Get your cousin's smelling bottle, Bessy; and don't crowd round him so, good folks! Why even Neptune has crept up to him, and is half smothering the poor wretch. That looks as if it was somebody the dog knew."

And the poor creature, the sick, famished, creature writhed on his straw, and groaned and gasped as if for speech.

"Where are Mary's salts, girls? See how Neptune's licking the poor wretch's hands! Where is Mary?"

And at that instant Mary entered; the sick man half rose up, and she knew him! "William! gracious heaven! 'tis William!" And instantly she was kneeling at his side, and supporting him in her arms, aided, as it happened, by our old friend the keeper, who had been taking his morning draught in the tap. Poor William looked from one to the other—

"Are you married?" said he, with a strong effort.

"Yes," said George; "no," said Mary; both in a breath.

"To think of my not knowing my own son!" exclaimed the father, bending over him, the tears running over his rough cheeks. "But his very mother could not have known him, so fond of him as she used to be! Nobody would, but Mary. Welcome home, my boy! We'll soon set thee up again. Welcome, my own dear boy!"

"Welcome home, dear William!" echoed the sobbing sisters.

But William listened to none of them. "Are you married?" was again his question.

"Yes!" said George, smiling.

"But not to me, William! Not to me, dear William!" said Mary; and the poor runaway grasped her hand between his trembling ones, (Neptune fondling them all the time,) and life, and health, and love, were in the pressure; and the toils, the wanderings, the miseries of his four years' absence were all forgotten in that moment of bliss!

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE REVENGE OF ST. NICHOLAS.

A TALE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

BY J. K. PAULDING.

EVERYBODY knows that in the famous city of New-York, whose proper name is New-Amsterdam, the excellent St. Nicholas—who is worth a dozen St. Georges and dragons to boot, and who, if every tub stood on its right bottom, would be at the head of the seven champions of christendom—I say, everybody knows the excellent St. Nicholas, in holiday times, goes about among the people in the middle of the night, distributing all sorts of toothsome and becoming gifts to the good boys and girls in this his favorite city. Some say that he comes down the chimneys in a little Jersey waggon; others, that he wears a pair of Holland skates, with which he travels like the wind; and others, who pretend to have seen him, maintain that he has lately adopted a locomotive, and was once actually detected on the Albany rail-road. But this last assertion is looked upon to be entirely fabulous, because St. Nicholas has too much discretion to trust himself in such a new-fangled jarvie; and so I leave this matter to be settled by whosoever will take the trouble. Our own opinion is, that his favorite mode of travelling is on a canal, the motion and speed of which aptly comports with the philosophic dignity of his character. But this is not material, and I will no longer detain my readers with extraneous and irrelevant matters, as is too much the fashion with our statesmen, orators, biographers, and story-tellers.

It was in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty, or sixty-one, for the most orthodox chronicles differ in this respect; but it was a very remarkable year, and it was called annus mirabilis, on that account. It was said that several people were detected in speaking the truth about that time; that nine staid, sober, and discreet widows, who had sworn on an anti-masonic almanac never to enter a second time into the holy state, were snapt up by young husbands, before they knew what they were about; that six venerable bachelors wedded as many buxom young belles, and, it is reported, were afterwards sorry for what they had done; that many people actually went to church, from motives of piety; and that a great scholar, who had written a book in support of certain opinions, was not only convinced of his error, but acknowledged it publicly afterwards. No wonder the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty, if that was the year, was called annus mirabilis!

What contributed to render this year still more remarkable, was the building of six new three-story brick houses in the city, and three persons setting up equipages, who, I cannot find, ever failed in business afterwards, or compounded with their creditors at a piateen in the pound. It is, moreover, recorded in the annals of the horticultural society of that day, which were written on a cabbage-leaf, as is said, that a member produced a forked radish, of such vast dimensions, that being dressed up in fashionable male attire at the exhibition, it was actually mistaken for a travelled beau by several inexperienced young ladies, who pined away for love of its beautiful complexion, and were changed into daffadownillies. Some maintained it was a mandrake, but it was finally detected by an inquest of experienced matrons. No wonder the year seventeen hundred and sixty was called annus mirabilis!

But the most extraordinary thing of all was the confident assertion, that there was but one gray mare within the bills of mortality; and, incredible as it may appear, she was the wife of a responsible citizen, who, it was affirmed, had grown rich by weaving velvet purses out of sows' ears. But this we look upon as being somewhat of the character of the predictions of almanac-makers. Certain it is, however, that Amos Shuttle possessed the treasure of a wife who was shrewdly suspected of having established within doors a system of government not laid down in Aristotle or the Abbe Sieyès, who made a constitution for every day in the year, and two for the first of April.

Amos Shuttle, though a mighty pompous little man out of doors, was the meekest of human creatures within. He belonged to that class of people who pass for great among the little, and little among the great; and he would certainly have been master in his own house had it not been for a woman! We have read somewhere that no wise woman ever thinks her husband a demi-god. If so, it is a blessing that there are so few wise women in the world.

Amos had grown rich, heaven knows how—he did not know himself; but, what was somewhat extraordinary, he considered his wealth a signal proof of his talents and sagacity, and valued himself according to the infallible standard of pounds, shillings and pence. But though he lorded it without, he was, as we have just said, the most gentle of men within doors. The moment he stepped inside of his own house his spirit covered down, like that of a pious man entering a church; he felt as if he was in the presence of a superior being—to wit, Mrs. Abigail Shuttle. He was, indeed, the meekest of beings at home, except Moses; and Sir Andrew Aguecheek's song, which Sir Toby Belch declared "would draw nine souls out of one weaver," would have failed in drawing half of one out of Amos. The truth is, his wife, who ought to have known, affirmed he had no more soul than a monkey; but he was the only man in the city thus circumstanced at the time we speak of. No wonder, therefore, the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty was called annus mirabilis!

Such as he was Mr. Amos Shuttle waxed richer and richer every day, inasmuch that those who envied his prosperity were wont to say, "that he had certainly been born with a dozen silver spoons in his mouth, or such a great blockhead would never have got together such a heap of money." When he had become worth ten thousand pounds, he lunched his shuttle magnanimously out of the window, ordered his weaver's beam to be split up for oven wood, and Mrs. Amos turned his weaver's shop into a boudoir. Fortune followed him faster than he ran away from her. In a few years the ten thousand doubled, and in a few more trebled, quadrupled—in short, Amos could hardly count his money.

"What shall we do now, my dear?" asked Mrs. Shuttle, who never sought his opinion, that I can learn, except for the pleasure of contradicting him.

"Let us go and live in the country, and enjoy ourselves," quoth Amos.

"Go into the country! go to—!" I could never satisfy myself what Mrs. Shuttle meant, but she stopped short, and concluded the sentence with a withering look of scorn, that would have cowed the spirits of nineteen weavers.

Amos named all sorts of places, enumerated all sorts of modes of life he could think of, and every pleasure that might enter into the imagination of a man without a soul. His wife despised them all; she would not hear of them.

"Well, my dear, suppose you suggest something; do now, Abby," at length said Amos, in a coaxing whisper; "will you, my only-doney?"

"Only fiddlestick! I wonder you repeat such vulgarisms. But if I must say what I should like, I should like to travel."

"Well, let us go and make a tour as far as Jamaica, or Hackinsack, or Spiking-devil. There is excellent fishing for striped bass there."

"Spiking-devil!" screamed Mrs. Shuttle; "an't you ashamed to swear so, you wicked mortal! I won't go to Jamaica, nor Hackinsack among the Dutch hottentots, nor to Spiking-devil, to catch striped bass. I'll go to Europe!"

If Amos had possessed a soul it would have jumped out of its skin at the idea of going beyond seas. He had once been on the sea-bass banks, and got a seasoning there; the very thought of which made him sick. But, as he had no soul, there was no great harm done.

When Mrs. Shuttle said a thing it was settled. They went to Europe, taking their only son with them; the lady ransacked all the milliner's shops in Paris, and the gentleman visited all the restaurateurs. He became such a desperate connoisseur and gourmand, that he could almost tell an omelette au jambon from a gammon of bacon. After consummating the polish, they came home, the lady with the newest old fashions, and the weaver with a confirmed preference of potage-a-la-turque over pepper-pot. It is said the city trembled, as with an earthquake, when they landed; but the notion was probably superstitious.

They arrived near the close of the year, the memorable year, the annus mirabilis, one thousand seven hundred and sixty. Everybody that had ever known the Shuttles flocked to see them, or rather to see what they had brought with them; and such was the magic of a voyage to Europe, that Mr. and Mrs. Amos Shuttle, who had been nobodies when they departed, became somebodies when they returned, and mounted at once to the summit of ton.

"You have come in good time to enjoy the festivities of the holidays," said Mrs. Hubblebubble, an old friend of Amos the weaver and his wife.

"We shall have a merry christmas and a happy new-year," exclaimed Mrs. Doubletrouble, another old acquaintance of old times.

"The holidays," drawled Mrs. Shuttle; "the holidays? christmas and new-year? Pray what are they?"

It is astonishing to see how people lose their memories abroad sometimes. They often forget their old friends, old customs, and occasionally themselves.

"Why, la! now, who'd have thought it?" cried Mrs. Doubletrouble; "why sure you haven't forgot the oily cooks and the mince pies, the merry-meetings of friends, the sleigh-rides, the kissing bridge, and the family parties?"

"Family parties!" shrieked Mrs. Shuttle, and held her salts to her nose; "family parties! I never heard of any thing so gothic in Paris or Rome; and oily cooks—O shocking! and mince pies! detestable; and throwing open one's doors to all one's old friends, whom one wishes to forget as soon as possible. O! the idea is insupportable!" and again she held the salts to her nose.

Mrs. Hubblebubble and Mrs. Doubletrouble found they had exposed themselves sadly, and were quite ashamed. A real, genteel, well-bred, enlightened lady of fashion ought to have no rule of conduct—no conscience, but Paris—whatever is fashionable there is genteel—whatever is not fashionable is vulgar. There is no other standard of right, and no other eternal fitness of things. At least so thought Mrs. Hubblebubble and Mrs. Doubletrouble.

"But is it possible that all these things are out of fashion abroad?" asked the latter, beseechingly.

"They never were in," said Mrs. Amos Shuttle. "For my part, I mean to close my doors and windows on new-year's day, I'm determined."

"And so am I," said Mrs. Hubblebubble.

"And so am I," said Mrs. Doubletrouble.

And it was settled that they should make a combination among themselves and their friends, to put down the ancient and good customs of the city, and abolish the sports and enjoyments of the jolly new year. The conspirators then separated, each to pursue her diabolical designs against oily cooks, mince pies, sleigh-rides, sociable visitings, and family parties.

Now the excellent St. Nicholas, who knows well what is going on in every house in the city, though, like a good and honorable saint, he never betrays any family secrets, overheard these wicked women plotting against his favorite anniversary, and he said to himself—

"Der Blyndchap! but I'll be even with you, mejuf frow." So he determined he would play these conceited and misled women a trick or two before he had done with them.

It was now the first day of the new year, and Mrs. Amos Shuttle, and Mrs. Doubletrouble, and Mrs. Hubblebubble, and all their wicked abettors had shut up their doors and windows, so that when their old friends called they could not get into their houses. Moreover, they had neither prepared mince pies, nor oily cooks, nor crullers, nor any of the good things consecrated to St. Nicholas by his pious and well-intentioned votaries, and they were mightily pleased at having been as dull and stupid as owls, while all the rest of the city were as merry as crickets, chirping and frikking in the warm chimney-corner. Little did they think what horrible judgments were impending over them, prepared by the wrath of the excellent St. Nicholas, who was resolved to make an example of them for attempting to introduce their new-fangled corruptions in place of the ancient customs of his favorite city. These wicked women never had another comfortable sleep in their lives!

The night was still, clear and frosty—the earth was every where one carpet of snow, and looked just like the ghost of a dead world, wrapped in a white winding-sheet; the moon was full, round, and of a silvery brightness, and by her discreet silence afforded an example to the rising generation of young damsels, while the myriads of stars that multiplied as you gazed at them, seemed as though they were frozen into icicles, they looked so cold, and sparkled with such a glorious lustre. The streets and roads leading from the city were all alive with sleighs, filled with jovial souls, whose echoing laughter and cheerful songs, mingled with a thousand merry bells, that jingled in harmonious dissonance, giving spirit to the horses, and animation to the scene. In the license of the season, hallowed by long custom, each of the sleighs saluted the others in passing, with a "happy new year," a merry jest, or mischievous gibe, exchanged from one gay party to another. All was life, motion, and merriment; and as old frost-bitten winter, aroused from his trance by the rout and revelry around, raised his weather-beaten head to see what was passing, he felt his icy blood warming and coursing through his veins, and wished he could only overtake the laughing buxom spring, that he might dance a jig with her, and be as frisky as the best of them. But as the old rogue could not bring this desirable matter about, he contented himself with calling for a jolly bumper of cock-tail, and drinking a swingeing draught to the health of the blessed St. Nicholas, and those who honor the memory of the president of good fellows.

All this time these wicked women and their abettors lay under the malediction of the good saint, who caused them to be bewitched by an old lady from Salem. Mrs. Amos Shuttle could not sleep, because something had whispered in her apprehensive ear that her son, her only son, who she had engaged to the daughter of Count Grenouille, in Paris, then about three years old, was actually at that moment crossing kissing bridge, in company with little Susan Varian, and some others besides. Now Susan was the fairest little lady of all the land; she had a face and an eye just like the widow Wadman, in Leslie's charming picture; a face and an eye which no reasonable man under heaven could resist, except my uncle Toby—beshrew him and his fortifications, I say! She was, moreover, a good little girl, and an accomplished little girl—but, alas! she had not mounted to the step in Jacob's ladder of fashion, which qualifies a person for the heaven of high ton, and Mrs. Shuttle had not been to Europe for nothing. She would rather have seen her son wedded to dissipation and profligacy than to Susan Varian; and the thought of his being out sleigh-riding with her, was worse than the tooth-ache. It kept her awake all the live-long night; and the only consolation she had was scolding poor Amos, because the sleigh bells made such a noise.

As for Mrs. Hubblebubble and Mrs. Doubletrouble, they neither of them got a wink of sleep during a whole week, for thinking of the beautiful French chairs and damask curtains Mrs. Shuttle had brought from Europe. They forthwith besieged their good men, leaving them no rest until they sent out orders to Paris for just such rich chairs and curtains as those of the thrice happy Mrs. Shuttle, from whom they kept the affair a profound secret, each meaning to treat her to an agreeable surprise. In the meanwhile they could not rest for fear the vessel which was to bring these treasures might be lost on her passage. Such was the dreadful judgment inflicted on them by the good St. Nicholas.

The perplexities of Mrs. Shuttle increased daily. In the first place, do all she could, she could not make Amos a fine gentleman. This was a metamorphosis which Ovid would never have dreamed of. He would be telling the price of every thing in his house, his furniture, his wines, and his dinners, inasmuch that those who envied his prosperity, or, perhaps, only despised his pretensions, were wont to say, after eating his venison, and drinking his old Madeira, "that he ought to have been a tavern-keeper, he knew so well how to make out a bill." Mrs. Shuttle once overheard a speech of this kind, and the good St. Nicholas himself, who had brought it about, almost felt sorry for the mortification she endured on the occasion.

Scarcely had she got over this, when she was invited to a ball, by Mrs. Hubblebubble, and the first thing she saw on entering the drawing-room, was a suit of damask curtains and chairs, as much like her own as two peas, only the curtains had far handsomer fringe. Mrs. Shuttle came very near fainting away, but escaped for that time, determining to mortify this impudent creature, by taking not the least notice of her finery. But St. Nicholas ordered it otherwise, so that she was at last obliged to acknowledge they were very elegant indeed. Nay, this was not the worst, for she overheard one lady whisper to another, that Mrs. Hubblebubble's curtains were much richer than Mrs. Shuttle's.

"O, I dare say," replied the other—"I dare say Mrs. Shuttle bought them second-hand, for her husband is as mean as Pussley."

This was too much. The unfortunate woman was taken suddenly ill—called her carriage, and went home, where it is supposed she would have died that evening had she not wrought upon Amos to promise her an entire new suit of French furniture for her drawing-room and parlor to boot, besides a new carriage. But for all this she could not close her eyes that night for thinking of the "second-hand curtains."

Nor was the wicked Mrs. Doubletrouble a whit better off, when her friend Mrs. Hubblebubble treated her to the agreeable surprise of the French window-curtains and chairs. "It is too bad—too bad, I declare," said she to herself; "but I'll pay her off soon." Accordingly she issued invitations for a grand ball and supper, at which both Mrs. Shuttle and Mrs. Hubblebubble were struck dumb at beholding a suit of curtains and a set of chairs exactly of the same pattern with theirs. The shock was terrible, and it is impossible to say what might have been the consequences, had not the two ladies all at once thought of uniting in abusing Mrs. Doubletrouble for her extravagance.

"I pity poor Mr. Doubletrouble," said Mrs. Shuttle, shrugging her shoulders significantly, and glancing at the room.

"And so do I," sighed Mrs. Hubblebubble, doing the same.

Mrs. Doubletrouble had her eye on them, and enjoyed their mortification until her pride was brought to the ground by a dead shot from Mrs. Shuttle, who was heard to exclaim, in reply to a lady who observed the chairs and curtains were very handsome,

"Why, yes; but they have been out of fashion in Paris a long time; and, besides, really they are getting so common, that I intend to have mine removed to the nursery."

Heavens! what a blow! Poor Mrs. Doubletrouble hardly survived it. Such a night of misery as the wicked woman endured almost made the good St. Nicholas regret the judgment he had passed upon these mischievous and conceited females. But he thought to himself he would persevere until he had made them a sad example to all innovators upon the ancient customs of our forefathers.

Thus were these wicked and miserable women spurred on by witchcraft from one piece of extravagance to another, and a deadly rivalry grew up between them, which destroyed their own happiness and that of their husbands. Mrs. Shuttle's new carriage and drawing-room furniture in due time was followed by similar extravagancies on the part of the two other wicked women, who had conspired against the hallowed institutions of St. Nicholas; and soon their rivalry came to such a height, that neither of them had a moment's rest or comfort from that time forwards. But they still shut their doors on the jolly anniversary of St. Nicholas, though the old respectable burghers and their wives, who had held up their heads time out of mind, continued the good custom, and laughed at the presumption of these upstart interlopers, who were followed only by a few people, of silly pretensions, who had no more soul than Amos Shuttle himself. The three wicked women grew to be almost perfect skeletons, on account of the vehemence with which they strove to outdo each other, and the terrible exertions necessary to keep up the appearance of being the best friends in the world. In short, they became the laughing-stock of the town; and sensible, well-bred folks cut their acquaintance, except when they sometimes accepted an invitation to a party, just to make merry with their folly and conceitedness.

The excellent St. Nicholas, finding they still persisted in their opposition to his rites and ceremonies, determined to inflict on them the last and worst punishment that can befall the sex. He decreed that they should be deprived of all the delights springing from the domestic affections, and all taste for the innocent and virtuous enjoyments of a happy fireside. Accordingly, they lost all relish for home; were continually gadding about from one place to another, in search of pleasure, and worried themselves to death to find happiness where it is never to be found. Their whole lives became one long series of disappointed hopes, galled pride, and gnawing envy. They lost their health, they lost their time, and their days became days of harassing impatience, their nights nights of sleepless, feverish excitement, ending in weariness and disappointment. The good saint sometimes felt sorry for them, but their continued obstinacy determined him to persevere in his plan to punish the upstart pride of these rebellious females.

Young Shuttle, who had a soul, which I suppose he inherited from his mother, all this while continued his attentions to little Susan Varian, which added to the miseries inflicted on his wicked mother. Mrs. Shuttle insisted that Amos should threaten to disinherit his son, unless he gave up this attachment.

"Lord bless your soul, Abby," said Amos, "what's the use of my threatening, the boy knows as well as I do that I've no will of my own. Why, bless my soul, Abby—"

"Bless your soul!" interrupted Mrs. Shuttle; "I wonder who'd take the trouble to bless it but yourself? However, if you don't I will."

Accordingly, she threatened the young man with being disinherited unless he turned his back on little Susan Varian, which no man ever did without getting a heart-ache.

"If my father goes on as he has done lately," sighed the youth, "he won't have anything left to disinherit me of but his affection, I fear. But if he had millions I would not abandon Susan."

"Are you not ashamed of such a low-lived attachment? You that have been to Europe! But, once for all, remember this, renounce this low-born upstart, or quit your father's home for ever."

"Upstart!" thought young Shuttle; "one of the oldest families in the city." He made his mother a respectful bow, bade heaven bless her, and left the house. He was, however, met by his father at the door, who said to him,

"Johnny, I give my consent; but mind, don't tell your mother a word of the matter. I'll let her know I've a soul as well as other people;" and he tossed his head like a war-horse.

The night after this Johnny was married to little Susan, and the blessing of affection and beauty lighted upon his pillow. Her old father, who was in a respectable business, took his son-in-law into partnership, and they prospered so well that in a few years Johnny was independent of all the world, with the prettiest wife and children in the land. But Mrs. Shuttle was inexorable, while the knowledge of his prosperity and happiness only worked her up to a higher pitch of anger, and added to the pangs of jealousy perpetually inflicted on her by the rivalry of Mrs. Hubblebubble and Mrs. Doubletrouble, who suffered under the like inflection from the wrathful St. Nicholas, who was resolved to make them an example to all posterity.

No fortune, be it ever so great, can stand the eternal sapping of wasteful extravagance engendered and stimulated by the baleful passion of envy. In less than ten years from the hatching of the diabolical conspiracy of these three wicked women against the supremacy of the excellent St. Nicholas, their spendthrift rivalry had ruined the fortunes of their husbands, and entailed upon themselves misery and remorse. Rich Amos Shuttle became at last as poor as a church mouse, and would have been obliged to take to the loom again in his old age, had not Johnny, now rich, and a worshipful magistrate of the city, afforded him and his better half a generous shelter under his own happy roof. Mrs. Hubblebubble and Mrs. Doubletrouble had scarcely time to condole with Mrs. Shuttle, and congratulate each other, when their husbands went the way of all flesh, that is to say, failed for a few tens of thousands, and called their creditors together to hear the good news. The two wicked women lived long enough after this to repent of their offence against St. Nicholas; but they never imported any more French curtains, and at last perished miserably in an attempt to set the fashions in Penny-Pot alley.

Mrs. Abigail Shuttle might have lived happily the rest of her life with her children and grand-children, who all treated her with reverent courtesy and affection, now that the wrath of the mighty St. Nicholas was appeased by her exemplary punishment. But she could not get over her bad habits and feelings, or forgive her lovely little daughter-in-law for treating her so kindly when she so little deserved it. She gradually pined away; and though she revived at hearing of the catastrophe of Mrs. Hubblebubble and Mrs. Doubletrouble, it was only for a moment. The remainder of the life of this wicked woman was a series of disappointments and heart-burnings, and when she died, Amos tried to shed a few tears, but he found it impossible, I suppose, because, as his wife always said, "he had no soul."

Such was the terrible revenge of St. Nicholas, which ought to be a warning to all who attempt to set themselves up against the venerable customs of their ancestors, and backslide from the hallowed institutions of the blessed saint, to whose good offices, without doubt, it is owing that this, his favorite city, has transcended all others of the universe in beautiful damsels, valorous young men, mince pies, and new-year cookies. The catastrophe of these three wicked women had a wonderful influence in the city, inasmuch that from this time forward, no gray mares were ever known, no French furniture was ever used, and no woman was hardy enough to set herself up in opposition to the good customs of St. Nicholas. And so wishing many happy new-years to all my dear countrywomen and countrymen, saving those who shut their doors to old friends, high or low, rich or poor, on that blessed anniversary, which makes more glad hearts than all others put together—I say, wishing a thousand happy new-years to all, with this single exception, I lay down my pen, with a caution to all wicked women to beware of the revenge of St. Nicholas. "O brandend pidje! wat al verscheidenheid!"

ITALIAN LITERATURE.

SPENSER, ARIOSTO, AND TASSO.

THE Fairy Queen, in its plan and execution reminds us of Ariosto; but its author's mind was almost the counterpart of Tasso's. In splendor and fertility of fancy Tasso seems often inferior. His is a more chastened and subdued elegance; at least his powers are more carefully husbanded and under better control. Not that there is any weakness behind this prudent reserve—on the contrary, when he does put forth his strength, it is found to be matchless: when he discloses all the riches of his mind, they are seen to be inexhaustible. He had a more delicate taste than the English poet—like Rousseau, he composed slowly and with difficulty, and was fastidiously nice in altering and rejecting. But when he gives full scope to his imagination, when he lets the stream of thought flow free, then music, eloquence, fancy and feeling, are poured out like a river. Neither can all the riches of Spenser's fancy compare with the dazzling countless wealth of Ariosto. In the Orlando Furioso, the eternal sameness of chivalric combats, romantic adventures, errant knights and distressed damsels, is embellished and adorned with almost incredible variety. To use a familiar illustration, it reminds one of the French cook who had three hundred and sixty ways of dressing an egg. Now such a variety of poetical cookery Spenser has not attained to; he knows not how to disguise the same dish when served up a second time, or how to stimulate by novelty the jaded appetite of his readers. There is no diversity of character or incident—the tournaments of Arthegall, Bradamante, Arthur, Sir Guyon, and the Redcross Knight, are all repetitions; the same "deadly blows" and "fierce despatch" occur throughout—there is none of that rich humor, that glow of animation, which sparkle and dazzle in every page of Ariosto.

Spenser, then, we cannot help thinking inferior to both the Italian poets. He could not have sung of the wars of men and angels round the holy city; nor could he have thrown beauty and grace round Orlando's madness, or Ruggiero's enchantment: he might as well have tried like Milton, to "bid the base of heaven's deep organ blow," as to imitate Tasso's full swell of harmony, or the shifting notes of Ariosto's brilliant carol. To an English scholar, our condemnation of Spenser may seem severe; but let him remember that we are not to judge of Ariosto and Tasso by Hoole, any more than we are to measure Homer by the standard of Pope, or Shakespeare by that of his French traducers. In our meagre versions we have no idea of the richness and gorgeous splendor of the Italian poets. Never have any authors suffered so much from translation—never have any been so literally done into English. But let us turn from these miserable mockeries to the originals, and we shall there find beauties which Spenser dared not attempt, and never could have equalled.

The subject of the Fairy Queen is too meagre and barren to be successfully continued through twelve books. There is no foundation to support so labored a superstructure of fancy, and the whole edifice appears disjointed, ragged, and laboriously eked out. It reminds us of his own description of the house of Pride:

"It was a goodly heape for to behold,
And spake the praises of the workman's witt,
But full great pittie that so faire a mould
Did on so weak foundation ever sitt:
For on a sandie hill that still did flitt
And fall away, it mounted was full hie,
That every breath of heaven shaked it,
And all the hinder parts that few could spie,
Were ruinous and old, but painted cunningly."

He gives us abstract instead of fictitious personages—an unnatural instead of an unreal creation. The allegorical world, various and populous as it is, is not half so gay or pleasing as that of romance. It involves abstractions which must be cold and unnatural—which may please, but do not affect,

"Play round the head, but come not to the heart."

It is beings, human in their passions though superhuman in their powers, of earthly affections though not of mortal mould, that can alone enlist our sympathies. It is nature that bids us look for and love nature even in the beings of the imagination. This is a high involuntary homage that fiction pays to truth—that when it wishes to please it must put on the garb, and borrow the looks of the true divinity. Such stories as are alterations, not violations of reality,

"Truth severe by fairy fiction drest,"

the imagination receives readily and believes with implicit delight. He who reads "of visions and enchantments drear" by his solitary lamp, in the stillness of a winter's night, when the world does not break in upon his musings, can almost fancy himself transported to the crystal palace of Urganda—can believe, or wish to believe in the magic art of Merlin, and the power and beauty of the Fairy Queen. These are tangible miracles—these are probable wonders, so to speak; but the unsubstantial shapes of allegory have no such hold on our affections, no such relationship to the living world of flesh and blood. Bunyan alone has given them interest and power, and he did it by that fervor of his mind which removed the distance between realities and abstractions—which made Giant Despair mingle among men, and Mercy a fellow-traveller, with a mortal family.

So much for the deficiencies we cannot help noticing in Spenser. Since we have gone thus far, it is but fair to notice his great and peculiar merit; one in which neither Ariosto, Tasso, nor any other foreign poet can compare with him. His is the finest pastoral the world saw since Theocritus, until nature herself taught Burns to sing her praises. He is one of those gentle, quiet spirits, like Cowper, Goldsmith, and Shenstone, who

"Love to wander
Adown some trotting burn's meander,
And no think lang."

to go abroad over the earth, enjoying the solitude and the shade, and at every visit to the mighty mother, drinking in something of her beauty and purity. An eye for nature, which we think as necessary for a poet as an ear for music for a singer, is seldom possessed by foreign authors. They feel no sweet, secret influences emanating from field and flower; they hear no music in the voice of the winds and waves; to them the face of nature is inexpressive, lighted up by no smile, and instinct with no life. They do not feel what Byron felt so deeply, and expressed so well:

"There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,
There is a rapture on the lonely shore;
There is society, where none intrudes,
By the deep sea, and music in its roar."

There is little taste for fine rural scenery among southern poets; among English it is their every mark and characteristic, from Spenser revelling in the cool shades and glassy waters of his imaginary landscapes, to Burns and Wordsworth finding

"Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, Sermons in stones, and good in every thing."

This is Spenser's great beauty. His finest passages are not where he describes the magic arts of the "dangerous Archmage," or the adventures of the knights of faery in the "brave pursuit of cheval-rous emprise;" but where he speaks of the scenes of beauty and bliss in which his personages move—of the bowers and shades where Satyrane is nursed—the gardens of Acrasia, the peaceful retreat to which Calidore retires for the love of Castorella, and the woody amphitheatre where Venus and the graces dance to the shepherd's pipe. This we have said is almost peculiar to our own poetry; it is the voice of nature, which the refinements of southern taste stifle, but which in the freedom of the north, whispers in the poet's ear, and whose musical accents he echoes back to the world. Δ.

THE HISTORY OF A VERY CLEVER FELLOW.

I LIKE your clever fellows amazingly; your open-browed, open-hearted, open-handed, shrewd, enterprising characters; but as to your very clever fellows—I mean Yankee clever—there is an ominous emphasis in the expression. The appellation was never bestowed upon me but once, and then I imagined I could feel myself losing my foothold on respectability, and sliding, like the man in Leggett's story, down—down—down. But that's not to the point.

Did you know Jack Easy?—I am sure you did, for you lived at the same time, in the same town with him. Every body there knew him, every body loved him, and every body said he was a very clever fellow.

And a beautiful boy he was, as healthy and cheerful a bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked lad as ever played at ball, or blind-man's-buff. He was the joy of his parents, the pride of his playmates, and the fast friend of every human being who had ever exchanged glances with him.

Jack exhibited his peculiar qualities very early in life: when a child he would give away all his marbles, and let the little urchins split his top; and he always treated his own gingerbread as the English clergymen treat their parishioners—he took a tenth part.

He was so fond of play to be a good scholar; yet he was so ready to acknowledge his errors, received a scolding in such good part, was so kind and conciliating to his teacher, listened with so much patience to his "long talks," and paid so much respect to his learning, that the pedagogue could never find it in his heart to "reform" him; so our hero, while at the academy, learned little more than to describe a circle on the ice, and add apples to the "school fund," by subtracting them from his neighbor's orchard.

After having got through, or rather got over his education, he was transplanted into a retail store as clerk, where he increased his employer's popularity by diminishing his wealth; the rich customers would never pay him any profit, and he had not the conscience to ask any from the poor; he always gave good measure, and good weight, and was an entire stranger to the thousand little ways in which men cheat their neighbors, and thereby gain a reputation for great shrewdness; and, at last, his master told him that the "credit" side of his "profit and loss" account was becoming so small, that it would be impossible for him to retain him; yet he must say, that, although he was not cut out for business, still he was a very clever fellow.

About this time Jack's father died, leaving him ten thousand dollars as his portion; whereupon a particular friend of his (money always brings particular friends,) who could feel the "pleasures of hope," as well as Campbell could write them, suggested the expediency of his employing his capital in the manufacture of a new article to be made by steam power; there was not the smallest doubt of a fortune's being realized in a short time. The offer was accepted, the money was expended, the project failed; they went too much upon the high pressure principle—their boiler burst, the manufactory went to the dogs, and Jack went to jail.

Here our hero could have enjoyed himself in meditation and solitude; but not being quite as fond of meditation as Mr. Hervey, nor quite as much attached to solitude as Mr. Zimmerman, he was happy to scrape an acquaintance with the jailer's daughter. He told her the circumstances of his life, and related what he was pleased to call his misfortunes; he spoke of many a "deadly breach" of trust; she loved him for the "dangers he had passed," and he "loved her that she did pity them." Loving souls! she had a few dollars in cash, and he wanted to cut the jail, so he married her.

Although, like Mr. Cobbett, decidedly favorable to the matrimonial state, I do not think that our friend, "good easy man," was sufficiently cautious in his selection of a companion. "Why not?" you ask. "Was she a vixen?"—no, reader; she was gentle as a dove. "Was she a fool?"—no; she could "talk like a book." "Was she artful?"—no; she would tell all she knew, and more too. "Well, then," you inquire again, "what is your objections to her?" Why, to tell you the sober truth, she had a queer sort of a way of looking at the stars; of exciting her imagination without refining her sentiments; of—excuse me for mentioning it—of taking a glass too much; there, it's all out.

But, my lady readers, do not scorn her. I doubt not but some of you have been intoxicated with flattery, which is just as exhilarating, and often as dangerous in its effects as alcohol itself.

"But what did Easy do?—did he remonstrate?"—no; he was too gentle. "Did he get in a passion?"—no, he was too kind; she was eloquent—he was yielding. She drank—he drank. Have you never heard of female influence?

Her career was like that of a comet, fiery, short, and somewhat crooked; and she soon run out her money and her existence.

Since that time Jack has kept an auction store, and a lottery office, has been a supernumerary to a playhouse, and is at present runner to a steam-boat. He is now at the bottom of the hill, gets many a hard rub, and serves many a good turn, but has never lost his good nature—his ruinous pliability of disposition.

"I would rather," as Mr. Hackett says, "be whipped by a salt-sea roarer," be a dandy without whiskers; a fool without vanity; a Dutchman without a pipe, or a Frenchman without a fiddle, than a very clever fellow.

The story is most veritable, and the moral is plain. H.

THE DESERTED MANSION.

BY AUGUSTA.

That solemn chime tells of the midnight hour—
December's blast comes with a mournful sound;
Pale beams the moon o'er yon deserted tower,
And solitude and silence brood around.

Dark is that mansion, as though death's cold pall
O'er festive board and downy couch was flung;
Wild echo moans along its lonely hall,
Which erst with music's dulcet measures rung.

From its broad casements flash no cheering rays—
No sounds of harmony breathe on the ear—
No social friends surround the hearth's bright blaze,
But all is silent, desolate, and drear.

Oh where are now the forms I used to see?
Oh where the voices that I loved to hear?
Departed—silent—gone—alas for me!
Wrapt in the veil that shrouds the parting year.

While as I gaze on yon deserted walls,
Fond retrospection lights her sacred urn,
And many a scene of happiness recalls,
Too bright to last, too blissful to return.

Though fairer forms may meet beneath that dome,
Though gayer notes may charm the listening ear,
Still it will never—never be the home
Of those whom memory long will cherish dear.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

WE must compliment the managers of all the theatres for unusual efforts to produce a variety of novelties. We trust Mrs. Hilson will soon appear again upon the boards which she has trod so long, and with so much honor to herself. Miss Clara Fisher is repeating her charming performances. She sustained a part in the new piece called the Female Brigand, with her wonted success. We were prevented from attending the benefit of Mr. Sinclair; but learn he was received by a large and highly respectable auditory.

The American theatre has brought out Mr. Butler, whose performance of Coriolanus and Virginius was not marked by any particular excellence. Mrs. Butler, a pretty woman and pleasing actress, was more successful in several light characters. An individual, who, we understand, is an honest Hibernian, but who is politely christened in the bills Monsieur Gouffe, has gained considerable eclat as an ape, and, by the display of certain wonderful feats of agility and strength, is likely to fling the whole tribe of his predecessors into the shade. Miss Waring, a promising young actress, was rewarded by a very fair benefit. She has good talents, and is always perfect in her part. She is invaluable in the establishment, and we can find no fault with her except that she plays too much to the house; a common error, which may be easily corrected. We regret to notice the absence of Mr. Taylor from the orchestra.

Several attractive performers have appeared at the Richmond Hill; and, among others, Finn and Kilner, who, it would be superfluous to repeat, are first in their respective departments. Mr. Sutton, the ventriloquist, has given several clever specimens of his art. Mr. Biddle made a passable first appearance in Sir Edward Mortimer. Mr. Field played Wilford well. We are pleased to perceive that he has an opportunity of sustaining characters calculated to display his talents to advantage. He conceives his part with much ability, and is rapidly improving. Mr. Russell was capital in Charles Surface. He merits much praise for his enterprise as a manager, and his acknowledged versatility as an actor; as a genteel comedian he has few equals.

LITERARY NOTICES.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

SALLUST's celebrated "Account of Cataline's Conspiracy and the Jugurthine War," is lately from the press of the brothers Harper. The improvements and additions which the translator, Mr. Rose, has made to the original, are brief and much to the purpose, furnishing the reader with a succinct continuation of the accounts which the distinguished Roman historian has terminated so abruptly. The editor of the National Gazette quotes Lord Monboddo's Origin and Progress of Language in censure of the style of Sallust. The work is nevertheless an instructive and entertaining narration, and is very properly embodied in the Classical Family Library.

The same industrious publishers have also issued the "Life of Sir Isaac Newton," by David Brewster, as the twenty-sixth number of their Family Library. To a healthy and enlightened mind, this volume contains attractions rarely to be found in works of fiction. Besides a mass of scientific information, and several graphic sketches of eminent men, it places the world in possession of facts and reports in relation to the extraordinary author of the "Principia," not generally known.

An edition of "Flora's Dictionary" has appeared in Baltimore, which is praised by the critics.

A new annual, entitled the "Amaranth," conducted by J. H. Buckingham, Esq. has been published in Newburyport. The talents of the editor and the contributors are a safe pledge of something excellent. Among the latter are Mrs. Sigourney and Miss Gould.

Several sheets of the new satirical poem have been handed us by Peabody and Co. It is called "Rodooshake's Visit from the Moon," and seems from a practised hand.

The American has the following remarks respecting Mr. Knapp's Life of Webster:

"This memoir, written with a flowing pen, with an earnest admiration for the distinguished man who is its subject, and with a just pride in him as a son of New England, is also recommended by its excellent mechanical execution. It should be universally read, for it is the record of a career, which every citizen endowed with equal capacity and equal industry, may run, until, like Daniel Webster, he becomes the boast of a nation. We hope the biographer may be substantially rewarded by a large demand for his elegant memoir. The engraving prefixed to it is more like Mr. Webster than any we have before seen."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

A HIGHLAND ANECDOTE.

THE following anecdote, communicated to the editor of the London Keepsake, is from the pen of Sir Walter Scott.

The same course of reflection which led me to transmit to you the account of the death of an ancient borderer,* induces me to add the particulars of a singular incident, affording a point which seems highly qualified to be illustrated by the pencil. It was suggested by the spirited engraving of the Gored Huntsman, which adorned the first number of your work, and perhaps bears too close a resemblance to the character of that print to admit of your choosing it as a subject for another. Of this you are the only competent judge.

The story is an old, but not an ancient one; the actor and sufferer was not a very aged man, when I heard the anecdote in my early youth. Duncan, for so shall I call him, had been engaged in the affair of 1746, with others of his class, and was supposed by many to have been an accomplice, if not the principal actor in a certain tragic affair, which made much noise a good many years after the rebellion. I am content with indicating this, in order to give some idea of the man's character, which was bold, fierce, and enterprising. Traces of this natural disposition still remained on Duncan's very good features, and in his keen gray eye. But the limbs, like those of the aged borderer in my former tale, had become unable to serve the purposes and obey the dictates of his inclination. On the one side of his body he retained the proportions and firmness of an active mountaineer; on the other he was a disabled cripple, scarce able to limp along the streets. The cause which reduced him to this state of infirmity was singular.

Twenty years or more before I knew Duncan, he assisted his brothers in forming a large grazing† in the Highlands, comprehending an extensive range of mountain and forest, land morass, lake and precipice. It chanced that a sheep or goat was missed from the flocks, and Duncan, not satisfied with dispatching his shepherds in one direction, went himself in quest of the fugitive in another.

In the course of his researches, he was induced to ascend a small and narrow path, leading to the top of a high precipice. Dangerous as it was at first, the road became doubly so as he advanced. It was not much more than two feet broad, so rugged and difficult and, at the same time so terrible, that it would have been impracticable to any but the light step and steady brain of a Highlander. The precipice on the right rose like a wall, and on the left sunk to a depth which it was giddy to look down upon; but Duncan passed cheerfully on, now whistling the Gathering of his Clan, now taking heed to his footsteps, when the difficulties of the path particularly required caution.

In this manner, he had more than half ascended the precipice, when in midway, and it might almost be said, in middle air, he encountered a buck, of the red deer species, running down the cliff by the same path, in an opposite direction. If Duncan had had a gun, no rencontre could have been more agreeable; but as he had not this advantage over the denizen of the wilderness, the meeting was in the highest degree unwelcome. Neither party had the power of retreating, for the stag had not room to turn himself in the narrow path, and if Duncan had turned his back to go down, he knew enough of the creature's habits to be certain that he would rush upon him while engaged in the difficulty of the retreat. They stood therefore perfectly still, and looked at each other in mutual embarrassment for some space.

At length the deer, which was of the largest size, began to lower his formidable antlers, as they do when they are brought to bay, and are preparing to rush upon hound and huntsman. Duncan saw the danger of a conflict in which he must probably come by the worst, and as a last resource stretched himself on the little ledge of rock which he occupied, and thus awaited the resolution which the deer should take, not making the least motion for fear of alarming the wild and suspicious animal. They remained in this posture for three or four hours, in the midst of a rock which would have suited the pencil of Salvator, and which afforded barely room enough for the man and the stag, opposed to each other in this extraordinary manner.

At length the buck seemed to take the resolution of passing over the obstacle which lay in his path, and with this purpose approached towards Duncan very slowly, and with excessive caution. When he came close to the Highlander, he stooped his head down as if to examine him more closely, when the devil, or the untameable love of sport, peculiar to his country, began to overcome Duncan's fears. Seeing the animal proceed so gently, he totally forgot not only the dangers of his position, but the nuptial compact which certainly might have been inferred from the circumstances of the situation. With one hand Duncan seized the deer's horns, whilst with the other, he drew his dirk. But in the same instant, the buck bounded over the precipice, carrying the Highlander along with him. They went thus down upwards of a hundred feet, and were found the next morning in the spot where they fell. Fortune, who does not always regard retributive justice in her dispensations, ordered that the deer should fall underneath and be killed upon the spot, while Duncan escaped with his life, but with the fracture of a leg, an arm, and three ribs. In this state he was found lying on the carcass of the deer, and the injuries which he had received rendered him for the remainder of his life the cripple I have described. I never could approve of Duncan's conduct towards the deer in a moral point of view, (although, as the man in the play said, he was my friend) but the temptation of a hart of grease, offering, as it were, his throat to the knife, would have subdued the virtue of almost any deer-stalker. Whether the anecdote is worth recording, or deserving of illustration, remains for your consideration. I have given you the story exactly as I recollect it.

* "The Death of the Laird's Jock," published in the Keepsake, for 1829.—Ed. † A pastoral farm.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1831.

Next Engravings.—Three more quarto engravings will appear in the course of the present volume. We shall publish the first in a few weeks. It is a fine portrait of WASHINGTON IRVING, executed on steel by Hatch and Smillie, from a recent picture by Leslie, which the British critics, and those at present most familiar with the original, have pronounced "the man himself." This has been necessarily delayed for a short time, to afford the artists every opportunity to render it not only an accurate likeness, but a specimen of the best American engraving. As it is understood that Mr. Irving is about revisiting this his native city, we deem the publication of this plate a deserved compliment to him, and an appropriate offering to the country, to whose literary reputation he has so much contributed, and which he has so frequently delighted with his admirable delineations.

The Revenge of St. Nicholas.—The most piquant and charming productions of men of genius are not unfrequently struck off in their moments of relaxation from more elaborate works. We have ever been delighted with the writings of Mr. Paulding, and esteem him one of the most highly gifted authors of which this country can boast. There is a class of humorous essays and tales, in the composition of which he is unrivalled by any writer within our knowledge. The "Revenge of St. Nicholas" is one of this kind; and, in our judgment, among his happiest efforts. Having ourselves derived great entertainment from the perusal of it, we cannot refrain from commending it to the special attention of our readers, particularly such as are over-zealous in encroaching upon the good old customs of the merry St. Nicholas.

Editor's Study.—The fine high-spirited boy whom we mentioned some time ago, as being under the malignant influence of a cross schoolmaster, burst into our room early the other morning, and broke a dream that we had drawn a prize in the lottery, to wish us a merry Christmas. "All his little miniature sorrows are now forgotten. His eyes are as bright and his cheeks as rosy as if he had never been beaten for not knowing the difference between a copulative and a disjunctive conjunction, or for forgetting that the word which his tyrant called fiat commenced with a p. The young dog has hung up his stocking, and received such lavish gifts from the good St. Nicholas, that the overflowings of his delighted heart would no longer permit him to refrain from calling upon me, his trusty friend and ally, to participate in his joy. He has a magnificent humming-top and a Chinese puzzle, several profound volumes of history and travels, enriched with wood cuts of various places on the globe, and their inhabitants, some admirable story books, and other fanciful gifts, to say nothing of liberal supplies of sugar-plums and new-year cakes, and, putting his arms around our neck, he whispered the important secret with every sign of exhilaration, that he was to have "holiday for a whole week."

We remember to have heard an anecdote of a boy, connected with this famous fashion of hanging up the stocking, which, though a mere trifle, will not be devoid of interest, at least to parents. It seems this little fellow had committed some wickedness in the catalogue of youthful crimes on the eve of the long-wished-for festival. He did not retire to rest, however, without having suspended his stocking, to solicit the bounty of the patron saint of infant New-Yorkers, and arose the next morning to examine into the nature of his treasures. With exclamations of delight, his little brothers and sisters discovered their stockings abundantly supplied with every thing to gratify their fancy and make their happiness complete, besides encouraging notes from their affectionate and invisible divinity, but when he explored his own receipts, imagine his cruel disappointment on drawing forth—a whip. The anger of St. Nicholas and his own ill conduct betrayed so publicly, and coming upon him with the suddenness and force of a thunderbolt, in a moment of such highly-wrought and joyful expectation, swelled his innocent heart nearly to breaking. Our informant described it in a graphic manner, and as a scene which would have formed an apt subject for a picture. The terrible emblem of supernatural displeasure was no sooner produced than the gay groupe of lovely young children was struck into motionless astonishment. Their lively voices were hushed in an instant. The rich and glittering fragments of childish splendor lay around unregarded, while the hero of the tragedy, with the dark-looking thong in his hand, stood like a statue, his glowing cheeks turned to an ashy paleness—his uplifted eyes streaming with tears, and giving no other sign of life than a quivering of the lip, and a throbbing of the heart till he fell senseless to the floor. The alarmed parents hastened to recover him, and sought, by convincing him that they themselves, and no angry angel, had put in the whip as a method of punishing him for his late offences, to relieve his terrors and calm his grief; but their scheme had taken a strong hold on a lively and uninformed imagination, and struck more deeply a tender young heart than they supposed. The consequence was a fever and delirium of an alarming kind, and a bitterness of anguish which it took months to soothe.

We trust at this season our young friends will not be troubled with whips, either on their shoulders or in their stockings, for we consider them as the rightful inheritors of most of the real merriment at present afloat. Indeed, much as we talk of the several holidays and festivities which diversify the year, no one greets them with such a hearty welcome as the boys. They measure the flight of time by these great landmarks. On the first of April if you find a letter, penknife, pocket-book, or a check for five thousand dollars in the street, don't stoop to pick it up, for just as you grasp at it, and think good-luck has befriended you at last, it will disappear from between your fingers, and the suppressed titlers of a troop of mischievous tatterdemallions, concealed behind a cellar-door, or round the corner, will let you into the agreeable secret that you have been made a fool of. The immortal Washington, on the publication of our declaration of independence, was not more sincere in his gratification than they on the return of that great climacteric of American holidays; and the evacuation of the British causes as much triumph every year among whole armies of the juvenile race, as it did to the sober citizens who thereby regained their homes. How we have mused to behold a groupe of ragamuffins, infinitely happier than so many kings, venting their patriotic principles in shouts and merriment, on the eighth of January, before a huge transparency representing the famous hero of New-Orleans, with a formidable broadsword in one hand, and leaning the other on the mane of a war-charger, of extraordinary fierceness, appropriately decorated with blue and yellow lamps. Men cannot sufficiently unbend their minds from business to enter into the true spirit of these occasions. They wish each other merry Christmas as if they were going to be hanged; and their "happy new year" comes out as dolefully as we have seen a comic actor on his benefit night go through a facetious part to empty boxes. We cannot forget the cares of yesterday—we cannot refrain from anticipating the troubles of to-morrow. Bills are crowding in—money is running out. B. G. and L. Higgin's note comes due next Tuesday. Such an one has failed, and such a stock has fallen. There is not one man in ten but will tell you, if he speaks the truth, that wishing him a happy new year, sounds in his ears like an insult. A friend of mine is afflicted with a "lady intellectual," who acts towards him like a Xantippe. He does not pretend to be a Socrates; wish him a happy new year, and I think it not impossible he may knock you down. Will Whipple has been ten years courting a sweet belle about town, who gave him "his walking ticket," as one of his friends expresses it, on Christmas-eve. When our carrier wished him a merry Christmas, he told him to go to the—~~hell~~. How many are there whose affairs are equally crossed with perplexities and disappointments. But your true boy is of a more untameable spirit. Set one of these adrift on the fourth of July, with a few packs of crackers, some powder, and an old pistol, and what cares he that he is to be beaten when he goes back to school, so long as he can contribute to the general racket in the cause of freedom?

As for us, amid all the mirth of these times, we confess ourselves secretly prone to a little moralizing and melancholy. It is not that we are infected with a spirit of narrow repining, but our mind finds a kind of mournful satisfaction in dwelling upon even the darker touches with which the wisdom of Providence has overshadowed the picture of human life. We have seen enough of the world to perceive that happiness consists no more in noisy amusement than patient humility and calm meditation. It is good for us to know what we are, and to familiarize ourselves with the vicissitudes to which we are for ever exposed. When all around us, therefore, abandon themselves to lively pleasure, when the blooming bride blushes to receive friendly congratulations, and the father of a virtuous family smiles as he regards the beings whom he has protected and made contented, an irresistible impulse carries our thoughts forward through the dim glimmerings of the future, and back upon the events of the past. These universal holidays form prominent points in the year, which remind us to compare what we are with what we have been and what we may be. And we cannot but also admit into our speculations the destinies of the beings around us. The young stir up our fancy to conjecture the scenes through which they must pass, and the aged to discover the adventures they have already experienced. It is wonderful as we grow old how our mind broadens, and from the sight of a single object grasps innumerable additional ideas. We remember when the appearance of a Christmas dinner enlivened us only with thoughts of good cheer and merry-making. Now it is pregnant with grave reflections, and fills us with a crowd of moral images and pensive associations. We wonder at the benevolent skill with which heaven has so constructed our race, that notwithstanding all the gloomy events which crush human feelings from one year to another, the great game still goes joyfully on—that although the arrow of grief has quivered in many a bosom, while the earth was performing her vast annual circuit, the wounds are so nearly healed. Within twelve brief months what ravages, what fearful ravages, have been wrought by misfortune and death—how many are exposed to the perils of distant places who should now be with us—how many are stretched out in the pain and suspense of dangerous disease—how many have been borne to their last cold sleeping-place! Who so thoughtless as to remember the past without reading a lesson for the future? The approaching year will be but a type of that which is gone. They who sit by our side to-day may be missed when the rolling months shall bring on another season of mirth. There is a sweet moral in these thoughts. We would press it upon the attention especially of our youthful readers. Let them reflect upon it when passion swells their bosoms, and they will check the malignant look, and hush the angry retort. When the reckless son wounds the feelings of his mother, or the impatient husband vents his ill humor on his wife—when ungentle words rise between brother and sister, or friend and friend, let there come up to their fancy the image of a grave, newly spread over the pallid face of the companion whose petty fault now agitates their bosom with rage and revenge. Surely the tumult of passion must be calmed, and they will feel the almost unloosened bonds of love drawing their hearts together more closely. They will be more inclined to see each other's virtues than their errors. They will exclaim with poor Eve, shrinking from the upbraidings of Adam after the fall,

"While yet we live, (scarce one short hour perhaps,) Between us two let there be peace;"

and many a rude scene of domestic commotion will be spared to their future recollections.

As we have inadvertently degenerated into a kind of gravity which some may hold as treason against the dominion of the renowned saint who presides over the new-year jubilee of the sagacious inhabitants of this now thriving metropolis, we will close the article by printing the following epistle, only premising that, at least among printers, the extreme neatness of the manuscript will go farther in making the writer a favorite, than the most "radiant eyes" and the "dearest little feet" in the world.

GENTLEMEN—This is to let you know, that I am one of a numerous class of young women who have not the most distant pretensions to beauty. It has pleased heaven to make me plain-looking, and also to endue me with too much good sense to be ashamed of a circumstance so purely accidental and beyond my own control. But while I am frank to confess I am homely, I must be bold to assure you, that I consider myself possessed of intelligence, education, and an amiable disposition, becoming a lady, and which I would not barter for the countenance of Mary of Scotland, or the far-famed Grecian Helen. I shall pass over the poor estimation in which I have been compelled to hold many a reputed gentleman of talents, on observing him waste an evening by the side of some pretty simpleton, in the most nonsensical discourse, to the neglect of others who could have entertained him with rational conversation, or at least who would not have treated him to such unmeaning absurdities as must afford the most contemptuous opinion of our sex. Nor do I write this to complain that no street coxcomb looks under my bonnet twice, nor that I am certain not to be asked to dance at a party till all the pretty countenances in the room are taken possession of. These are trivial evils, to which I have long since become accustomed. But there is an evil of a more general nature, into which you literary gentlemen have fallen. You write as if our sex were all cast in the mould of a Hebe or a Venus. You never address yourselves to one of us particularly, but we are your "fair" or "pretty reader." One would think, by your discourses, that all the females who honor themselves by perusing your miscellany, were the most beautiful creatures in the universe, or that one who was not especially handsome you did not consider as a woman, or at least you did not desire to meddle with your paper. Pray inform us what degree of loveliness we must possess before we may presume to class ourselves among your readers, whom you never speak to but to compliment them for their "radiant eyes," their "ripe, pouting, and perfect mouths," their "long lashes," and their "pretty feet?" Now this is to inform you, that I for one am not handsome. My eyes are not "radiant." My mouth may be "ripe" enough, to be sure, as the mouths of women ought to be who have seen both sides of five and twenty; but it is not particularly "pouting," and by no means "perfect," especially since I have lost one of my conspicuous teeth. And my foot is of such liberal dimensions, that, although I scorn to be ashamed of it, I am not so strongly tempted as some to curtail my wearing apparel; and you will not find me sticking it out on an ottoman for any male admirer of symmetry to look at. I am settled in the opinion that my eyes could never do serious injury to any susceptible youth, let me look up at him ever so suddenly from my reading or my sewing; and though divers promising personages in whiskers have done me the honor to take my hand in the dance, I could never perceive that they were "thrilled," though the inexperienced might conclude, from the descriptions of your secret pressures on such occasions, that every boarding-school miss was a full-charged electrifying machine. I was some time since reading a communication aloud to several of my family and one or two visitors, when the allusions to the beautiful reader's tender eyes and pouting lips put the hearers to some trouble to suppress a smile, and, till I called reflection to my aid, overcame me with confusion.

Pray, Messrs. Editors, use your influence with authors to abandon this silly style. I have known a modest girl thus beguiled into reading praises of her golden locks, when she had red hair; and another uttering compliments to her unshadowed forehead, who in reality had no forehead at all. Writers should learn to address themselves rather to women of warm hearts and clear understandings, than to sylphs and nymphs with pouting lips and dangerous eyes. Certainly intellect will be of more assistance to them in unravelling the meaning of an abstruse argument, and in appreciating a piece of elegant sentiment or a sly turn of humor, than all the graces of appearance; though one would suppose, from your constant appeals to the various parts of a girl's face and figure, that a little foot must amazingly help her through an elaborate essay, or a pair of long dark lashes assist her in seeing into a pathetic description.—I am, with great respect, yours, &c. A BALLAD—THE WORDS AND MELODY BY JOSEPH GOULD.

If you knew the rich plea-sure I feel in my tears, You would not per-suade me to dry them, And the un-dis-turb'd bliss-es of so ma-ny years, But add to the woes that sup-ply them; I am bound by a spell, that I can-not un-do, She has gain'd a fond heart, and has bro-ken it too, Oh! how fond was my poor fool-ish heart to be-lieve, That be-cause she was love-ly she could not de-ceive.

SECOND VERSE.

How kind were her smiles, how expressive her looks,
And how sweet fell the words from her lip,
But how like the soft rills of a poisonous brook,
Giving death unto all that would sip;
But this frame will soon rest from its cares and its fears,
And lose e'en the pleasure I feel in my tears;
Oh! how fond was my poor foolish heart to believe,
That because she was lovely she could not deceive.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

EPICEDUM.

BY JAMES LAWSON.

GONE, gone, dead and gone,
To the church-yard dank and lone!
It seems to me as yesterday,
That she who now is silent clay,
Was in heart the lightest,
And in eye the brightest;
Was in step the fleetest,
And in voice the sweetest;
Health was upon her young cheek blooming,
And flowers were in her path perfuming.
Her presence was—a dream of bliss,
Her smile, a ray of loveliness.
The graces held with her their reign,
While pleasure sported in the train;
And all of bright and pure and fair,
To praise or prize was mingled there.
Where now are music, mirth, and flowers,
And where the dearest one of ours?
Gone, gone, dead and gone,
To the church-yard, dank and lone!

Gone, gone, dead and gone,
To the church-yard, dank and lone!
Although it was as yesterday,
'Twas in my own loved isle, away
A thousand leagues beyond the sea,
That she appeared all this to me—
I did not hear her latest sigh,
Nor soothed a pang, nor closed an eye,
Received no blessing, heard no prayer,
Saw not her grave, nor mourners there;
Unconscious I of grief or fear,
Of corse or knell, of pall or bier,
Of mourners' grief and friends' despair—
I could not know—I was not there!
The stars that hid their fires from them,
To me decked nature's diadem;
Each cherished thing beneath their light
Was fair and lovely to my sight,
But soon, too sad the tidings came,
For heart to hear or lip to name—
For where was she, who by my side
Had bloomed of me and mine the pride?
Gone, gone, dead and gone,
To the church-yard, dank and lone!

Gone, gone, dead and gone,
To the church-yard, dank and lone!
They tell how gently passed her breath,
How beautiful she lay in death!
That while around her all were weeping,
They could not deem but she was sleeping.
Yet soon the cold, the pallid look
And form her lovely features took;
The fixed eye, the marble brow,
The lips so pale and breathless now;
All on their hearts were sadly stealing,
To wake the lone and dreary feeling,
That she so long and dearly cherished,
Had like the summer roses perished—
As perfume oft survives the flowers,
Remembrance only lives of ours—
Gone, gone, dead and gone,
To the church-yard, dank and lone!
Gone, gone, dead and gone,
To the church-yard, dank and lone!
Now soon the gentle zephyrs winging
On laden pinions perfume bringing,
Will waft again the breath of flowers,
And fragrantcy of summer hours;

And soon will blythe-voiced maidens stray,
By ripened meads of wave-like hay;
Soon by the fields of bearding grain,
The husbandman will smile again;
Soon will the shepherd's pipe prevail,
To glad his flocks on hill and dale;
And soon the note of mavis sounding,
When morn o'er eastern hills is bounding;
Soon will awake the blackbird's song,
When twilight would the day prolong;
Soon all that grow, or live, or breathe,
Will smile the balmy skies beneath.
But though come zephyrs, songs, and flowers,
O where will be the pride of ours?
Gone, gone, dead and gone,
To the church-yard, dank and lone!

LOVE AND AUTHORSHIP.

A SKETCH FROM ENGLISH LIFE.

"WILL you remember me?"
"Yes!"
"Will you keep your hand for me for a year?"
"Yes!"
"Will you answer me when I write to you?"
"Yes!"
"One request more—should I succeed, will you marry me in spite of your uncle?"

"Yes!" There was no pause—reply followed question, as if it were a dialogue which they had got by heart—and by heart indeed they had got it—but I leave you to guess the book they had conned it from.

'Twas in a green lane, on a summer's evening, about nine o'clock, when the west, like a gate of gold, had shut upon the retiring sun, that Rosalie and her lover, arm-in-arm, walked up and down; and much of what they said never came to the ear, though their souls caught up every word of it.

Rosalie was upwards of five years the junior of her lover. She had known him since she was a little girl in her twelfth year. He was almost eighteen then, and when she thought far more about a doll than a husband, he would set her upon his knee, and call her his little wife. One, two, three years passed on, and still, whenever he came from college, and as usual went to pay his first visit at her father's, before he had been five minutes in the parlor, the door was flung open, and in bounded Rosalie, and claimed her accustomed seat. The fact was, till she was fifteen she was a child of a very slow growth, and looked the girl when many a companion of hers of the same age began to appear the woman.

When another vacation, however, came round, and Theodore paid his customary call, and was expecting his little wife, as usual, the door opened slowly, and a tall young lady entered, and curtsying, colored and walked to a seat next the lady of the house. The visitor stood up and bowed, and sat down again, without knowing who it was.

"Don't you know Rosalie?" exclaimed her father.

"Rosalie!" replied Theodore, in an accent of surprise; and approached his little wife of old, who rose and half gave him her hand, and curtsying, colored again; and sat down without hardly interchanging a word with him. No wonder—she was four inches taller than when he had last seen her; and her bulk had expanded correspondingly, while her features, that half a year before gave one the idea of a sylph that would bound after a butterfly, had now mellowed in their expression, into the sentiment, the softness, and the reserve of the woman.

Theodore felt absolutely disappointed. Five minutes before, he was all volubility. No sooner was one question answered than he proposed another—and he had so many capital stories for Rosalie, when she came down—and yet, when Rosalie did come down, he sat as though he had not a word to say for himself. In short, everything and everybody in the house seemed to have changed along with its young mistress; he felt no longer at home in it, as he was wont; and in less than a quarter of an hour he made his bow and departed.

Now this was exceedingly strange; for Rosalie, from a pretty little girl, had turned into a lovely young woman. If a heart looked out of her eyes before, a soul looked out of them now; her arm, which formerly the sun had been allowed to salute when he liked, and which used to bear the trace of many a kiss that he had given it, now shone white through a sleeve of muslin, like snow behind a veil of haze; her bosom had enlarged its wavy curve, and leaving her waist little more than the span it was, sat proudly heaving above it; and the rest of her form which, only six months ago, looked trim and airy in her short and close-fitting frock, now lengthening and throwing out its flowing line, stood stately in the folds of a long and ample drapery. Yet could not all this make up for the want of the little wife that used to come and take her seat upon Theodore's knee.

To be sure there was another way of accounting for the young man's chagrin. He might have been disappointed that Rosalie, when five feet four, should be a little more reserved than she used to be when she was only five feet nothing. Romantic young men, too, are apt to fancy odd things. Theodore was a very romantic young man; and having, perhaps, traced for himself the woman in the child—as one will anticipate, in looking at a peach that is just knit, the hue, and form, and flavor of the consummate fruit—he might have set Rosalie down in his mind as his wife in earnest, when he appeared to call her so only in jest.

Such was the case. Theodore never calculated that Rosalie knew nothing about his dreams—that she had no such visions herself; he never anticipated that the frankness of girlhood would vanish, as soon as the diffidence of young womanhood begun its blushing reign; the thought never occurred to him that the day would come when Rosalie would scruple to sit on his knee—ay, even though Rosalie should then begin to think upon him, as for many a year before he had thought upon her. He returned from college the fifth time; he found that the woman which he imagined in a year or two she would become, was surpassed by the woman that she already was; he remarked the withdrawal of confidence, the limitation of familiarity—the penalty which he must inevitably pay for her maturing—and he felt repelled and chilled and utterly disheartened by it.

For a whole week he never returned to the house. Three days of a second week elapsed, and still he kept away. He had been invited, however, to a ball which was to be given there the day following; and much as he was inclined to absent himself, being a little more inclined to go, he went.

Full three hours was he in the room without once setting eyes upon Rosalie. He saw her mother and her father, and talked with them; he saw squire this, and doctor that, and attorney such-a-one, and had fifty things to say to each of them; he had eyes and a tongue for everybody but Rosalie—not a look or a word did he exchange with her; yet he was here and there and everywhere! In short, he was all communicativeness and vivacity, so that every one remarked how bright he had become since his last visit to college!

At last, however, his fine spirits all, at once seemed to forsake him, and he withdrew to the library, which was lighted up for the occasion as an anti-room, and taking a volume out of the book-case, threw himself into a chair, and began to turn over the leaves.

"Have you forgotten your little wife?" said a soft voice near him; it was Rosalie's—"if you have," she added, as he started from his seat, "she has not forgotten you!"

She wore a carnation in her hair—the hue of the flower was not deeper than that of her cheek, as she stood and extended her hands to Theodore, who, the moment he rose, had held forth both of his.

"Rosalie!"

"Theodore!"—He led her to a sofa, which stood in a recess on the opposite side of the room, and gave no other word did they exchange.

At length she gently withdrew her hand from his—~~he~~ offered him to hold it all that time—"We shall be observed," said she.

"Ah," replied he, "nine months since you did not mind that!"

"You know that I am a woman now," rejoined she, hanging her head; "and—and—will you lead off the next dance with me?" cried she, suddenly changing the subject. "There now; I have asked you!" added she, "which is more than you deserve?"—of course Theodore was not at all happy to accept the challenge of the metamorphosed Rosalie.

One might suppose that the young lady's heart was interested, and that Theodore was a far happier man than he imagined himself to be. The fact was neither more nor less. Little Rosalie was proud of being called Theodore's wife, because she heard everybody else speak in praise of him. Many a marriageable young lady had she heard declare—not minding to speak before a child—that Theodore was the finest young man in B—; that she hoped Theodore would be at such or such a house where she was going to dine, or to spend the evening; nay, that she would like to have a sweetheart like Theodore. Then would Rosalie interpose, and with a saucy toss of her head exclaim, that nobody should have Theodore but herself, for she was his little wife. It was thus she learned to admire the face and person of Theodore, who more than once paid for her acquired estimation of them; for sometimes before a whole room-full of company she would march up to him, and scanning him from head to foot, with folded arms, at length declare aloud, that he was the handsomest young man in B—. Then Theodore was so kind to her, and thought so much of anything she did, and took such notice of her! Often, at a dance, he would make her his partner for the whole evening; and there was Miss Willoughby, perhaps, or Miss Millar, sitting down; either of whom would have given her eyes to stand up in a reel with him.

But when the summer of her seventeenth year beheld her bursting into womanhood; when her expanding thoughts, from a bounding, fitful, rill-like current, began to run a deep, a broad, and steady stream; when she found that he was almost arrived at the threshold of the world, and reflected that the step which marks a female's first entrance into it is generally taken in the hand of a partner—the thought of who that partner might be, recalled Theodore to her mind—and her heart fluttered as she asked herself the question—should she ever be indeed his wife.

When, this time, he paid his first visit, Rosalie was as much mortified as he was. Her vexation was increased when she saw that he absented himself; she resolved, if possible, to ascertain the cause; and persuaded her mother to give a ball, and specially invite the young gentleman. He came; she watched him; observed that he neither inquired after her nor sought for her; and marked the excellent terms that he was upon with twenty people, about whom she knew him to be perfectly indifferent. Women have a perception of the workings of the heart, far more quick and subtle than we have. She was convinced that all his fine spirits were forced—that he was acting a part. She suspected that while he appeared to be occupied with everybody but her, she was the only one that was running in his thoughts. She saw him withdraw to the library; she followed him, found him sitting down with a book in his hand, perceived, from his manner of turning over the leaves, that he was intent on anything but reading. She was satisfied that he was thinking of nothing but her. The thought that she might one day indeed become his wife, now occurred to her for the thousandth time, and a thousand times stronger than ever; a spirit diffused itself through her heart which had never been breathed into it before, and filling it with hope and happiness, and unutterable contentment, irresistibly drew it towards him. She approached him, accosted him, and in a moment was seated with him upon the sofa!

As soon as the dance was done, Theodore said, "'Tis almost as warm in the air as in the room; will you be afraid to take a turn with me in the garden?"

"I shall get my shawl in a minute," said Rosalie, "and meet you there;" and the maiden was there almost as soon as he.

They proceeded, arm-in-arm, to the farthest part of the garden; and there they walked up and down without either seeming inclined to speak.

"Rosalie!" at last breathed Theodore, "Rosalie!" breathed he a second time, before the expecting girl could summon courage to say "Well?"

"I cannot go home to-night," resumed he, "without speaking to you." Yet Theodore seemed to be in no hurry to speak; for here he stopped, and continued silent so long, that Rosalie began to doubt whether he would open his lips again.

"Had we not better go in?" said she, "I think I hear them breaking up."

"Not yet."

"They'll miss me."

"What of that?"

"Nay," resumed the maid, "we have remained long enough, and at least allow me to go in."

"Stop but another minute, dear Rosalie!" imploringly exclaimed the youth.

"For what?" was the maid's reply.

"Rosalie," without a pause resumed Theodore, "you used to let me call you wife. Are those times passed for ever?"

"When we have done with our girl-hood, we have done with our plays," said she.

"Hear me!" cried Theodore. "The first day I took you upon my knee, and called you my wife, just as it seemed to be, my heart was never more in earnest. That day I wedded you in my soul; for though you were a child, I saw the future woman in you, rich in the richest attractions of your sex. Nay, do me justice; recall what you yourself have known of me; inquire of others. To whom did I play the suitor from that day? To none but you, although to you I did not seem to play it. Was I not always with you? Recollect now! Did a day pass, when I was at home, without my coming to your father's house? When there were parties there, whom did I sit beside, but you? Whom did I stand behind at the piano-forte, but you? Nay, for a whole night, whom have I danced with, but you? Whatever you might have thought then, can you believe now, that it was merely a playful child that could so have engrossed me? No, it was the generous, lovely, loving woman, that I saw in the playful child. For five years have I loved you, though I never declared it to you till now. Do you think I am worthy of you? Will you give yourself to me?"

Three or four times Rosalie made an effort to speak; but desisted, as if she knew not what to say, or was unable to say what she wished. At last, "Ask my father's consent!" she exclaimed, and tried to get away; but before she could effect it, she was clasped to the bosom of Theodore, nor released until the interchange of the first pledge of love had been forced from her bashful lips! She did not appear, that night, in the drawing-room again.

Theodore's addresses were sanctioned by the parents of the maid. The wedding-day was fixed—it wanted but a fortnight to it—when a malignant fever made its appearance in the town; Rosalie's parents were the first victims. She was left an orphan at eighteen; and her uncle, by her mother's side, who had been nominated her guardian in a will, made several years, having followed his brother-in-law and sister's remains to the grave, took up his residence at B—.

Rosalie's sole consolation now, was such as she received from the society of Theodore; but Theodore soon wanted consolation himself. His father was attacked by the fever and died, leaving his affairs, to the astonishment of every one, in a state of the most inextricable embarrassment; for he had been looked upon as one of the wealthiest inhabitants of B—. This was a double blow to Theodore, but he was not aware of the weight of it till, after the interment of his father, he repaired, for the first time, to resume his visits.

He was stepping up without ceremony to the drawing-room, when the servant begged his pardon for stopping him, telling him at the same time, that he had received instructions from his master to show him into the parlor when he should call.

"Was Miss Wilford there?"

"No,"—Theodore was shown into the parlor. Of all savage brutes, the human brute is the most pernicious and revolting, because he unites to the evil properties of the inferior animal the mental faculties of the superior one—and then he is at large. A vicious tempered dog you can muzzle, and render innocuous; but there is no preventing the human dog that bites from fleshing his tooth—he is sure to have it in somebody. And then the infliction is so immeasurably more severe!—the quick of the mind is so much more sensitive than that of the body! Besides, the savage that runs upon four legs is so inferior in performance to him that walks upon two! It is he that knows how to gnaw! I have often thought it a pity and a sin that the man who plays the dog should be protected from dying the death of one. He should hang, and the other go free.

"Well, young gentleman!" was the salutation which Theodore received when he entered the parlor; "and pray what brings you here?"

Theodore was struck dumb; and no wonder.

"Your father, I understand, has died a beggar!—Do you think to marry my niece?" If Theodore respired with difficulty before, his breath was utterly taken away at this. He was a young man of spirit, but who can keep up his heart when his ship, all at once, is going down.

The human dog went on. "Young gentleman, I shall be plain with you, for I am a straight forward man; young women should mate with their matches—you are no match for my niece; so a good morning to you!" How more in place to have wished him a good halter! Saying this, the straight forward savage walked out of the parlor, leaving the door wide open, that Theodore might have room for egress, and steadily walked up stairs.

It was several minutes before he could recover his self-recollection. When he did so he rang the bell.

"Tell your master I wish to speak to him," said Theodore to the servant who answered it. The servant went up stairs after his master, and returned.

"I am sorry, sir," said he, "to be the bearer of such an errand; but my master desires you instantly to quit the house; and has commanded me to tell you that he has given me orders not to admit you again."

"I must see Miss Wilford!"

"You cannot, sir!" respectfully remarked the servant; "for she is locked in her own room; but you can send a message to her," added he in a whisper, "and I will be the bearer of it. There is not a servant in the house, Mr. Theodore, but is sorry for you to the soul."

This was so much in season, and was so evidently spoken from the heart, that Theodore could not help catching the honest fellow by the hand. Here the drawing-room bell was rung violently.

"I must go, sir," said the servant; "what message to my mistress?"

"Tell her to give me a meeting, and to apprise me of the time and place;" and the next moment the hall-door was shut upon him.

One may easily imagine the state of the young fellow's mind. To be driven with insult and barbarity from the house in which he had been received a thousand times with courtesy and kindness; which he looked upon as his own! Then, what was to be done? Rosalie's uncle, after all, had told him nothing but the truth. His father had died a beggar. Dear as Rosalie was to Theodore, his own pride recoiled at the idea of offering her a hand which was not the master of a shilling. Yet was not Theodore portionless. His education was finished; that term he had completed his collegiate studies. If his father had not left him a fortune, he had provided him with the means of making one himself; at all events, of commanding a competency. He had the credit of being a young man of decided genius too. "I will not offer Rosalie a beggar's hand!" exclaimed Theodore; "I shall ask her to remain true to me for a year; and I'll go up to London, and maintain myself by my pen. It may acquire me fame as well as fortune; and then I may marry Rosalie!"

This was a great deal of work to be done in a year; but if Theodore was not a man of genius, he possessed a mind of that sanguine temperament, which is usually an accompaniment of the richer gift. Before the hour of dinner all his plans were laid, and he was ready to start for London. He waited now for nothing but a message from Rosalie, and as soon as the sweet girl could send it, it came to him. It appointed him to meet her in the green lane after sunset. The sun had scarcely set when he was there; and there, too, was Rosalie. He found that she was Rosalie still. Fate had stripped him of fortune; but she could not persuade Rosalie to refuse him her hand; when, half way down the lane, she heard a light, quick step behind her, and turning, beheld Theodore.

Theodore's wishes, as I before stated, were granted soon as communicated; and now nothing remained but to say good by—perhaps the hardest thing to two young lovers. Rosalie heard her name called from a short distance, and in a half-suppressed voice; she started, and turned towards the direction whence the pre-concerted warning came; she heard it again; she had stopped till the last moment! She had half withdrawn herself from Theodore's arm; she looked at him; flung her own arm around him, and burst into tears upon his neck! In another minute there was nobody in the lane.

London is a glorious place for a man of talent to make his way in—provided he has extraordinary good luck. Nothing but merit can get on there; nothing is sterling that is not of its coinage. Our provincial towns won't believe that gold is gold unless it has been minted in London. There is no trickery there; no treating, no canvassing, no intrigue, no coalition! There, worth has only to show itself, if it wishes to be killed with kindness! London tells the truth! You may swear to what it says—whatsoever may be proved to the contrary. The cause—the cause is every thing in London! Show but your craft, and straight your brethren come crowding around you, and if they find you worthy, why you shall be brought into notice—even though they should tell a lie for it and destroy you. Never trouble yourself about getting on by interest in London! Get on by yourself. Posts are filled there by merit; or if the man suits not the office, why the office is made to adapt itself to the man, and so there is unity after all! What a happy fellow was Theodore, to find himself in such a place as London!

He was certainly happy in one thing; the coach in which he came set him down at a friend's, whose circumstances were narrow, but whose heart was large—a curate of the church of England. Strange that, with all the appurtenances of hospitality at its command, abundance should allow it to be said, that the kindest welcome which adversity usually meets with is that which it receives from adversity? If Theodore found that the house was a cold one to what he had been accustomed, the warmth of the greeting made up for it. "They breakfasted at nine, dined at four, and, if he could sleep upon the sofa, why there was a bed for him." In a day he was settled, and at his work.

And upon what did Theodore found his hopes of making a fortune, and rising to fame in London?—Upon writing a play. At an early period he had discovered, as his friends imagined, a talent for dramatic composition; and having rather sedulously cultivated that branch of literature, he thought he would now try his hand in one bold effort, the success of which should determine him as to his future course in life. The play was written, presented, and accepted; the performers were ready in their parts; the evening of representation came on, and Theodore, seated in the pit beside his friend, at last, with a throbbing heart, beheld the curtain rise. The first and second acts went off smoothly, and with applause.

Two gentlemen were placed immediately in front of Theodore.

"What do you think of it?" said the one to the other.

"Rather tame," was the reply.

"Will it succeed?"

"Doubtful."

The third act, however, decided the fate of the play; the interest of the audience became so intense, that at one particular stage of the action, numbers in the second and third rows of the side boxes stood up, and the clapping of hands was universal, intermingled with cries of "bravo!" from every part of the theatre. "Twill do," was now the remark, and Theodore breathed a little more freely than he had done some ten minutes ago. Not to be too tedious, the curtain fell amidst shouts of approbation, unmingled with the slightest demonstration of displeasure, and the author had not twenty friends in the house.

If Theodore did not sleep that night, it was not from inquietude of mind—contentment was his repose. His most sanguine hopes had been surpassed; the fiat of a London audience had stamped him a dramatist; the way to fortune was open and clear, and Rosalie would be his.

Next morning, as soon as breakfast was over, Theodore and his friend repaired to the coffee-room. "We must see what the critics say," remarked the latter. Theodore, with prideful confidence—the offspring of fair success—took up the first morning print that came to his hand. Theatre Royal met his eye. "Happy is the successful dramatist!" exclaimed Theodore to himself; "at night he is greeted by the applauses of admiring thousands, and in the morning they are repeated, and echoed all over the kingdom through the medium of the press! What will Rosalie say when her eye falls upon this?" And what, indeed, would Rosalie say when she read the utter condemnation of her lover's drama, which the critic denounced from the beginning to the end, without presenting his readers with a single quotation to justify the severity of his strictures!

"'Tis very odd!" said Theodore.

"'Tis very odd, indeed!" rejoined his friend, repeating his words. "You told me this play was your own, and here I find that you have copied it from half a dozen others that have been founded upon the same story."

"Where?" inquired Theodore, reaching for the paper.

"There!" said his friend, pointing to the paragraph.

"And this is London!" exclaimed Theodore. "I never read a play, nor the line of a play, upon the same subject. Why does not the writer prove the plagiarism?"

"Because he does not know whether it is or is not a plagiarism," rejoined the other. "He is aware that several other authors have constructed dramas upon the same passage in history; and—to draw the most charitable inference, for you would not suspect him of telling a deliberate lie—he thinks you have seen them, and have availed yourself of them."

"Is it not the next thing to a falsehood," indignantly exclaimed Theodore, "to advance a charge, of the justness of which you have not assured yourself?"

"I know not that," rejoined his friend; "but it certainly indicates a rather superficial reverence for truth; and a disposition to censure, which excludes from all claim to ingenuousness the individual who indulges it."

"And this will go the round of the whole kingdom?"

"Yes."

"Should I not contradict it?"

"No."

"Why?"

"'Tis beneath you; besides, the stamp of malignancy is so strong upon it, that, except to the utterly ignorant, it is harmless; and even these, when they witness your play themselves, as sometime or another they will, will remember the libel, to the cost of its author and to your advantage. I see you have been almost as hardly treated by this gentleman," continued he, glancing over the paper which Theodore had taken up when he entered the room. "Are you acquainted with any of the gentlemen of the press?"

"No; and is it not therefore strange that I should have enemies among them?"

"Not at all."

"Why?"

"Because you have succeeded. Look over the rest of the journals," continued his friend; "you may find salve, perhaps, for these scratches."

Theodore did so; and in one or two instances salve, indeed, he found; but upon the whole he was in little danger of being spoiled through the praises of the press. "Why," exclaimed Theodore, "why do not letters enlarge the soul, while they expand the mind? Why do they not make men generous and honest? Why is not every literary man an illustration of Juvenal's axiom?"

"Teach a dog what you may," rejoined his friend, "can you alter his nature, so that the brute shall not predominate?"

"No," replied Theodore.

"You are answered," said his friend.

The play had what is called a run, but not a decided one. Night after night it was received with the same enthusiastic applauses; but the audiences did not increase. It was a victory without the acquisition of spoils or territory. "What can be the meaning of this?" exclaimed Theodore; "we seem to be moving, and yet do not advance an inch!"

"They should paragraph the play as they do a pantomime," remarked his friend. "But then a pantomime is an expensive thing; they will lay out a thousand pounds upon one, and they must get their money back. The same is the case with their melo-dramas; so, if you want to succeed to the height, as a play-wright, you know what to do."

"What?" inquired Theodore.

"Write melo-drama and pantomimes!"

Six months had now elapsed, and Theodore's purse, with all his success, was rather lighter than when he first pulled it out in London. However, in a week two bills which he had taken from his publisher would fall due, and then he would run down to B—, and perhaps obtain an interview with Rosalie. At the expiration of the week his bills were presented, and dishonored! He repaired to his publisher's for an explanation—the house had stopped! Poor Theodore! They were in the Gazette that very day! Theodore turned into the first coffee-room to look at a paper: there were, indeed, the names of the firm! "I defy fortune to serve me a scurvier trick!" exclaimed Theodore, the tears half starting into his eyes. He little knew the lady whose ingenuity he was braving.

He looked now at one side of the paper, and now at the other, thinking all the while of nothing but the bills and the bankrupt's list. Splendid Fete at B— met his eye, and soon his thoughts were occupied with nothing but B—; for there he read that the young lord of the manor having just come of age, had given a ball and supper, the former of which he opened with the lovely and accomplished Miss Rosalie. The grace of the fair couple was expatiated upon; and the editor took occasion to hint, that a pair so formed by nature for each other might probably, before long, take hands in another, a longer, and more momentous dance. What did he think of Fortune now?

"O that it were but a stride to B—!" he exclaimed, as he laid down the paper, and his hand dropped nerveless at his side. He left the coffee-house, and dreamed his way back to his friend's; gigs, carriages, carts rolled by him unheeded; the foot-path was crowded, but he saw not a soul in the street. He was in the ball-room at B—, and looking on while the young lord of the manor handed out Rosalie to lead her down the dance, through every figure of which Theodore followed them with his eyes with scrutinizing glance, scanning the countenance of his mistress. Then the set was over, and he saw them walking arm-in-arm up and down the room; and presently they were dancing again; and now the ball was over, and he followed them to the supper-room, where he saw the young lord of the manor place Rosalie beside him. His fancy changed the scene from the supper-room to the church, at the altar of which stood Rosalie with his happy rival; and he heard the questions and responses which forge the mystic chain that binds for life; and he saw the ring put on, and heard the blessing which announces that the nuptial sacrament is complete! His hands were clenched; his cheek was in a flame; a wish was rising in his throat.

"Good news for you," said somebody clapping him on the back; "a letter from Rosalie lies for you at home. Why are you passing the house?" 'Twas his friend.

"A letter from her!" exclaimed Theodore. Quickly he retraced his steps, and there on his table lay, indeed, the dear missive of his Rosalie.

"Welcome, sweet comforter!" ejaculated Theodore, as he kissed the ciphers which his Rosalie's hand had traced, and the wax which bore the impress of her seal—"welcome, O welcome! you come in time; you bring an ample solace for disappointment, mortification, poverty—whatever my evil destiny can inflict! You have come to assure me that they cannot deprive me of my Rosalie?"

Bright was his eye, and glistening while he spoke; but when he opened the fair folds that conveyed to him the thoughts of his mistress, its radiance was gone!

"THEODORE—I am aware of the utter frustration of your hopes. I am convinced that at the end of a year you will not be a step nearer to fortune than you are now; why then keep my hand for you? What I say briefly, you will interpret fully. You are now the guardian of my happiness—as such I address you. Thursday—so you consent—will be my wedding-day."

SUCH was the letter, upon the address and seal of which Theodore had imprinted a score of kisses before he opened it. "Fortune is in the mood," said Theodore with a sigh, so deeply drawn, that any one who had heard it would have imagined he had breathed his spirit out along with it—"Fortune is in the mood, and let her have her humor out! I shall answer the letter; my reply to her shall convey what she desires—nothing more! she is incapable of entering into my feelings, and unworthy of being made acquainted with them; I shall not condescend even to complain."

"ROSALIE—You are free!"—THEODORE.

SUCH was the answer which Theodore despatched to Rosalie. O the envious restlessness of the mind upon the first shock of thwarted affection! How it turns every way for the solace which it feels it can no where meet with, except in the perfect extinction of consciousness. Find it an anodyne!—you cannot. A drug may close the eye for a time, but the soul will not sleep a wink; it lies broad awake to agony, distinct, palpable, immediate, however memory may be cheated to lose for the present the traces of the cause. Then for the start, the spasm, the groan, which, while the body lies free, attest the presence and activity of the mental rack! Better walk than go to sleep! A heath, without a soul but yourself upon it!—an ink-black sky, pouring down torrents—wind, lightning, thunder, as though the vault above was crackling and disparting into fragments!

Theodore's friend scarcely knew him the next morning. He glanced at him, and took no further notice. 'Twas the best way, though people there are who imagine that it rests with a man in a fever, at his own option to remain in it, or to become convalescent.

Theodore's feelings were more insupportable to him the second day than the first. He went here and there and everywhere; and nowhere could he remain two minutes at a time at rest. Then he was so abstracted. Crossing a street he was nearly run over by a vehicle and four. This for a moment awakened him. He saw London and B— upon the pannels of the coach. The box seat was empty; he asked if it was engaged. "No." He sprang upon it, and away they drove. "I'll see her once more," exclaimed Theodore, "it can but drive me mad, or break my heart."

Within a mile of B— a splendid barouche passed them. "Whose is that?" inquired Theodore.

"The young lord of the manor's," answered the driver. "Did you see the lady in it?"

"No."

"I caught a glimpse of her dress," said the driver. "I'll warrant she's a dashing one! The young squire, they say has a capital taste!" Theodore looked after the carriage. There was nothing but the road. The vehicle drove at a rapid pace, and was soon out of sight. Theodore's heart turned sick.

The moment the coach stopped he alighted; and with a misgiving mind he stood at the door which had often admitted him to his Rosalie. It was opened by a domestic whom he had never seen before. "Was Miss Wilford within?" "No. "When would she return?" Never. She had gone that morning to London to be married!" Theodore made no further inquiries, neither did he offer to go, but stood glaring upon the man more like a spectre than a human being. "Anything more?" said the man, retreating into the house, and gradually closing the door, through which now only a portion of his face could be seen. "Anything more?" Theodore made no reply; in fact, he had lost all consciousness. At last the shutting of the door, which, half from panic, half from anger, the man pushed violently to, aroused him. "I shall knock at you no more!" said he, and departed, pressing his heart with his hand, and moving his limbs as if he cared not how, or whether they bore him. A gate suddenly stopped his progress; it was the entrance to the green lane. He stepped over the stile—he was on the spot where he had parted last from Rosalie—where she had flung her arms about his neck and wept upon it. His heart began to melt, for the first time since he had received her letter: a sense of suffocation came over him, till he felt as if he would choke. The name of Rosalie was on his tongue; twice he attempted to articulate it, but could not. At last it got vent in a convulsive sob, which was followed by a torrent of tears. He threw himself upon the ground—he wept on—he made no effort to check the flood, but let it flow till forgetfulness stopped it.

He rose with a sensation of intense cold. 'Twas morning. He had slept! Would he had slept on! He turned from the sun, as it rose without a cloud upon the wedding morn of Rosalie. 'Twas Thursday. He repassed the stile; and, in a few minutes, was on his road to London, which he entered about eleven o'clock at night, and straight proceeded to his friend's. They were gone to bed.

"Give me a light," said Theodore, "I'll go to bed."

"Your bed is occupied, sir," replied the servant.

"Is it?" said Theodore; "well, I can sleep upon the carpet." He turned into the parlor, drew a chair towards the table, upon which the servant had placed a light, and sat down. All was quiet for a time. Presently he heard a foot upon the stair; 'twas his friend's, who was descending, and now entered the parlor.

"I thought you were a-bed," said Theodore.

"So I was," replied his friend, "but hearing your voice in the hall, I rose and came down to you." He drew a chair opposite to Theodore. Both were silent for a time; at length Theodore spoke.

"Rosalie is married," said he.

"I don't believe it."

"She is going to be married to the young lord of the manor."

"I don't believe it."

"She came to town with him yesterday."

"I don't believe it."

Theodore pushed back his chair, and stared at his friend.

"What do you mean?" said Theodore.

"I mean that I entertain some doubts as to the accuracy of your grounds for concluding that Rosalie is inconstant to you."

"Did I not read the proof of it in the public papers?"

"The statement may have been erroneous."

"Did not her own letter assure me of it?"

"You may have misunderstood it."

"I tell you I have been at B—; I have been at her house. I inquired for her, and was told she had gone up to London to be married! O my friend," continued he, covering his eyes with his handkerchief, "tis useless to deceive ourselves. I am a ruined man! You see to what she has reduced me. I shall never be myself again! Myself! I tell you I existed in her being more than my own. She was the soul of all I thought, and felt, and did; the primal, vivifying principle! She has murdered me! I breathe, it is true, and the blood is in my veins, and circulates; but everything else about me is death—hopes! wishes! interests!—there is no pulse, no respiration there!" I should not be sorry were there none anywhere else! Feel my hand," added he, reaching it across the table, without removing his handkerchief from his eyes; for the sense of his desolation had utterly unmanned him, and his tears continued to flow. "Feel my hand. Does it not burn. A hearty fever, now, would be a friend," continued he, "and I think I have done my best to merit a call from such a visiter. The whole of the night before last I slept out in the open air. Guess where I took my bed. In the green lane—the spot where I parted last from Rosalie!" He felt a tear drop upon the hand which he had extended—the tear was followed by the pressure of a lip. He uncovered his eyes, and turning them in wonderment to look upon his friend—beheld Rosalie sitting opposite to him!

For a moment or two he questioned the evidence of his senses—but soon was he convinced that it was indeed reality; for Rosalie, quitting her seat, approached him, and breathing his name with an accent that infused ecstasy into his soul, threw herself into his arms, that doubtfully opened to receive her.

Looking over her father's papers, Rosalie had found a more recent will, in which her union with Theodore had been fully sanctioned, and he himself constituted her guardian until it should take place. She was aware that his success in London had been doubtful; the generous girl determined that he should no longer be subjected to incertitude and disappointment; and she playfully wrote the letter which was a source of such distraction to her lover. From his answer she saw that he had totally misinterpreted her: she resolved in person to disabuse him of the error; and by offering to become his wife, at once to give him the most convincing proof of her sincerity and constancy. She arrived in London the very day that Theodore arrived in B—. His friend, who had known her from her infancy, received her as his daughter; and he and his wife listened with delight to the unfolding of her plans and intentions, which she freely confided to them. Late they sat up for Theodore that night, and when all hopes of his coming home were abandoned, Rosalie became the occupant of his bed. The next night, in a state of the most distressing anxiety, in consequence of his continued absence, she had just retired to her apartment, when a knock at the door made her bound from her couch, upon which she had that moment thrown herself, and presently she heard her lover's voice at the foot of the stair. Scarcely knowing what she did, she attired herself, descended, opened the parlor door unperceived by Theodore, and took the place of their friendly host, who, the moment he saw her, beckoned her, and resigning his chair to her, withdrew.

The next evening a select party were assembled in the curate's little drawing-room, and Theodore and Rosalie were there. The lady of the house motioned the latter to approach her; she rose and was crossing Theodore, when he caught her by the hand and drew her upon his knee.

"Theodore!" exclaimed the fair one, coloring.

"My wife!" was his reply, while he imprinted a kiss upon her lips. They had been married that morning. Englishman's Magazine.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

PRECOCIOUS TALENT.

FOR precocity of talent and attainment, under circumstances peculiarly unpropitious, James Nack, the deaf and dumb poet of New York, is an intellectual wonder. As far as known, Christendom contains nothing comparable to him. All things considered, Chatterton did not equal him. He has not yet attained his twentieth year. He has known none of the advantages of a liberal education, has never had, until recently, free access to books, and has felt, through life, the unsparing hand of poverty and misfortune; and yet he has written much, and many of his productions are of a high order; all of them are marked with the rich and fervid outpourings of genius. For intensity, and all that gives to poetry its highest character, they are not surpassed, we think not equalled, by any of the early productions of Lord Byron; and those juvenile offerings of the noble bard have never received the commendation they merit. It is not too much to say of this gifted young American, that, when matured by time, and finished by labor, some of his future efforts in song may equal the happiest of those that have immortalized the author of Childe Harold. Of this phenomenon in letters, "Knapp's Lectures on American Literature," contain an interesting account.

Another poetic wonder was also a native of the state of New-York. It is Lucretia Davidson, who died a few years ago, at the age of about sixteen. Like Nack, she received no early education, and had also pined in the shade of poverty, and under the grinding hand of adversity. Disease was, moreover, so constantly the inmate of her frame, that it seemed to make a part of it. But nothing could blight the spring of her genius. The blossoms would blow, and the fruit, rich and beautiful, cluster on the stem, though the heavens lowered on the tender plant, and the cold winds and sleety showers combined to chill its branches and scatter its leaves. Under circumstances thus painful, disheartening and distracting, did this inspired being breathe in song; at times so exquisitely, we had almost said divinely, that her lays, scarcely partaking of earth, might have been fitly chanted by a voice from the skies. Like Nack, she wrote much, and published comparatively but little. Her taste was as fastidious as her genius was fine. Her productions, therefore, which fascinated others, dissatisfied herself, and she often destroyed them. Many pieces of considerable length, which she was known to have written, never met any eye but her own, and that of Him who touched her mind with so bright and glowing a spark from his own altar, that it seemed a thing of heaven.

BURNING THE DEAD.

Among other topics which press upon the mind in the anticipation of death, the immediate disposal of the body naturally has its share of thought. I cannot help thinking that there is something unfeelingly harsh and revolting in the usual practice of committing the body of a friend so immediately to the ground. He feels it not, it is true, and the practice is of little trouble; but it is hard if the kind offices of a life-time cannot win for the dead a less repulsive, though it should be a more elaborate duty. Of all the modes of performing this painful office to the deceased, the least offensive to me is the Greek custom of burning. I can conceive that there was much reason for the ancient law of depriving suicides of this privilege, as a punishment. There is a sacred purity in fire upon which the mind may dwell without disgust; and the inurned ashes of a friend are a beautiful and touching memorial. Perhaps it is not much matter, but I believe death owes half its terrors to the grave. It is difficult to separate its desertion and its damp from the living sense. Philosophy can hardly do it, and feeling never. Who does not linger with unrepented desire upon that beautiful picture in Shelley's Witch of Atlas:

"For on the night that they were buried, she Restored the embalmer's ruin, and shook
The light out of the funeral lamps, to be
A mimic day within that deathly nook;
And there the body lay, age after age,
Mute, breathing, beating, warm and undecaying,
Like one asleep in a green hermitage,
With gentle sleep upon its eyelids playing."

LITERARY NOTICES.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

CAREY AND LEA have issued the eighth volume of the Encyclopedia Americana. It continues to be every where received with the highest commendations, as it is neither cumbersome in size and form nor expensive. The articles contain much scientific information, set forth in a very attractive style, and condensed within brief limits. We might be pardoned for devoting a considerable space to a work so important, so laudable in its design, and so admirable in its execution, but its character is already firmly established as one of the most useful, complete, and satisfactory compendiums of science ever given to the world. We are proud of it as a domestic production, and trust the intelligence and enterprise of the publishers will be properly appreciated by all in any degree interested in the progress of American literature.

An elegantly printed octavo from the same press has just appeared, entitled "History of the Northmen." It is from the able pen of our countrymen, Henry Wheaton.

Carey & Lea have also sent us the third volume of the "History of France," by Eyre Evans Crowe, embodied in Lardner's Cabinet of History.

A little octodecimo, called "Modern American Cookery," with a list of family recipes, by Miss Prudence Smith, is just from the press of the brothers Harper; also

"De Vere; or the Man of Independence." This popular production, by the author of "Tremain," has been incorporated in their Library of Select Novels.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Messrs. Firth & Hall have lately issued a very tasteful and elegant publication, formed of the most favorite gems of melody and harmony that have become popular; collected, arranged, and composed by M. Schoengen. It also contains a favorite air, as sung by Madame Sontag, in the opera of the "Swiss Family;" a Tyrolean melody, called the "Swiss Boy;" the German melody, sung by the Bohemian brothers; and a Swiss melody, sung by Madame Stockhausen. They have also just published the "Muleteer's Quadrilles," with an ad lib. accompaniment for the German flute.

ITALIAN LITERATURE.

MACHIAVELLI.

If ever any one was "damned to everlasting fame," it is Machiavelli. He is looked upon as a monster in human shape—a fiendish spirit "with Ate by his side, come hot from hell," endowed with devilish cunning and malice, and giving lessons in the arts of treachery and oppression. Even his talents have been underrated in view of the malignity which is supposed to have guided them—or at best he only shares Bacon's character of

"The wisest, greatest, meanest of mankind."

Had he only been made a mark during his life for the poisoned arrows of slander and the secret stabs of calumny—had he sunk into poverty and neglect only to shine after death in the empty honors of a mausoleum, and to have his memory sheltered from the injustice which pursued him through life, his case would not have been a singular one—he would only have been a fellow-sufferer with Socrates, with Galileo, with Milton, and with all the hosts of "the noble army of martyrs." But the blind zeal of hatred has followed him even down into the grave, and his character is now blackened almost beyond the power of truth to purify. He alone has found no charity after death—towards him alone has prejudice been inveterate and enmity eternal. It is only within the last century that a monument has been raised over the bones of a man "to whose worth no eulogy is adequate," by that country which has so many wrongs and outrages against him to atone for.

He was born of a noble Florentine family in 1479, at a time when the dispute of the Guelphs and Ghibellines had left Florence in that state of helpless weakness which is more dangerous than the most violent struggles of political madness, or the fiercest fever of popular excitement—when, though the body politic was not as yet "curtailed of its fair proportions," its life and spirit had deserted it. The first mention of him shows him indulging in those bright dreams of liberty so natural to a young, and unfortunately to none but a young author. His first work was a discourse on the true greatness of kingdoms and states—a philosophic application of the lessons of history to the principles of government. It is full of the warmest, purest patriotism, and urges on his countrymen with all the force of eloquence and reason, to follow in the steps of the most powerful and well established states of antiquity. He was the first of European politicians who advocated a mixed government as the best suited to a corrupted and enfeebled people. This is the very strongest proof of his rational love of liberty—the same that would make an enlightened American, if denized in Europe, prefer their ancient and rotten fabrics to our gayer and fresher temple of freedom.

Later in life we find him the head of the liberal party in Florence, the secretary of the republic, and one of the most illustrious, as well as highest of its officers. Now it is that his persecutions commence.

Being soon suspected, and with good reason, of being engaged in two several conspiracies against the government, then in the hands of John de' Medici, he was imprisoned and put to the torture. This severe ordeal he endured with all the firmness his previous life entitles us to expect. He was soon liberated, but sent into exile, whither he carried a conscience void of reproach, and an honorable poverty. He was finally allowed to return, and enjoyed impunity, though not favor, under the Medicean family. It was at this time that he composed his famous work, "Il Principe," or "The Prince," dedicated to Lorenzo de' Medici. Though Machiavelli never loved this family, he seems at least to have become reconciled to their dominion; and when all hope of liberty was gone, to have preferred quiet under a native sovereign to slavery to a foreign master. He died just before this last consummation of his country's crimes and misfortunes—this tragic catastrophe of the brief drama of her independence. His name sunk at once into the same darkness which brooded over Italy. A new generation arose who knew not, and loved not his character. When democracy was persecuted and its partisans anathematized—when virtue was suspicious, and its followers odious, Machiavelli could not escape. The soldiers and princes whose lives were blackest with crime, shuddered at seeing the principles they daily practised exposed in his works—the priests who were deepest versed in impious frauds and mockery of holiness, recoiled with horror from his freedom of thought and speech as the inspiration of the evil one. Popes and cardinals censured as impious, works whose philosophic spirit they feared without comprehending. Princes and nobles joined in persecuting one who knew so well, and described so powerfully all the secrets of their selfish cruelty. Like the Greeks mangling the dead body of Hector, the cowardly malice of his enemies sought to glut itself with the only remains of their enemy within their power—his memory and his lifeless corpse. The only means of defence left were denied him—his writings, the only voice by which he could speak for himself from the grave, were suppressed—his bones lay unhonored—his memory was calumniated, and the fulminations of the church sought to reach and to blast that spirit which had soared beyond their reach. The consequences are evident. His name thus denounced by authority, thus unrelentingly persecuted, and studiously blackened, has become a term of horror even among his countrymen, a by-word and a reproach unto all nations.

The work we have mentioned, "Il Principe," or "The Prince," has been his chief passport to fame, or rather to infamy. It was written, say his Italian commentators, at the time when the Medici returned to power in Florence, to keep alive the few sparks of patriotic fire that yet remained. Under the form of advice to a prince, it shows to what violent and cruel measures every ruler must resort to strengthen his own hands and keep down the rising rebellious spirit of his subjects. A strong reason in favor of this theory is that he expressly excludes the consideration of elective governments and established dynasties. He professes to speak only of those usurpers who would seize by force on a power to which neither birth nor public choice entitles them. His double object then appears to have been to prevent the aggrandizement of the Medici, and to enlighten his countrymen as to the true character of princes and princely governments, and the line of conduct which they always must and always do pursue.

This we think the fairest and most reasonable explanation of this singular work. The day is fast going by when it was viewed with horror, as a deep laid conspiracy against liberty—the most cunning device of her arch enemy. The following considerations will, we think, refute this opinion.

In the first place, all Machiavelli's other writings are republican. All we have already remarked display the warmest, the most enlightened zeal for liberty—all were written for the benefit of a free people—to strengthen their hands, animate their hearts, and enlighten their minds in the cause of the public.

In the second place, the model he proposes for the imitation of princes, is Caesar Borgia, an usurper and tyrant, whom in his other writings he loads with that indignation no virtuous mind could help expressing. This man was one of the most daring and profligate ministers of evil—the most openly vicious from principle, so to speak, that ever existed—a finished compound of fine taste, brilliant talents, determined, deliberate, flagrant vice—of terrific boldness and coolness, cold-blooded and wanton malignity, that no climate but that of Italy could have produced. Yet no one has seen, or has chosen to see, that this character is held up for abhorrence, and not for imitation. Never, surely, was grave irony taken as literally as this has been.

Thirdly, every action of Machiavelli's life confirms the testimony his works bear to his public spirit. We have already seen what he endured for his opposition to tyranny—even to the splendid, munificent tyranny of the Medici. There is one striking fact too which may show its object still more clearly. When the Medici were expelled by the popular party, at whose head Machiavelli then was, he endeavored to destroy "Il Principe," then written though not published, as a book no longer necessary, now that its object was gained without it.

This explanation we adopt as the simplest, the most ancient, and the best supported. A late writer in the Edinburgh Review, in an article doubtless familiar to all our readers, inculcates a different idea. He ascribes the false and treacherous policy recommended in "The Prince" to the peculiar guile and subtlety of the Italian character. This theory, skilfully as it is maintained, we cannot think satisfactory. It fully accounts for the crooked policy which Italian writers love to inculcate, and the crooked paths into which many of their statesmen have wandered, but does not tell us why Machiavelli, the partizan of liberty, should thus be found helping tyranny to her most dangerous weapons. Our opinion then is, that it was written to show the atrocity of all tyranny, however veiled or gilded, the dark and bloody paths by which even the best of absolute princes can alone march to empire. This is the explanation he himself is recorded to have given of it when some of his more zealous and less clear-sighted republican friends reproached him with its dangerous tendency.

Such, then was Niccol Machiavelli—a man to whom his country awarded the highest honors in life, only to condemn his latter years to neglect and his memory to obloquy—who is execrated as the arch enemy of that cause for which he toiled so much, and which he cherished so fondly. Could the grave old statesman know with what cruel injustice he has been treated—how he who suffered so cheerfully for his country and her liberty, is branded as the deepest dyed traitor to the cause of truth and justice; what sorrow and shame would fill his mind, or rather what bitter contempt for the dull gross mortals who could not rightly understand or rightly value his character! Let us at least not do him "such deep and deadly wrong"—let us respect the man who to the subtle intriguing spirit of his nation and the cautious prudence of his own nature, added warm and honest feelings, which purified the one and animated the other in the service of his country—the man who, in another age and people, would have been an Aristides, a Flaminius, a Raleigh, a Sir Thomas More, an Oxenstiern, a Chatham—something higher still—a Bacon, a Pascal, a Locke—but who, to those who understand his character, need ask no higher fame than the name of Machiavelli. TO ANNA MARIA.

The following graceful and affectionate lines were written extempore by a favorite son of the muses, at the request of a little girl, who claimed the promise of a sonnet for her album.

'Twas kind, my pretty little maid,
To ask a song of me—
But I, of all men most afraid,
How can I sing to thee?
For thou art young, and fresh, and fair,
And I am old, and worn with care.

But yet, I wish thee well, my dear,
And still my hope shall be—
That time through every coming year,
May lightly visit thee—
Nor sear thy heart, nor cloud thy brow,
But leave thee pure and fair as now.

Thou'rt going from us soon, I find,
To bless some other sphere,
With charms of person, grace of mind,
Which have but budded here—
While hope and joy thy bosom swell,
Pause and receive my fond farewell.

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

THE BELFRY PIGEON.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

On the cross-beam under the Old South bell
The nest of a pigeon is builded well.
In summer and winter that bird is there—
Out and in with the morning air;
I've passed him oft, and I know his peck
By the play of gold in his mottled neck;
And I love to see him track the street,
With his wary eye and active feet;
And I often watch him as he springs,
Circling the steeples with easy wings,
Till across the dial his shade has passed,
And the belfry edge is gained at last.

'Tis a bird I love, with his brooding note,
And the pulsing throb in his trembling throat;
There's a human look in his swelling breast,
And the gentle curve of his lowly crest;
And I often stop with the fear I feel—
He runs so close to the rapid wheel.

Whatever is rung on that noisy bell—
Chime of the hour or funeral knell—
The dove in the belfry must hear it well.
When the tongue swings out to the midnight moon—
When the sexton cheerily rings for noon—
When the clock strikes clear at morning light—
When the child is waked with "nine at night"—
When the chimes play soft in the Sabbath air,
Filling the spirit with tones of prayer—
Whatever tale in the bell is heard,
He broods on his folded feet unstirred,
Or rising half in his rounded nest,
He takes the time to smooth his breast,
Then drops again with filmed eyes,
And sleeps as the last vibration dies.

Sweet bird! I would that I could be
A hermit in the crowd like thee!
With wings to fly to wood and glen,
Thy lot, like mine, is cast with men;
And daily, with unwilling feet,
I tread, like thee, the crowded street;
But, unlike me, when day is o'er,
Thou canst dismiss the world and soar,
Or, at a half-felt wish for rest,
Canst smooth the feathers on thy breast,
And drop, forgetful, to thy nest.

I would that in such wings of gold
I could my weary heart unfold;
I would I could look down unmoved,
(Unloving as I am unloved,)
And while the world throngs on beneath,
Smooth down my cares and calmly breathe;
And never sad with others' sadness,
And never glad with others' gladness,
Listen, unstirred, to knell or chime,
And, lapt in quiet, bide my time.

NOTES OF A RAMBLE LAST SUMMER.

BY THE SAME.

AUGUST 3. I like Quebec; there is a foreign look about it, with its dark old buildings, and deep-barred windows. The people in the streets have all such a picturesque air—the Canadians with their red sashes about their waists, and the English soldiers with their automaton looks, and the Highlanders in costume, and the queer vehicles, and the small horses, and the priests and the nuns—all so mingled up, and so different from our own uniformly inquisitive, and withal (though the epithets scarce harmonize) respectable air. The Yankees all look (to use one of their own phrases) "well to do in the world." You would know, by the way they button their vests and wear their hats, and perk their under lips, that they lived in four-story houses, with a tidy fence, and a rose-bush in front. In Canada it is quite au contraire. Your respectable man is fat, and English (i. e. unctuous) looking, and has his hat brushed smooth, and his boot spotlessly polished; while your men of chance, or small revenue, look meek and obsequious, and wear their heads modestly at a forward angle. I could imagine myself now in Antwerp or Brussels, sitting here by this second-story window in "the Albion," and watching the mongrel races that keep the pavé below. And there goes an Indian, with a string of moccasins to sell, grave as a martyr, and looking neither to the right nor to the left—a singular demeanor, a Yankee would think, for a man who wanted to find customers. How strangely that Highlander in his kilt looks beside him, and what glorious combatants they would make, pitted against each other in a deadly contest—both men of magnificent frames, and both evidently, if the port and the eye may be trusted, determined fellows. I think I would bet on the Indian. That calm settled lip has a dash of the heroic that would outlast the habitual courage of discipline.

AUGUST 4. Midnight.—I have just returned from an English fete-champetre, a country evening party given in lighted grounds, with music, supper, and dancing, very gay, and very brilliant, but to my aching limbs and bruised points, in somewhat painful contrast to a bed and anodynes. I was a fool to go, having rolled this morning down a precipice at Montmorenci Falls, some hundred and fifty feet into the St. Lawrence, a bath from which I emerged without drag or feelers, much to the astonishment of the French guide, who had run back to the house for a shutter to carry home "the body." I take this opportunity to advise all adventurous youths given to display their alertness on such occasions, to go quietly round the hill

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

STYLE.

STYLE in writing is one's peculiar manner of communicating his thoughts. A great author is generally distinguished so clearly by it, that those acquainted with his works can detect his anonymous lucubrations by his fashion of arranging the words and balancing the sentences, although the idea is ridiculed by Goldsmith, who vows that his critics have saddled him with numerous compositions which he never even so much as read, but the authorship of which those ingenious gentlemen discovered by the style. The design of a literary publication is either to instruct or amuse, and many a one who can advance no pretensions to the former succeeds in the latter by those graces of language, or, as Shakspeare terms them, that "sweet smoke of rhetoric," in which, peradventure, they excel works of greater depth and value. Style is to an essay what manner or address is to a man. A noble character, a sweet poet, or a profound philosopher appearing with a clownish person, and awkward ways, is often rejected from societies where his inward qualities are unknown, while a cunning sharper, an ignorant fop, or an erudite fool, with a graceful person, and specious address, wins his way wonderfully into favor, and raises in our mind such agreeable emotions, as make him, till his failings are exposed, a welcome guest. Just so I have known a sterling book, full of plain eloquence and unaffected nature, flung aside to give place to some coxcomb piece of scribbling, skilled only in pretty words and swelling periods. If a persuasive style is of such force as to often introduce a worthless volume to our partialities, how powerful an engine it becomes in the hands of a true genius, who with all the crowded thoughts of an awakened mind, and the lively impressions of a warm and generous heart, added to the treasures of science and experience, possesses this magic power of embodying his ideas and conceptions in such a form as to attract, delight, and improve mankind. Such mighty characters were Homer, Virgil, and Milton. In the two former, the English reader will feel less interested than the latter. The style of that wonderful poet has in it something very peculiar. His conceptions were so vast and weighty that, as Addison finely observes, our language sunk under him, and he was obliged to resort to several expedients, borrowed from foreign tongues, to support his imagination. In expressing a sentiment, or describing an event, he rises to such a lofty and sublime mode of putting the reader in possession of his idea, that you feel he has exhausted the power of words; and when you behold the same subjects treated in the manner of ordinary writers, the contrast is curious. A common newspaper correspondent tells you that Mr. B. rose, on such an occasion, to address the assembly, and adds, Mr. B. is acknowledged one of the most powerful and commanding debaters, and never delivers his sentiments, on any subject, without exciting great attention. In how much deeper colors the author of Paradise Lost draws the same picture.

"With grave
Aspect he rose, and in his rising seem'd
A pillar of state; deep in his front engraven
Deliberation sat, and public care,
And princely counsel in his face yet shone,
Majestic, though in ruin; sage he stood
With Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear
The weight of mightiest monarchies: his look
Drew audience, and attention still as night,
Or summer's noontide air."

Instead of telling us it was noon, he informs us that Satan looked sometimes towards Eden, and

"Sometimes towards heaven, and the full blazing sun,
Which now sat high in his meridian tower."

Vine-covered caves are—

"Caves
Of cool recess, o'er which the mantling vine
Lays forth her purple grape, and gently creeps Luxuriant."

He then goes on narrating, that after having exercised themselves sufficiently to gain an appetite, and make rest pleasant, Adam and Eve fell to eating the fruit, and drinking the stream. But in what a flowing and melodious style these petty circumstances are embalmed.

"And, after no more toil
Of their sweet gardening labor than sufficed
To recommend cool zephyr, and made ease
More easy, wholesome thirst and appetite
More grateful, to their supper fruits they fell,
Nectarine fruits, which the compliant boughs
Yielded them; sidelong as they sat recline
In the soft downy bank damask'd with flowers,
The savory pulp they chew, and, in the rind
Still as they thirsted, scooped the brimming stream."

I cannot pass over that instance on the same page, of the poet's power to shed upon the most common occurrence, by the style of relating it, all the freshness of novelty. It is in the few lines where he finds it necessary to mention the coming in of evening, and notices the beasts of the earth couched on the grass near Adam and Eve.

"—on the grass
Couched, and now all'd with pasture gazing sat,
Or bedward ruminating; for the sun,
Declined, was hasting now with prone career
To the ocean isles, and in the ascending scale
Of heaven, the stars that usher evening rose."

I must here solicit the indulgence of the reader for remarking, although it may appear a digression, the abundant variety of methods of which Milton was master, for relating the same incident. I have given above, his skilful and uncommonly poetic way of describing the coming on of evening; yet that season of the day has scarcely more different shades and opposite appearances in its progress over the earth than the poet has images in celebrating it; for instance,

"Now night her course began, and, over heaven
Inducing darkness grateful truce imposed,
And silence on the odious din of war."

at Montmorenci, and enter the glen through which the fall descends at the opening, in preference to attempting the short cut down the sides, the latter being nearly perpendicular, of a loose and brittle slate formation, and a hundred and fifty feet in height, as awkward a distance to fall as could well be hit upon. I attribute my escape entirely to my extraordinary corpulence, which, in the first place, protected my bones, and in the second place, prevented my cutting the water very rapidly when I reached the river. If I ever attempt to descend a precipice again for a lady's favor, when there is a proper ladder within ten feet, may I be shot! And talking of ladies—I am now travelling with a southern gentleman, wife, and sister, whom I met at the Thousand Isles—pleasant people as, with the necessity for parting, I care particularly to meet. The only trouble attendant upon it is, that, devoting myself of course to the single lady, she is perpetually taken by these detestable keepers of hotels and captains of steam-boats for my wife! They come to me constantly to pay for "my wife's passage," and "my lady's dinner." I have been reflecting to-day whether there is such a thing as a matrimonial look, and if there is, whether the keeper of a public-house is not responsible for his infernal mistakes in such matters.

AUGUST 5.—On board the steamer, and running up the St. Lawrence at fifteen miles in the hour—pretty well, considering it is against the tide. My agreeable friend sits just beyond me, in the ladies' cabin, writing in her journal. Beautiful creature! dark eyes and hair, and though a little too sallow, yet withal so soft and yielding in your manners! And your exquisite accent, too—ah! if your mamma and papa had but had northern notions of education, what a glorious creature you might have made! but you are most delightfully innocent of some things which other people know, and you do drop now and then such sweet bad grammar from your exquisite lip, and you will cover yourself up with ornaments, though it is neither stylish nor becoming; and you do hate so to go one inch from your chair, though mountains, and rivers, and sunsets, and people overboard continually tempt you! It's very well now—for foibles rather add to a pretty woman—but by and by, my dear somebody or other—(for though I have travelled with you a week, I only know that your name is Cornelia)—by and by, I say, and very soon too—for it is the way at the south—you will lose those snowy teeth of yours, and those full lips, and that superb roundness and shapeliness of bust, and then your bad grammar, and your sad taste, and your slightly slovenly way of wearing your hair, and tying your slippers, and fastening your belt, will be pretty no longer, and your elegant indolence will become stupid idleness, and the languishing sleepiness of your eye will go by a harder name—depend upon it. I have an idea of proposing to the Society for the Diffusion of Knowledge to send a missionary to Georgia, to enlighten your friends on some of these abstruse points. It would make perfect women of you—handsome creatures that you are!

How amusing it is, when one has become perfectly resigned to the annoyances of a steam-boat, to sit aside and watch the eternal small comedy going on about him. There sits a woman, now, dandling a confounded nuisance of a child that I would borrow and drop overboard, if she were not out of my reach in the ladies' cabin; and opposite me sits an officer with his arms folded, and a cloud on his face—for he has just discovered that his young wife has passed him on the river going to Quebec, (which he has just left,) to meet him; and there paces an old fellow who is sick with the smell of the oil—(query, could not this really shocking evil be avoided?)—and about in the different corners are to be seen discontented faces of all descriptions, whose cases are beyond my analysis—my own and one other, of a fat woman, the only pleasant countenances, I do believe, in the whole boat's company. And this is to "go a pleasuring." And for this, people yearly abandon their comfortable homes, and with no eye for scenery, nor any hope but change, crowd these hot oleaginous steam-boat cabins, and wander, with their own or other people's children, from one end of the land to the other! I could laugh, if my ribs were not so sore with my yesterday's tumble, at the uncomfortableness and disappointment in the expression of the faces about me—most of them, too, enjoying what they have anticipated, and economized for, and talked about, months before they started.

AUGUST 6.—Still on board the steamer, and within twenty miles of Montreal. Last night we had a full moon, and a perfectly delicious air, moist and without wind, and I think I never passed a night whose spirit of beauty so entered and pervaded me. We were close upon the shore for an hour or two, running with a sensation of magic above the distinct and beautiful reflections of the banks, and breaking up with our prow a mirror that seemed as if its stillness should have been sacred and eternal. We arrived at the village of Sorel at midnight, and as the boat was to wait an hour for wood, we went ashore for a walk. We rambled through the deserted streets without meeting a living creature, and I rarely have been so impressed with the sense of solitude. The light was so clear, that it seemed unnatural to sleep. We could scarce feel that there were living inhabitants about us. The houses were all barred, and dark, and of a peculiarly dull aspect, most of them without paint or ornament; the church near the shore was black and old, and it was not difficult to believe it a decayed and desolate town, and ourselves the disturbers of a breathless and long unbroken solitude. We had heard much of the bark-work of the inhabitants of Sorel, and, at the request of our fair companions, we commenced a tattoo upon the door of a shop to which we had been directed in the hope of arousing the occupant. We succeeded at last in awakening a woman in a red night-cap, who first screamed "fire and murder," and then came down and let us in. She was "fair, fat and forty," and apparently glad to turn a penny, even as an episode to a dream.

Her baskets and pin-cushions were really beautiful, and saving that we paid four times their value, we felt tolerably satisfied with our midnight shopping. I made a mem. in my journal that "all women look abominably in red night-caps." Sleep is a sad spoiler of your pretty eyes, gently as it

"Seals up the eyelids with its silver wand."

AUGUST 8.—Shooting down Lake George like a steam-boat apparition, the skirts of a lifting fog enveloping us occasionally for a moment, and then swaying off, giving us an under-peep at the loveliest scene of green islands and broken sunshine in the world. Nothing could be more fairy-like. I have skipped over a day or two, in which I may be imagined to have undergone the various ordeals common to passing the frontier—impositions from coachmen, losses of money, baggage, and temper, (they stole all my money at the tavern where I slept at St. John's, and half my baggage at La Prairie, which I am told is getting off uncommonly well) and this added to a chilly sail down Lake Champlain, and a ramble over the old fort at Ticonderoga with a rheumatic gentleman, who begged the favor of my arm, completes a longer chapter of ill-humor than will ever occur, I am positive, elsewhere in my biography. I except in this, a moment's malicious amusement afforded me by the distress of a Vermont teamster, who happened to be carried off in the boat from Burlington, leaving his four oxen to stand upon the wharf till he had made a volens volens passage to Whitehall, and an hysterical laugh at my own absurdity in being amused with anything under my calamitous loss of money. Here we are, however, on Lake George, and I do begin to suspect I am getting unctuous and cheerful once more. I have spent an hour, among other bienséances, in sailing a chip-boat in a wash-bowl, to illustrate to my fair companion how a rudder turns a boat round—a fact of which, my luminous illustrations notwithstanding, she still seems to have a shrewd doubt.

'Tis a glorious lake—Lake George. It is called Holy Lake by the Catholics; and I do not wonder that they send, as I am told they do, for its waters all over Canada to fill the fonts in their churches. Its transparency is really wonderful—the slightest pebble on the bottom being distinctly visible at a depth of thirty feet; and now, as the sun shines more constant upon it, I think I never saw shores of such exquisite outline, and such clear and magic reflections. These tall green hills hang down in the abyss below us, with every leaf and tint as palpable, and far softer than the reality. How I wish the dark eyes beside me, only less beautiful than the scene itself, could convey from their superb mirrors to the indolent soul beneath them, one worthy impression of the loveliness about us! I never feel the want of mind in woman but at such times and places as this; and indeed, if it were not for the luxurious necessity we feel of some softening mirror for our own most elevated feelings, I would dispense with every thing in the sex but affectionateness and beauty. But there are chance moments in life when woman, and nothing but a woman, and a refined and high-hearted one, can answer the "spirit's questioning"—when you could lavish the very drop at your inmost heart for one hour's perfect and pure, and, if you will, silent sympathy. And since I am upon sentiment, here are some verses read to me last night at the wretched tavern opposite Ticonderoga, by a chance room-fellow, who discovered, by some mistimed soliloquizing quotation while undressing, that I had read the poets. "Sir," said he, (I was pulling off a wet stocking, upon which the chamber-maid had spilt a pail of water,) "perhaps you don't know that I write verses." "Perhaps I don't, sir." "Perhaps you wouldn't like to hear me read you a stave or so." "Perhaps I wouldn't, sir;" but I was not to escape so. There he sat, like a poetry-fiend, within three feet of me, on the other bedstead, the manuscript in one hand, and a dingy silk handkerchief in the other. I tied on my bandanna. He hemmed thrice. I began to sing, "His name it begins with an O." He requested me to stop—said he was nervous about music—if I would slip into bed he would read me to sleep. After that I only remember two lines:

"She was a fond and gentle girl,
As playful as a very squirrel;"

which it seemed to me were scarce out of his mouth before I was called to breakfast—the following morning.

AUGUST 10. At Saratoga—dressing, breakfasting, dressing, dining, dressing, dancing—the history of a week.

AUGUST 18. Yesterday, the seventh day after my arrival, having been reduced to my last unsupported tie, I vacated the small orifice in which I was nightly deposited, and dropped off unnoticed, like a grain of sand in an hour-glass, to join the more quiet races of mankind. I sit in an upper story at Titus's, in Troy (was ever such a classic description of a whereabouts?) feeling, though my room is scarce six feet by two, a propensity to stretch myself after my Saratoga quarters, as I have observed a fly to do after sleeping in a quill. I wonder who knows that Troy is one of the most agreeable places "unwritten" about. I wonder who knows that within a ten minutes' ride from the place of my present writing, is an elevation called Mount Ida, which commands positively, one of the most exquisite natural pictures in the world. The long sweep of interval down the Hudson, with the two or three lovely islands in the midst, the fine junction of the Mohawk above, the bold, broken horizon on every side, Troy beneath you, and Albany looking so well in the distance—all these, I was saying, make up a scene of loveliness not much surpassed even by Holyoke and Kattskill. And just back, too, there is a superb ravine with a wild stream dashing through it, and a road through a valley near by (I have quite forgotten in what direction, having been whisked over it by an editor friend of mine, who is called a "star," but drives more like a comet,) all beautiful enough for a yearly pilgrimage.

Again—

"The sun was sunk, and after him the star
Of Hesperus, whose office is to bring Twilight upon the earth, short arbiter
'Twixt day and night, and now from end to end,
Night's hemisphere had veiled the horizon round."

There is another—

"Now was the sun in western cadence low
From noon and gentle airs, due at their hour,
To fan the earth now waked," &c.

Adam's beautiful persuasion to the angel Gabriel to continue his discourse, although the night is approaching, may be considered as one of these.

"Or if the star of evening and the moon
Haste to thy audience; night with her will bring Silence; and sleep, listening to thee, will watch."

What a treasure and profusion of imagination are betrayed in the mind which furnishes such a variety. He still goes on, striking out new forms of expression.

"Meanwhile in utmost longitude, where heaven
With earth and ocean meets, the setting sun
Slowly descended, and with right aspect,
Against the eastern gate of paradise
Levelled his evening rays."

I shall only give one more allusion to the evening, and, indeed, only a part of that, the celebrity of which has caused many lines of it to be frequently extracted.

"—the sun now fallen
Beneath the Azores, whether the prime orb,
Incredible how swift, had hither roll'd
Diurnal; or this less voluble earth,
By shorter flight to the east, had left him there,
Arraying with reflected purple and gold
The clouds that on his western throne attend.
Now came still evening on," &c.

I could multiply instances of this nature out of Milton, but have, perhaps, gone too far already in selecting from a work so much read and praised. Yet I am certain there are hundreds of intelligent people, strangers to these stupendous creations of genius which I have been noticing, and who, fancying they do not like poetry, or that this poem in particular is of a dry and unentertaining kind, by reason of its elevated and extraordinary style, lose a great mental feast, which they are as competent to enjoy as any other, if they could but think so themselves.

Ossian is a poem also seldom meddled with out of a certain circle. For this it may be justly said there is some good reason. The style of those writings is, even more than Milton's, uncommon. The reader is at first bewildered by it, and afterwards, till he gets into the spirit of it, fatigued. The conceptions, though grand and vast, are often far-fetched. In the first perusal you are apt to pass over these, and many have thrown down the volume in disgust. The question which has been raised respecting the origin of Ossian has also tended to give its enemies a bold face in censuring its intrinsic merits. To me, in regard to my opinion of the poetry, it is immaterial whether the poems came from the brain of Ossian or Macpherson. I confess I found the greatest difficulty in liking the book, but being once travelling a long and solitary journey, with only Ossian as a companion, I desperately resolved to go through with him, cost what it might. My surprise and delight were great when the true inspiration of the bard began to dawn upon me, and having recovered from my distaste to the peculiarity of his style, I caught the spirit of his meaning, and found myself strongly aroused by the nervous simplicity of diction, and splendid display of poetic thought which then unfolded itself. For a long time his sententious periods, and sublime imagination, filled my fancy, and I could scarcely even venture upon even a letter to a friend without being drawn into an Ossianic mode of expression, which, however appropriate on high subjects, is extremely ridiculous in the hands of unskilful writers, or of any writers on ordinary subjects. Indeed, to such as have the perseverance to read Ossian through, and have not built up their opinions on other people's talk, which the most sensible will sometimes unconsciously do, there will be in his style, a kind of contagion difficult to escape, and dangerous to a youthful candidate for literary fame.

But lest I have been too grave, I will present a specimen of style which has appeared before in public, but is of so agreeable a cast as, like all the works of the most profound authors, to bear more than one reading—it is orator O'Botherem's speech on the question, "Does riches or poverty tend most to the exaltation of the human mind?"

"I shall proceed, Mr. President, to compare riches to poverty in such a way as you will find there to be no comparison at all.

"The man possessed of luxury, Mr. President, cannot eat a single meal, unless he is surrounded all around with the luxuriant and extatic productions of both atmospheres. Is not the rich cheney cup, which he so languishingly and affectingly raises to his nauseated lips, are they not, I repeat it, sir, brought from the deserts of Arabia?"

"Is not the flagrant and chromatic tea found in the undiscovered regions of Chili, which there is the highest mountains in the world? Is not, I say, sir, the dashing sofa on which he declines his meagre and emancipated form, made from the mahogany of Hispaniola from the shores of Indostan, and the cedar of Lebanon from Mount Parnassus, ornamented with the richest and most municipal oriental silks from the East Indies abroad?"

"Now, Mr. President, the man possessed of poverty, declines his expectations on a high pinnacle of bliss. Happiness, Mr. President, is like a crow perched on a distant mountain, which the eager sportsman vainly tries to no purpose to ensnare; he looks at the crow, Mr. President, and the crow looks at him, but the moment he attempts to reproach him, he banishes away like the schismatic taints of the rainbow, which it was the astonishing Newton that first deplored and enveloped the cause of it!

"Cannot the poor man precipitate in all the varied beauties of nature, from the most loftiest mountains, down to the most lowest valleys, as well as the man possessed of luxury? Yes, sir—the poor man, while trilling transports crowns his views, and rosy hours attunes his sanguinary youth, can raise his wonderful mind to that incompressible being who restrains the lawless storm, who kindles up the crushing and tremendous thunder, and rolls the dark and rapid lightning through the intensity of space, and who issues the awful metres, and roll-a-borealis through the unfathomable-legions of the fiery hemispheres. Sometimes seated beneath the shady shadow of an umbrageous tree, at whose vernal foot flows a limping brook, he calls about him his wife and the rest of his children, here, sir, he takes a retrospective view into futurity, distils into their youthful minds useful lessons to guard their juvenile youth from vice and immortality, and extorts them to persevere to endless facility, which shall endure forever.

"Here, sir, on a fine clear evening, when the silvery moon shines out with all its emulgence, he learns his children the first rudiments of astrology, by pointing out the bull, the bear, and many more bright constellations and fixed stars, which are constantly devolving on their axle-trees in the azure expanse of the blue creolean firmament above."

THE PAPERS OF AN IDLER.

THOUGHTS ON POLITENESS.

We copy the following article from the December number of the New-England Magazine, one of the best periodicals that has issued from the American press.

The common notion about politeness is, that it is a thing of the body, and not of the mind, and that he is a polite man who makes certain motions in a graceful manner and at proper times and places. We expect the dancing master to teach our children "manners" as well as the art of cutting awkward capers to music, and we pay him on the same compound principle by which the sage McGrawler was compensated for his instructions to Paul Clifford—"two bobs for the Latin, and a sice for the virtue." But the truth is, that we degrade politeness by making it any thing less than a cardinal virtue. The happiness of life is made up of an infinite number of little things, and not of startling events and great emotions; and he who daily and hourly diffuses pleasure around him by kind offices, frank salutations, and cheerful looks, deserves as well of his species, as he who, neglecting or despising all these, makes up for it by occasional acts of generosity, justice, or benevolence. Besides, the opportunity of doing great things but rarely occurs, while a man has some dozens of chances, every day of his life, to show whether he be polite or not. The value of a thing, too, is great in proportion to its rarity, and true politeness is a very rare thing, gentle reader, stare though you may. I have seen many graceful men, many agreeable, many who were even fascinating, but very few who were polite, as the word is defined in my dictionary. Sometimes there is a deficiency in certain things, sometimes the quality extends to a certain point, after which you enter into that "kingdom of me," spoken of in one of Dryden's plays, and a large kingdom it is too. Sometimes there is a fault of omission and sometimes of commission; so that, on the whole, the quality is about as rare as greatness, and, indeed, they have many ingredients in common. A true polite man must, in the first place, have the gift of good sense, for without that foundation, it is idle to think of rearing any, even the smallest superstructure. He must know when to violate that code of conventional forms, which common consent has established, and when not; for it is equally a mark of weakness to be a slave to these forms or to despise them. He must have penetration and tact enough to adapt his conversation and manner to circumstances and individuals; for that which is politeness in the drawing-room may be downright rudeness in the bar-room or the stage-coach, as well as the converse. Above all, he must have that enlarged and catholic spirit of humility, which is the child of self-knowledge, and the parent of benevolence, (indeed, politeness itself is merely benevolence, seen through the little end of a spy-glass) which, not content with bowing low to this rich man or that fine lady, respects the rights and does justice to the claims of every member of the great human family. As for the fastidious and exclusive persons, who look down upon a man created and upheld by the same power as themselves and heir to the same immortal destinies, because he does not dress in a particular style or visit in certain houses, they are out of the question. If they are too weak to perceive the grotesque absurdity of their own conduct, they have not capacity enough to master the alphabet of good manners. If angelic natures be susceptible of ludicrous emotions, we know of nothing more likely to call them forth, than the sight of an insect inhabitant of this great ant-hill, assuming airs of superiority over his brother emmet, because he has a few more grains of barley in his granary, or some other equally cogent reason.

Of the gentlemen, young and old, whiskered and unwhiskered that may be seen in Washington-street, any sunshiny day, there is not one who does not think himself a polite man, and who would be not very much resent an insinuation to the contrary. Their opinion is grounded on reason something like the following: when they go to a party, they make a low bow to the mistress of the house, and then look round after somebody that is young and pretty to make themselves agreeable to. At a ball they will do their utmost to entertain their partner, unless the fates have given them to some one who is ugly and awkward, and they will listen to her remarks with their most bland expression. If they are invited to a dinner-party, they go in their best coats, praise their entertainer's wine, and tell the lady they hope her children are all well. If they tread on the toes of a well dressed person, they will beg his pardon. They never spit on a carpet, and in walking with a lady they always give her the inside; and, if the practice be allowable, they offer her their arm. So far, very good; but I must always see a man in certain situations, before I decide whether he be polite or not. I should like to see how he would act, if placed at dinner between an ancient maiden lady and a country clergyman with a small salary and a rusty coat, and with some distinguished person opposite to him. I want to see him on a hot and dusty day, sitting on the back seat of a stage-coach, when the driver takes in some poor lone woman, with may-be a child in her arms, and tells the gentlemen that one of them must ride outside and make room for her. I want to be near him when his washerwoman makes some very good excuse to him for not bringing home his clothes at the usual time, or not doing up an article in exactly the style he wished. I want to hear the tone and emphasis with which he gives orders to servants in steamboats and taverns. I mark his conduct, when he is walking with an umbrella on a rainy day, and overtakes an old man, or an invalid, or a decent-looking woman, who are exposed without protection, to the violence of the storm. If he be in company with those whom he thinks his inferiors, I listen to hear if his conversation be entirely about himself. If some of the number be very distinguished, and some quite unknown; I observe whether he acts as if he were utterly unconscious of the presence of these last. These are a few, and but a few, of the tests by which I try a man, and I am sorry to say there are very few who can stand them all. There is many a one who passes in the world for a very well-bred man, because he knows when to bow and smile, that is down in my tablets for a selfish, vulgar, unpolite monster, that loves the parings of his own nails better than his neighbor's whole body. Put any man in a situation where he is called upon to make a sacrifice of his own comfort and ease, without any equivalent in return, and you will learn the difference between true politeness, that sterling ore of the heart, and the counterfeit imitation of it which passes current in drawing rooms. Any man must be an idiot not to be polite in society, so called, for how else could he get his oysters and champagne?

Politeness is a national as well as an individual characteristic, and it would be a curious subject of speculation to inquire what degree of cultivation and refinement is most favorable to it, for the extremes both of civilization and savageness do not seem to be propitious. I am inclined to think the Greeks were a more polite people than any of modern times, when we take into consideration the advantage we have in the greater respect which women now both deserve and receive, and the favorable influence exerted upon our manners in consequence. There is something extremely touching in the respect they paid to old age. If I were inclined to display a little learning, I might illustrate my position by examples drawn from their history; but there are many that every school-boy is familiar with, and they need not be repeated here for the ten thousandth time. The Jews were a polite people, and the Old Testament (with reverence I say it) contains many striking instances of it. Indeed, it is a striking peculiarity of the scriptures, that all the graces and embellishments of life may be learned from them, as well as its most solemn duties and highest obligations, and that they contain every thing requisite to form a perfect man. How delicate and feeling is the conduct of Jacob, at his first meeting with Rachel, at the well of Haran, and how unlike what would be expected in our refined times. The self-denial of David, recorded in the eleventh chapter of the first book of Chronicles, in refusing to drink of the water which his "three mightiest" captains had procured with the peril of their lives, is an instance of politeness sublime into magnanimity. And, to mention but one example more, how beautiful and touching is the behavior of the three friends of Job, who "sat down with him upon the ground, seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him, for they saw that his grief was very great."

We call ourselves a polite people, and, comparatively speaking, perhaps we are so. It is allowed, I believe, that Americans, both at home and abroad, are remarkably attentive to women, though Captain Hall thinks otherwise. Still we commit some offences against good breeding. We have a bad trick of staring at strangers, as any one must have noticed who has been in a country church when any one entered. And then we ask a great many idle, and not a few impertinent questions. The habit we have of cutting and defacing every fixture that is penetrable to steel, is so universal and so abominable, that it deserves to be scourged out of us by a pestilence or a famine. The manners, too, of our common people towards each other, are marked by great roughness and an entire inattention to all the little courtesies of life. Perhaps we owe this to our English descent; for John Bull thinks that if a man is polite to him, he has a design upon his purse.

There are a great many little offences committed against good manners, which people are hardly aware of at the time. It is not polite, for instance, to tease a person to do what he has once declined, and it is equally impolite to refuse a request or an invitation in order to be urged, and accept afterwards. Comply at once; if your friend be sincere, you will gratify him; if not, you will punish him, as he deserves to be. It is not polite, when asked what part of a dish you will have, to say "any part, it is quite indifferent to me;" it is hard enough to carve for one's friends, without choosing for them. It is not polite to entertain our visitors with our own family history, and the events of our own household. It is not polite for married ladies to talk in the presence of gentlemen, of the difficulty they have in procuring domestics, and how good-for-nothing they are when they are procured. It is not polite to put food upon the plate of your guest without asking his leave, nor to press him to eat more than he wants. It is not polite to stare under ladies' bonnets, as if you suspected they had stolen the linings from you. It is—but let me remember it is not polite to be a bore, especially in print.

It does not seem to me that the world has gained much in politeness during the last two or three hundred years. It is all surplusage to the utilitarian philosophy. There is a lofty and chivalrous spirit of courtesy that hangs over the age of Queen Elizabeth, like a rose-colored atmosphere. What a contrast there is between the warriors, the courtiers, and the statesmen, the Sydneys, the Raleighs, and the Essexes, of the court of the Virgin Queen, and the modern fine gentlemen, the disciples of Brummel, and the admirers of Pelham! It reminds us of the difference between our rectangular habits and round black beavers, and the silks, velvets, and plumes in which the gallants of those days were wont to ruffle. What a beautiful and touching instance of genuine politeness, is that well known anecdote recorded of Sir Philip Sydney, in the last moments of his life, and how few of the preux chevaliers of the nineteenth century are there capable, I will not say of imitating it, but even of admiring it as it ought to be admired. A sublime indifference to all sublunary things, except himself, seems to be the distinguishing characteristic of the fine gentleman, now-a-days. But perhaps the progress of society has had the same effect here as in other things; it has made the generality of men more polite, though there are not such splendid individual instances of the quality. But to come nearer home, our own generation does not seem to have the advantage, in this respect, of that which preceded it. I am an admirer of the old school of manners, as it is commonly called. I like the minute attentions, the uniform, though formal courtesy, and the mingled dignity and benevolence of manner which characterize it. The few specimens of it that are left among us, appear like Corinthian columns, to which time has lent a touching grace, independent of their intrinsic beauty. They connect us with an age, in which far more stress was laid upon dress and manner, and all external things, than now, to an age of wigs and knee-buckles, of flowered waistcoats and hooped petticoats, of low bows and stately courtesies; and I shall be sorry when they are all gone.

Let no man imagine that his rank, or station, or talents excuse him from an attention to those rules of good-breeding, which cost nothing but a little care, and which make a great deal of difference in the sum total of human happiness. They are as imperative as the rules of morality, and there is no one, however great or high, that does not owe to society a liberal recompense for what he receives from it. There is now and then a man so weak as to affect to be rough, or forgetful, or absent, from a notion that his deficiencies in these little things will be ascribed to the largeness of the objects with which he is habitually conversant, and that his mind will be supposed unable to come down from the airy regions of contemplation, to such low matters. But such a one should be put into the same state-room of the great ship of fools, with those who twisted their necks to look like Alexander, or spoke thick to resemble Hotspur. A man that can do great things and not little ones, is an imperfect man; and there is no more inconsistency between the two than there is in a great poet's being able to write a promissory note, or a great orator's having the power to talk about the weather.

I will only remark, in conclusion, that good-breeding should form a part of every system of education. Not that children should be made to barter their native simplicity for a set of artificial airs and graces, but that they should be early impressed with the deformity of selfishness, and the necessity of thinking of others as well as themselves. Care should be taken that their intercourse with each other be in a spirit of courtesy and mildness. He, who has been reared in a brawling and ill-mannered nursery, can hardly be expected to ripen into a polite man. The elder members of a family should bear in mind that the influence of their own conduct will encircle the children like an atmosphere. There can be little happiness in that household, in which the minutest offices are not dictated by a spirit of thoughtful courtesy and delicate consideration for others. How many marriages are made wretched by a neglect of those little mutual attentions, so scrupulously paid in the days of courtship. Let it be born in mind, that the cords of love, which bind hearts so closely together, that neither life, nor death, nor time, nor eternity can sever them, are woven of threads no bigger than a spider's web.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1832.

Editor's study.—We have several letters to-day, for all of which we take this occasion to thank our correspondents. They cannot imagine what a pleasure it is to receive these tributes from the different minds about us. It affords the cheering thought that others take an interest in our labors, and we are gratified and flattered with the idea that any effort of ours can thus draw out their sentiments, and furnish an offering for our readers, composed of various materials. Besides, it breaks the eternal monotony into which your hebdomadals are so apt to fall. The moral world resembles the natural in this, as well as many other particulars. As there are in the loneliest forests, and the obscurest vales, objects which the painter might transfer to his sketch book with great profit, so there is no walk in human life but which may yield incidents and reflections of an interesting nature. Intelligent persons, of both sexes, although not competent to compose an epic poem, or a history, must yet have observed numerous events, and been struck with divers reflections, which, set down in plain language, would entertain, and probably instruct the greater part of mankind; and here we digress a moment, to assure Master Robert Jones, the young boy, who a few weeks since wrote us an account of his oppressions in school, that his communication has excited much attention in several seminaries of learning, and he may encourage himself with the certainty that he has already rescued one or two well-meaning lads from their daily penalty of "six slaps." Miss Polly Plainway's letter has also been inquired after; and one or two of those very scribblers whose inconsistency she so ingeniously exposed, appear to be more moved with her wit than they ever have been with any other person's beauty.

There are lying by us a number of laconic epistles upon the most opposite subjects. Many are puffs—broad, glaring, atrocious puffs, which, if they were really true, would absolutely overturn the whole system of civilized society, and, indeed, alter the character of human nature. "Philo Junius" informs us of a dentist who has discovered a medicine by which the tooth-ache is immediately and permanently cured in all cases; he adds in a P.S. "teeth extracted without pain, and others set in which answer all the purposes of those formed by nature, and are generally more regular and beautiful."

A "friend to humanity" gives such a glowing description of the advantages of Dr. Scudder's artificial eyes, that many an ambitious belle, on believing the same, would be nearly tempted to extinguish her own, in order to kill with the glass optics of the doctor.

"Thespis" praises the New-York drama, and ends a sentence of Johnsonian magnitude and dignity, by eulogizing the liberality of that public which has appreciated the "splendid histrionic genius of a Cook, a Kean, and a Jenkins." As our memory does not furnish us with any remarkable display on the part of any person by the name of the latter candidate for immortality, we suspect "Thespis" had better drop "Mr. Jenkins," and let Kean and Cook find their way down to posterity without his assistance.

We must also compliment the modesty of the individual signing himself "Truth," who wishes us to assure our readers that his friend's "lucky lottery-office" is very far before all its contemporaries in lavishing high prizes upon its patrons, and that they who purchase tickets there are quite certain to make their fortune. Indeed, master "Truth" we shall assure our readers no such thing, but, on the contrary, recommend them to give the old proverb about "a fool and his money," a careful consideration.

After the puffs, which have of late years grown into so much importance that they form by themselves a distinct department of literature, we come to notes of a personal character, from "old subscribers," "friends to periodical literature," "constant readers," and "admirers of native genius," meaning us! With these frequently floats in one from some nameless Aristarchus, who demolishes us with learned criticisms in bad grammar, and uncommonly severe impertinence, incorrectly spelled. This produces the drollest contrasts and discords imaginable; and if we had time to peruse all of the latter, or room to lay them before our trusty readers, "white, black, and gray, with all their trumpery," they would unscrow the grimmest features into a smile. We think, one of these days, when our devil presses us hard for "copy," we will turn over some of them as specimens. An eastern king ordered his minister to come every morning into his apartment and remind him that he was a man. We do not aspire to the importance of the oriental sovereign; but, although the author of an anonymous insult has but a sorry theme to think on when he retires at night to his pillow, yet these abusive epistles, like the warning of the monarch's minister, we consider as useful to us as they are inseparable from an editorial life. They compose a convenient balance to praises as indiscriminate and ill-judged. For example, "Coriolanus" writes us that we are reviving the days of Addison, and thrusts us into as great company as "Thespis" does Mr. Jenkins, but our vanity is checked by the virulence of "Socrates," who gratifies us with the intelligence that "a man of sense would feel insulted by having our trash put into his hands." "Senex," in a youthful style of flippancy, reproaches us for having rejected his "lines to the star of even;" and the same post brought us favors from two gentlemen, one of whom has discovered that our paper has lately squinted towards Jacksonism, while the other accuses us of an undue partiality for young women. To the latter charge particularly, we shall not plead till we ascertain the penalty in case of a verdict against us.

Out of the whole heap which we have opened to-day, we have selected the following:

BALTIMORE, Dec. 27, 1831.

"MESSRS. EDITORS.—We were almost tired to death of your paper in this city for many months, in consequence of your frequent critiques upon the opera of Cinderella. Whether the piece be good or bad, we were heartily contented not to hear any thing about it. If bad, it was a mere waste of time—if good, it was exceedingly tantalizing to hear of your revelling in the delights of so delicious a banquet while we were hungry at a distance. Since that time Cinderella has been produced in Baltimore. I write this to give vent to my feelings of admiration, and to acquit you of any wrong in having so often alluded to its exquisite music. Mrs. Austin has carried every thing before her, and has half-turned the heads of the inhabitants of this city. Cinderella opened here the other evening to nine hundred dollars, rather more, I believe, than can sit in the theatre. The band and music were generally good. Walton played the Prince, and better than I thought he would, but I hear he is no substitute for Jones. The tail of one of the wicker horses, in the ball-room scene, took fire, it being of flax. The people on the stage shouted—the audience screamed—the rats and lizards also roared murder. Mrs. Austin narrowly escaped from the carriage with her dress on fire, notwithstanding the assistance of the Fairy Queen. It was, however, instantly extinguished. The people were rushing out, and could hardly be composed. However, it ended happily. Yours, &c. &c. A SPECTATOR."

"MESSRS. EDITORS.—That you are not wrapped up in politics and the abstruse departments of science, renders the Mirror a most welcome visitor in our family. Assure yourselves, gentlemen, that I am not flattering you with an empty compliment when I praise you for occasionally touching on those relations of private life, which men are apt to esteem too unimportant for their consideration. I am the mother of several children, whose happiness is more interesting to me than the election of aldermen, or even the decision of the presidential question. When my little Julia's blue eyes are filled with tears, what are Adamsmen or Jacksonmen to me, compared with the knowledge how to dry them? and when young master Charles, after having done something wrong, regards me with such beseeching looks, and turns so pale at the sight of my displeasure, how much obliged I am to learn in what way I may soothe the yearnings of my love towards him without sinking the influence of the preceptor in the affections of the mother. Yet I have ever been an advocate for flagellation, and thought no child could be governed but by fear. Your sketch of the boy who had been beaten at school struck me so forcibly with the cruelty and the absurdity which frequently characterize the punishment of childhood, that I reflected whether I myself might not sometimes appear to others equally absurd and cruel, when in a hasty, and perhaps passionate moment I strike my trembling boy. I should have punished him on new-year's day by placing in his stocking a whip instead of the usual supply of childish treasures; but the anecdote related in your last, of the little fellow whose feelings were so severely wounded by a similar proceeding, checked my hand. When I entered his chamber late on the previous evening, in order to fulfil my plan, I paused to reflect upon myself as an agent of evil, thus stealing secretly, like a murderer, to stab the heart of the innocent reposing by my side. He little dreamed of the cruelty which his mother's hand was preparing for him. My eyes suddenly filled with tears, and I desisted from the attempt, but on the next morning, before I placed him in possession of such gifts as I had presented to his brothers and sisters, I called him to me, kissed him, and explained the deception which is usually practiced upon young children respecting St. Nicholas, and also informed him what I intended to have done in his case. He was strangely interested; and I made a deep impression and a moral one upon his feelings, when I added, 'Now, my dear boy, although you have done wrong, I thought by showing you your bad conduct in its proper light, instead of disgracing you and keeping you from enjoying this pleasant day with your brothers and sisters, that you would love me more and be less likely to do wrong in future. I trust to your own good sense to understand hereafter how wicked and unkind it is in you to disobey your mother, who would always rather forgive you and kiss you, than do any thing to make you unhappy.'

"Could I paint to you the looks of my child, who perfectly understood my meaning; his eyes full of tears, and cast down, not by terror, but his own conviction that he had acted incorrectly! I agree with you, gentlemen, that the task of forming infant minds is one which requires wonderful patience, tenderness, and care—and that beating, scolding, and other harsh, angry punishments, are too frequently practised. Yours, &c. A MOTHER."

"GENTLEMEN.—I am a member of the medical profession, and an old gentleman into the bargain, and therefore, however the young folks may titter, I may make some pretensions to wisdom. I am also an old New-Yorker, and generally keep an eye, as well as yourselves, upon what is going on about town. My object in writing this is to beg you will warn your lady readers against any rash exposure to this inclement season and climate. I think I can detect the influenza hiding itself in the folds of a light dress, and the consumption lurking in a pair of thin shoes. I keep a little day-book, in which I note down certain events, and send you a few items from it, which you can put into your paper or the fire, as you think best.

"Miss Louisa Wadman—a beautiful creature—her shape greatly admired. Saw her yesterday walking in Broadway in thin shoes. Called in to-day to prescribe for her. She complains of racking headache and pain in all her bones."

"Lucy Le Roy—carried off the palm for loveliness at Mrs. Williams's jam, the other evening, in a dress adapted to summer. Her brother came to me to-day, pale as ashes, to say that she is alarmingly ill—pain in the chest and difficulty of breathing. She cannot leave her room in a month, if she can ever."

"Emily Rose—the pride and joy of her family. She ventured out too soon after a slight attack of the prevailing epidemic, and lies at this instant in a burning fever, uttering the incoherent ravings of delirium."

"Sophia Gifford.—I shook hands with her last week in the street. Her countenance was overspread with a glow of ruddy health, and the exhilaration of exercise made her eyes sparkle with delight. I pointed to her feet and shook my finger at her, half in earnest and half in jest.

"Where are your thick shoes, you naughty girl?"

"Oh, doctor," she said, "they are so detestably awkward. You doctors are always trying to frighten people!"

"She never looked so well."

"I have just left a still, shaded room, where, on a bed of snowy whiteness, with a gauze drawn over her stiffened features, lies a cold dead form. Accustomed as I am to horrors, I can scarcely believe so amiable, so admirable a being has been sacrificed for so trifling an act of imprudence. Yours, &c. O. P."

THE CARRIER'S MEDLEY;

A DUST, AS SAID OR SUNG BY TWO CELEBRATED FEMALE VOCALISTS, ON THE FIRST OF JANUARY, AND DEDICATED TO THE PATRONS OF

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

WRITTEN FOR THE CARRIER BY S. WOODWORTH.

SCENE—A drawing-room in Broadway in the house of Captain Moore, commander of the U. S. ship of the line Spitfire, just arrived from a cruise among the islands of the torrid zone.

As the curtain rises the orchestra strike up the air—"Songs of shepherds and rustical roundelays,"—long since immortalized by the facetious George Alexander Stevens, the celebrated lecturer on heads.

Enter Mrs. Moore (formerly Miss Affable) attended by her favorite woman, Susan.

I.

MRS. MOORE.

Time trips forward with fearful rapidity,
Once I thought that he travelled too slow;
Then my bosom, with eager fervidity,
Long'd to welcome the season of snow.
Now, Susan, it really appears to me clearly,
A little month, merely, instead of a year,
Since you last curled my tresses with New-Year's addresses,
From five or six presses! Now isn't it queer?

II.

SUSAN.

Time increases his wonted perniciousity,
Bards all tell us, when treading on flowers;
Love and Hymen, with wealth and felicity,
Now have added new wings to your hours.
'Tis due to that solely, for time travel'd slowly,
And pulses throb'd lowly, a twelvemonth ago;
But soon as you trapp'd in a certain brave captain,
Your wishes were wrapped in—things alter'd you know.

III.

MRS. MOORE.

True, dear Susan—I own it with gratitude;
Yet, tho' never so happy before,
Although possess'd of each earthly beatitude,
Still I am frequently praying for Moore!
But come—'tis the season for rhyme and not reason;
'Twere folly and treason to moralize now:
So bring forth your treasures—these holiday measures
Can add to our pleasures, we all must allow.

Susan takes from a table a bundle of NEW-YEAR'S ADDRESSES, and names the different offices from which they emanated, in the following solo:

IV.

Here's the "Daily," "Gazette," and the "Journal," too,
King's "American," "Advocate," "Post,"
Stone's "Commercial," and he's a colonel too,
Mumford's "Standard,"—egad! there's a host!
Webb's "Courier-Enquirer," that right-and-left firer,
And Jackson's admirer—the "Mercantile," too—

MRS. MOORE.

There're dailies; don't heed 'em—I don't wish to read 'em,
We ladies don't need 'em.—My favorite, Sue?

V.

That alone, amid all this variety,
Teems with sentiment, genius, and mirth;
That is read by the best of society,
All agree 'tis unrivalled in worth. [Susan seems at fault.]
Each line's worth a guinea—the MIRROR, you ninny!
Which always has been a deposit of wit;
Whose annual ditty, so lively and witty,
Enraptures the city—say, has it come yet?

VI.

SUSAN.

Mirror carriers, with strict punctuality,
Serve their patrons in sunshine or rain,
Yet, you see, on this day of hilarity,
Here we seek for their verses in vain.

MRS. MOORE.

The symptom is pleasing—while others are teasing,
With ardor unceasing, to sell us their lays,
These men of true merit, appear to inherit,
A high-minded spirit deserving of praise.

VII.

Still I'm longing to know the particular
Themes discussed in their poem this year;
Winds may vary—but poets, still fickle,
Always are aiming at something that's queer.

SUSAN.

The vassals of passion, of folly, and fashion,
Who heedlessly dash on, regardless of cash,
Without understanding the danger of stranding,
Are subjects demanding the touch of their lash.

VIII.

MRS. MOORE.

Europe, scourged with the cholera's ravages!
Belgium, saved from a threatening storm;
Poles, betrayed to the vengeance of savages!
Albion, robb'd of her promised reform!

SUSAN.

Poor Erin still pleading, and Portugal bleeding,
While Gallia, unheeding, still winks at each wrong;
Though Turkey progresses, with christian-like dresses,
And new printing-presses—fine subjects for song.

IX.

MRS. MOORE.

Patriot Bolivar, liberty's martyr too,
Claims a dirge from the holiday lyre,
While his country, by traffic and barter too,
Find their freedom about to expire.

For despots and regents, with half-savage legions,
Are causing those regions of beauty to bleed;
In liberty's name too, they kindle the flame too,
And boldly lay claim to a patriot's meed.

X.

These contrast with our country's prosperity,
Wealth, and strength, and extending domain,
Marching on with increasing celerity,
Sure the goal of true glory to gain.

SUSAN.

Resources still growing, exchequer o'erflowing,
No one debtor owing, but what she can pay;
By heaven directed, by valor protected,
By millions respected, who bow to her sway.

XI.

MRS. MOORE.

Famed for genius, the arts and the sciences,
Justice, equity, freedom, and peace;
Forming no entangling alliances,
Still beholding her blessings increase.

SUSAN.

Though "nullification" may threaten separation,
Our Union's duration will never be o'er,
For party dissensions, with local pretensions,
And tariff conventions, unite us the more.

XII.

MRS. MOORE.

Themes like these, for to-day, would be suitable,
Well discussed by the pen of a bard;
These we know to be facts irrefutable,
Subjects worthy each reader's regard.

SUSAN.

For incidents local, in tuneful strain vocal,
A point the most focal our city supplies,
Where critics discerning, of genius and learning,
Pretended wits spurning, true merit will prize.

XIII.

MRS. MOORE.

Native dramas, both tragic and farcical,
Paulding's Dutchman, in green muslin dress,
Family Library, and volumes more classical,
Harpers pour them in streams from their press.

SUSAN.

There's Dunlap and Trumbull, whose works will ne'er crumble,
Till monuments tumble, and nature shall pause;
And then they might mention the march of invention,
With Durant's ascension, amid shouts of applause.

XIV.

MRS. MOORE.

Hark! the door bell announces a visitor!

[Bell rings.]

SUSAN.

That's the Mirror, I'll wager, that rings.

MRS. MOORE, handing her purse.

Give a crown to the modest solicitor,
That he merits whatever he brings.
How many are losing the bliss of perusing
Productions amusing, by grudging the fee;
When woman turns miser, what hero would prize her?
I think she is wiser who squanders like me.

[Exit Susan.]

Re-enter SUSAN, with Address, singing:

XV.

Here's the treasure you're anxiously waiting for;
Sixteen stanzas, in dialogue too!
"Songs of shepherds,"—

MRS. MOORE.

Now what are you prating for?
Let me instantly look at it, Sue!

[She takes the poem and examines it.]

The same playful measure! Indeed 'tis a treasure!

I'll read it at leisure—so give me my purse.

SUSAN, returning the purse.

Nay, tarry one minute, and tell me what's in it;
You need not begin it—just sing the last verse.

MRS. MOORE, sings from the Address.

XVI.

"While our country is crown'd with felicity,
"Wealth and honor, with freedom and peace,
"May each blessing await upon this city,
"Genius flourish, and knowledge increase.
"May honors attend you, and fortune befriend you,
"Till heaven shall send you a message of love;
"May angels then meet you, and cordially greet you,
"While Mercy shall seat you in mansions above."

BOTH.

"May honors attend you, and fortune befriend you,
"Till heaven shall send you a message of love;
"May angels then meet you, and cordially greet you,
"While Mercy shall seat you in mansions above." [Exeunt.]

GLEANINGS FROM BREWSTER'S LIFE OF NEWTON.

CARES OF GREATNESS.—Bigotry, ignorance, and prejudice are ever on the watch to oppose every innovation and improvement. Newton's discoveries plunged him into controversies with the world, and the philosophers of the day, many of whom carried on their debates with a virulence for which all the fame of that wonderful man could scarcely atone. In gaining reputation he lost his tranquillity. His biographer quotes from his letters as follows:

"I intend," says he, "to be no farther solicitous about matters of philosophy. And therefore I hope you will not take it ill if you find me never doing any thing more in that kind; or rather, that you will favor me in my determination, by preventing, so far as you can conveniently, any objections or other philosophical letters that may concern me." In a subsequent letter in 1675, he says, "I had some thoughts of writing a further discourse about colors, to be read at one of your assemblies; but find it yet against the grain to put pen to paper any more on that subject;" and in a letter to Leibnitz, dated December the 9th, 1675, he observes, "I was so persecuted with discussions, arising from the publication of my theory of light, that I blamed my own imprudence for parting with so substantial a blessing as my quiet to run after a shadow."

LIGHT.—The rays of solar light possess several remarkable physical properties: they heat—they illuminate—they promote chemical combination—they effect chymical decompositions—they impart magnetism to steel—they alter the colors of bodies—they communicate to plants and flowers their peculiar colors, and are in many cases necessary to the development of their characteristic qualities. It is impossible to admit for a moment that these varied effects are produced by a mere mechanical action, or that they arise from the agitation of the particles of bodies by the vibration of the ether which is considered to be the cause of light. Whatever be the difficulties which attach to the theory which supposes light to consist of material particles, we are compelled, by its properties, to admit that light acts as if it were material, and that it enters into combinations with bodies, in order to produce the effects which we have enumerated.

COPERNICUS.—This illustrious astronomer was surrounded by prejudices of so disgusting a nature, that even after having completed his work on the revolutions of the heavenly bodies, was afraid to give the results of his investigations to the world.

"Aware," says Mr. Brewster, "of the prejudices, and even of the hostility with which such a system would be received, he resolved neither to startle the one nor provoke the other. He allowed his opinions to circulate in the slow current of personal communication. The points of opposition which they presented to established doctrines were gradually worn down, and they insinuated themselves into reception among the ecclesiastical circles by the very reluctance of their author to bring them into notice. In the year 1534, Cardinal Schonberg, Bishop of Capua, and Gyse, Bishop of Culm, exerted all their influence to induce Copernicus to lay his system before the world; but he resisted their solicitations; and it was not till 1539 that an accidental circumstance contributed to alter his resolution."

TYCHO BRAHE.—Dissatisfied with his residence in Denmark, Tycho resolved to settle in some distant country: and having gone as far as Venice in search of a suitable residence, he at last fixed upon Basle, in Switzerland. The king of Denmark, however, had learned his intention from the prince of Hesse; and when Tycho returned to Copenhagen to remove his family and his instruments, his sovereign announced to him his resolution to detain him in his kingdom. He presented him with the canonry of Roskilde, with an income of two thousand crowns per annum. To this he added a pension of one thousand crowns; and he promised to give him the island of Huen, with a complete observatory erected under his own eye. This generous offer was instantly accepted.

JAMES THE FIRST.—When James I. went to Copenhagen in 1590, to conclude his marriage with the princess Anne of Denmark, he spent eight days under the roof of Tycho at Uraniburg. As a token of his gratitude, he composed a set of Latin verses in honor of the astronomer, and left him a magnificent present at his departure. He gave him also his royal license for the publication of his works in England, and accompanied with the following complimentary letter.

"Nor am I acquainted with these things on the relation of others, or from a mere perusal of your works, but I have seen them with my own eyes, and heard them with my own ears, in your residence at Uraniburg, during the various learned and agreeable conversations which I there held with you, which even now affect my mind to such a degree that it is difficult to decide whether I recollect them with greater pleasure or admiration."

JOHN KEPLER.—The misery in which Kepler lived forms a painful contrast with the services which he performed to science. The pension on which he subsisted was always in arrears, and though the three emperors whose reigns he adorned, directed their ministers to be more punctual in its payment, the disobedience of their commands was a source of continued vexation to Kepler. When he retired to Sagan, in Silesia, to spend in retirement the remainder of his days his pecuniary difficulties became still more harassing. Necessity at last compelled him to apply personally for the arrears which were due; and he accordingly set out in 1630 for Ratisbon; but in consequence of the great fatigue which so long a journey on horseback produced, he was seized with a fever, which carried him off on the 30th November, 1630, in the fifty-ninth year of his age.

THE TELESCOPE.—There is, perhaps, no invention that science has presented to man so extraordinary in its nature, and so boundless in its influence as that of the telescope. To the uninstructed mind, the power of seeing an object a thousand miles distant, as large and nearly as distinct as if it were brought within a mile of the observer, must seem almost miraculous; and to the philosopher even, who thoroughly comprehends the principles upon which it acts, it must ever appear one of the most elegant applications of science. To have been the first astronomer in whose hands such a gift was placed, was a preference to which Galileo owed much of his future reputation.

No sooner had he completed his telescope than he applied it to the heavens, and on the seventh January, 1618, the first day of its use, he saw round Jupiter three bright little stars lying in a line parallel to the ecliptic, two to the east, and one to the west of the planet. Regarding them as ordinary stars, he never thought of estimating their distances. On the following day, when he accidentally directed his telescope to Jupiter, he was surprised to see the three stars to the west of the planet. To produce this effect it was requisite that the motion of Jupiter should be direct, though, according to calculation, it was actually retrograde. In this dilemma he waited with impatience for the evening of the ninth, but unfortunately the sky was covered with clouds. On the tenth he saw only two stars to the east—a circumstance which he was no longer able to explain by the motion of Jupiter. He was therefore compelled to ascribe the change to the stars themselves; and upon repeating his observations on the eleventh, he no longer doubted that he had discovered three planets revolving round Jupiter. On the thirteenth January he for the first time saw the fourth satellite.

PREJUDICES OF THE ABBE CONTI.—This noble Venetian accused Newton of reviving the occult qualities of the schools. But the most remarkable passage of his is the following: "I am a great friend of experimental philosophy, but Newton deviates much from it when he pretends that all matter is heavy, or that each particle of matter attracts every other particle."

*Simon Marius, mathematician to the marquis of Brandenburg, assures us that he discovered the satellites of Jupiter in November, 1609.

FUGITIVE SKETCHES.

STORY OF GRATITUDE.

WHEN we find so much ingratitude and selfishness among mankind, and after conferring considerable favors, instead of securing a friend, find "the ingrate and cankered Bolingbroke"—when we so often see an apparent act of liberality originate from a selfish motive, it gives us pleasure to meet with an instance of disinterested generosity and pure gratitude in return; it makes us better satisfied with mankind and our situation among them.

The following was copied from the journal of an American ship-master, in his own words; he was an eye-witness of what he relates, and recorded it merely as a source of amusement for himself.

As I was standing, says the writer, in the street gate of the French coffee-house in Lima, with several American captains, one of whom was named Bs, our attention was attracted by a general officer, in full uniform, of a fine commanding appearance, coming out of the coffee-house, attended by his secretary. When near us he started, stopped an instant, then ran and caught B. in his arms, and cried, "My dear B. my dear friend! how happy I am to see you!" B. was astonished, and told him he did not recollect him. "What!" he says, "not recollect Hualero!" The exclamations of joy and congratulation were now mutual, and they went into the coffee-house together. Hualero immediately inquired of B. if he could serve him? he offered his purse—his house, or his interest. B. replied, that he was master of a vessel, which, with the cargo, had been seized by government on account of some Spanish property on board; that the trial would come on soon, and that the result was doubtful; in every other respect his circumstances were such as to need no assistance. Hualero told him to give himself no uneasiness, that he would attend to the business, that his obligations to him were such that he could never expect to cancel them, but it would give him the greatest pleasure to render him any service in his power. After some further conversation, he took leave, inviting B. to dine with him the next day, and bring any of his friends whom he chose.

On the following day, B. with two of his acquaintances left Lima for Bella Vista, a small village where the Colombian and Peruvian forces were encamped, under the command of Hualero. They had chosen this place as it was within gunshot of Callao castles, and convenient for erecting batteries behind the houses, without being annoyed by the Spaniards, (who still held the castles under the command of Rodil, the only spot on the continent of South America in their possession.) When the breast-work was completed and mounted with long brass twenty-four pounders, the buildings were torn down, and a heavy canonade opened on the astonished garrison, who, however, in return sent an immense quantity of bombs and shot into the batteries and village, but without much effect. After cannonading for several days, the fire gradually ceased on both sides, and was only continued at intervals.

In one of the batteries they found the general, who received them with much kindness and attention, and, after showing them all that could interest them for their amusement, ordered several shots to be thrown among a party of foragers outside the walls of the castle. The shots were promptly returned by the garrison, and were thrown with great precision. Hualero was personally known to Rodil and his officers; and being very conspicuous from his dress, all the shot appeared to be directed at him, not one of which passed more than twenty feet from him and his party. Several soldiers were wounded and one killed by the explosion of a bomb. After this military diversion, they repaired to the general's quarters, and dined with him and several of his officers. After dinner, the general related to the company his obligations to Captain B., and gave the following toast: "Captain B., the savior of my life." He then told him that his secretary had interceded with the government respecting his vessel, and that he might expect a favorable decision. When the party took leave, the general accompanied them nearly to Lima. The kindness and attention of Hualero to B. was unremitting. He offered to furnish him any house in Lima he chose to select, and was continually urging favors upon him. B.'s property was soon after liberated, though it was well known to be liable to condemnation. That a general officer in the Colombian army should have so much influence with the government, will not surprise any one who is acquainted with the state of affairs in Peru at that time.

The cause of Hualero's obligations to B. was as follows:—Several months after the Spanish army, under Morillo, had overrun the greatest part of Colombia, and almost annihilated the Patriot forces, B. was in the Havana, master of a vessel belonging to Philadelphia. He had finished his business, and was on the point of sailing for home, when he was accosted in the street by a man of an ordinary dress, with a shabby straw hat, requesting to know if he could have a passage to the United States, with a separate cabin for his family. B. would not have hesitated a moment to refuse, had not his address been much superior to his appearance. Observing B.'s hesitation, he produced a purse of doubloons, and offered to pay his passage in advance, intimating that his appearance was rather from choice than necessity. B. having no other passengers, finally concluded to take him. The same afternoon he came on board with his family, and they soon after weighed anchor. It was near sunset when they came abreast the Moro castle, and were boarded by the guard-boat, with an officer and six or seven soldiers, who ordered the passengers and crew to be mustered on deck. After examining the roll of equipage, and asking the usual questions, he turned to the captain, and asked him if he was aware that he had a prisoner of war on board as a passenger. Before he could reply, he turned to the agitated Hualero, who expected that his disguise would protect him, and ordered him to go with him immediately on shore. B., who spoke the Spanish fluently, requested the officer to walk below, and showed the passenger's passport, which was intended for another person, whose name it now appeared he had assumed. The officer seemed satisfied, but told him Hualero must go on shore without delay. B. went on deck to give the necessary orders, while the officer remained below, seated at the table with a bottle of wine, which he did not think necessary to leave till all was ready. He found the unfortunate Hualero standing near the taffarel, his wife and children clinging to him, almost distracted with grief; but he stood perfectly erect, apparently unconscious of their presence. The ferocious expression of his eyes, and stern, determined look, showed that he was meditating on some desperate action. His reflections were interrupted by B., who told him he was sorry for his misfortunes, and that he regretted he had not informed him at first of his situation. He repeated the orders of the officer, and told him that no time could be lost. Hualero begged one moment's delay; then stated as briefly as possible, that he was a native of Colombia, had been a general officer in the Colombian army, that he had been taken prisoner, with many others, and sent to the Havana, his family being allowed to accompany him—had been several months closely confined, that his strength of constitution had enabled him to survive the confinement in that dreadful climate, which had proved fatal to most of his companions; that he had lately been enlarged on his parole, and had heard that all the prisoners of war were to be again closely confined. A friend had supplied him with money, and procured him the passport of a man who had died soon after receiving it. He dreaded another confinement—he preferred death, and determined to make his escape; "but I have failed," he said, "it is all over; I have no more hope, but I am armed, (showing a dagger,) and shall sell my life as dearly as possible; for never, never will I return to be punished by the merciless Spaniards." He looked at his wife for a moment, and his countenance lost its sternness; he appeared softened. "For myself," he added, "I am almost indifferent; but my faithful wife and poor children—." His voice faltered; he turned away, and covered his face. The situation of the unfortunate man, the tears of his children, and mute despair of his wife, forcibly excited the compassion of B., who was one of those warm-hearted persons who frequently act from the impulse of the moment, when their feelings are excited, without reflecting on the impropriety of the action, or the consequences. He told Hualero that he would protect him at the risk of his life. He immediately called the crew, and told them that they must stand by him, and assist him in detaining the boat till they got out to sea. The sailors, who had witnessed the whole, required no explanation, but told him to depend upon them.

It was now sunset. The vessel, with a light breeze, was slowly passing the Moro; the officer, becoming impatient, came on deck, and in a haughty manner demanded why his prisoner was not in the boat. He was told that he was not going. "Very well, sir," he said; "then there is something there," (pointing at the Moro castle, which was still visible,) "that will soon bring you too; jump into the boat, men, and pull for the shore." "Stop," said B. "you have a large safe boat, and must go a short distance to sea with me to-night. There is no time to parley; resistance will be instant death. You see we are armed, and ready to put my threat in execution." The officer, who did not think it necessary to risk his life for what, perhaps, he felt but little interest, and seeing all hands armed, thought it wisest to acquiesce, and submitted, in sulky silence. After clearing the Moro, they got a fine breeze, carried the boat so far as not to fear a pursuit, and permitted them to return. On the arrival of the vessel at Philadelphia, Hualero lived in the family of B. until he had an opportunity to return to his own country. Years had passed away. Colombia had established her independence, and had sent her armies, under Bolivar, to assist the republicans in Peru, who were struggling for existence. In 1824, after making a forced march to secure a pass for the purpose of preventing the junction of the Spanish forces, but being too late, and the Spanish army double his force, it was evident from the conduct of the brave Bolivar, that he considered the cause entirely lost. He left the army, which was in the interior, and repaired to Lima, having ordered Sucre to retreat to the sea-coast, if possible; but if the army was destroyed, to save himself. Bolivar had vessels ready at Chaneay, to embark at a moment's notice; but the famous battle of Ayacucho changed the face of affairs, and established the independence of Peru. Hualero had been ordered from Caracas with a considerable body of fine troops, to reinforce the patriot army in the interior of Peru. He embarked at Panama, and arrived safe at Lima; but his reinforcement was no longer necessary in the interior, and he was ordered to invest Callao castles, while the combined patriot fleet blockaded the port. This was in March, 1825, about two or three months after the battle of Ayacucho. In the mean time B. had doubled Cape Horn, and arrived at Lima, where they accidentally met at the coffee-house gate, but under very different circumstances; Hualero in power, and the full tide of prosperity, but B. in distress, and needing his assistance. The conduct of neither in the first instance, would bear strict scrutiny; but the boldness and generosity of B., and the ardent gratitude of Hualero, must excite our admiration. The story may also have its moral; that a generous action is not always repaid with ingratitude. It is by such conduct that the character of our nation will rise in the estimation of foreigners to the height that it merits. Persons who never leave the United States have but a faint idea of their opinion respecting us. We are so conscious of our own merit, (and certainly with good reason,) that we never dream we are underrated by others. But the mists and clouds of ignorance are dispersing. Our country is becoming better known, and consequently more respected.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

From the New Monthly Magazine.

ANTI-INNOVATOR.

PLAQUE take the world! why cannot it stand still, and go on as it used to do when I was a boy? What do the people mean by the progress of events and the march of intellect? What good ever came by change? How is it possible that any man can be wiser than his father? Where can a man get his wisdom from but from his father? and his father cannot give him more than he has got to give. Ah dear! ah dear! I remember the time when the parish beadle was a man of some consequence, when a lord was a thing to be stared at, and a sight to be talked about—and the king!—why no man in his senses ever thought of the king but with the profoundest respect. Every day after dinner as soon as my father had said grace, he poured out a bumper of port, and drank "Church and King." It did one's heart good to see and hear him; it was as good as a sermon. The wine itself seemed conscious of the glory of its destination to be swallowed not unblest, and it looked bright in the glass and seemed to dance with eagerness to meet his lips. But now o' days, if I venture to toast church and king, I am forced to do it in a hurried, irreligious sort of way, with a kind of a sneer, as much as to say, it's all in my eye; or my boy Tom will laugh at me and drink the majesty of the people. The majesty of the people indeed! I should like to see it. There used to be some reverence shown to lords in former times—but how are they treated now? Snubbed at in the newspapers, elbowed in the streets, quizzed in epigrams, peppered with pamphlets, shown up in novels, robbed of their boroughs, and threatened with annihilation. People call that the march of intellect—I call it the march of insolence. When I was a boy, all the books we had in the house were the Bible and Prayer Book, and the Court Calendar; the first two containing our religion, and the last our politics: as for literature, what did we want with it? It is only the means of turning the world upside down, and putting notions into people's heads that would never get there without.

All the evil that is in the world came by innovation; and there is no part of the world free from innovation, neither the heavens above, nor the earth beneath, nor the waters that are under the earth. What business have men in the air with balloons? What good can they get there? What do they go there for but merely to come down, and perhaps break their necks? They would be much safer upon dry ground. Our ancestors used to be content with the sun, and moon, and stars, and four or five planets; now, forsooth, the impertinent ones must be poking their telescopes up to the sky, and discovering new planets, almost every night, as if we had not got as many planets already as we could do with.

Steam engines—I do not think we should ever have heard a word about parliamentary reform, if it had not been for steam engines. I hope Mr. Colburn will not have his magazine with this article printed with a steam press, for if he does I shall not dare to read it for fear of being blown up. What did we want with steam engines? Did we not beat the French without steam engines? To be sure we did. I hate innovations. I should just like to know what is to become of all the hackney coach-horses, if we are to have steam carriages. The poor beasts look half-starved as it is; they will be ten times worse if they are to be turned out to make room for steam engines; and what shall we do for dog's meat if there are no horses to cut up? Then we must have Macadamized roads too! our ancestors did very well without Macadamized roads. They took their time in travelling from one place to another; and if they happened to be too late for the stage, they had nothing to do but run after it and catch it. Let them try to do so now.

Buildings, too! did ever any mortal see such an overgrown place as London is now? There is not a dirty ditch within five miles of London that has not got some Paradise-row, or Mount Pleasant, or Prospect-place stuck into it. Why can't the citizens live in the city as they used to do, and stick to their shops? There is no such place as the country now, it is all come to London. And what sort of houses do they build? Look at them—a bundle of matches for the timbers, and a basket of bricks for the walls.

Rail-roads—a pretty contrivance, forsooth! to pick the pockets of the good old wagon-horses, and the regular legitimate coach-horses that had stood the test of ages. Pray what is to become of the farmers, if there are no horses to eat their oats? And how are the rents to be paid, and the taxes, and the tithes, and the poor rates? and who is to pay the interest of the national debt? and what will become of the church if horses do not eat oats to enable the farmers to pay their tithes and feed the clergy? Manchester and Liverpool were quite near enough without the assistance of a rail road; and if the building mania goes on much longer, there will be no need of a road from one to the other, for they will both join, and the people may be in both places at once. People are talking now of rail-roads superseding canals, the good old canals, half of which are already three-quarters full of dock-weed and dead cats.

Look at the population, too! People go on increasing and multiplying as if they never intended to leave off. Hundreds and hundreds of people are coming into the world who have no right to be born. The world is as full as it can hold already; there is positively no room for any more. There was nothing like the number of children to be seen about the streets when I was a boy as there is now. I have sometimes half a mind to ask those lubberly boys that I see about the streets, what right they had to be here; but perhaps they would make me some impertinent answer, for they swagger about as if they thought that they had as good a right to be here as any one else. They should be ashamed of themselves for existing to the manifest inconvenience of gentlemen and ladies to whom they are exceedingly annoying.

Look at the reform bill, that sink of innovation, to speak metaphorically; that climax of novelty, that abominable poke in the ribs of our constitution, that destroyer of all that is venerable. Its opponents have been accused of talking nonsense against it. Very likely they have talked nonsense, for they have been so flabbergasted at the innovation, that they have not known what they have been saying.

If things go on changing at this rate for the next hundred years as they have done of late, we shall scarcely have a relic of the good old times left. The weather is not as it used to be when I was a boy. Oh! those were glorious old times when we had sunshine all through the summer, and hard frost all through the winter, when for one half of the year we could bathe every day, and for the other half could skate every day. There is nothing of that sort now. If a man buys a pair of skates in the winter, it is sure to thaw next day; and if a boy buys a pair of corks one day, there is sure to be a hard frost next morning. There is nothing but wet weather all through the winter, and no dry weather all through the summer. Formerly we used to have an eclipse or two in the course of the year, and we used to look at it through smoked glass, and very good fun it was, only it used to make our noses black, if we did not take care to hold the glass properly. If we look into the almanac for an eclipse, we are sure to see that it is invisible in these parts; and even if it is visible we can never see it, for there is always cloudy weather. I scarcely know any thing that is now as it used to be when I was a boy. Day and night have not quite changed places, but night and morning have. What used to be Sunday morning, when I was a little boy, has now, by strange mutation, become Saturday night. I wonder why people cannot dine at dinner-time as they used to do; but every thing is in disorder; a wild spirit of innovation has seized men's minds, and they will do nothing as they used to do, and as they ought to do. Things went on well enough when I was a boy; we had not half the miseries and calamities that one sees and hears of now. What an absurd and ridiculous invention is that nasty, filthy gas! The buildings where it is made look like prisons outside, and like infernal regions within; and there always is some accident or other happening with it: people have their houses blown up, and it serves them right, for they have no business to encourage such newfangled trumpery. The streets used to be lit up well enough with the good old fashioned oil lamps, which were quite good enough for our ancestors, and I think they might have done for us; but any thing for innovation! I must confess I like to see the good old greasy lamp-lighters and their nice flaring torches, they were fifty times better than the modern gas-light men with their little hand lamps, like so many Guy Fawkes!

And what harm have the poor old watchmen done, I wonder, that they must be dismissed to make room for a set of new police men and blue coats? The regular old legitimate watchmen were the proper and constitutional defenders of the streets, just as regular as the king is the defender of the faith, and a more harmless set of men than the watchmen never existed; they would not hurt a fly. Things went on well enough when they had the care of the streets.

But innovations are not confined to the land, they have even encroached upon the water. Were not London, Blackfriars, and Westminster bridges enough in all conscience? What occasion was there for Waterloo bridge? a great, overgrown, granite monster, that cost ten times more than it is worth. And what occasion for Southwark bridge and Vauxhall bridge? Our ancestors could go to Vauxhall over Westminster or Blackfriars bridge. But of all the abominable innovations, none ever equalled the impudence of New London bridge. It was not at all wanted. I have been over the old one hundreds and hundreds of times. It is a good old bridge that has stood the test of ages, and it ought to have been treated with respect for very antiquity's sake. As for people being drowned in going under the bridge, nonsense! they would never have been drowned if they had done as I did—I always made a point of never going under it; and besides, if people are to be drowned, they will be drowned elsewhere if they are not here.

Talk of innovation, what can be a more outrageous innovation than steam-boats? They have frightened the fish out of the river already, and if they go on increasing as they have done of late, they will frighten the fish out of the sea too; and I should like to know where all the fishes are to go then? We shall be in a pretty mess if they all come ashore. Besides, the sea is obviously made to sail upon, or else what is the use of the wind? And if we have nothing but steam-boats, what will become of the sail-makers? People in these revolutionary times care nothing about vested interests. I hate innovation. I hate every thing that is new. I hate new shoes, they pinch my feet; I hate new hats, they pinch my forehead; I hate new coats, they put me in mind of tailor's bills. I hate every thing new, except the New Monthly Magazine, and I shall hate that if the editor rejects my article.

EXTRACT FROM COBBETT'S ADVICE TO A FATHER.

There is, in the management of babies, something besides life, health, strength, and beauty; and something too, without which all these put together are nothing worth; and that is sanity of mind. There are, owing to various causes, some who are born idiots; but a great many more become insane from the misconduct, or neglect of parents; and, generally, from the children being committed to the care of servants. I knew, in Pennsylvania, a child, as fine, and as sprightly, and as intelligent a child as ever was born, made an idiot for life by being, when about three years old, shut into a dark closet, by a maid servant, in order to terrify it into silence. The thoughtless creature first menaced it with sending it to "the bad place," as the phrase is there; and, at last, to reduce it to silence, put it into the closet, shut the door, and went out of the room. She went back, in a few minutes, and found the child in a fit. It recovered from that, but was for life an idiot. When the parents, who had been out two days and two nights on a visit of pleasure, came home, they were told that the child had had a fit; but they were not told the cause. The girl, however, who was a neighbor's daughter, being on her death-bed about ten years afterwards, could not die in peace without sending for the mother of the child (now become a young man) and asking forgiveness of her. The mother herself was, however, the greatest offender of the two: a whole lifetime of sorrow and of mortification was a punishment too light for her and her husband. Thousands upon thousands of human beings have been deprived of their senses by these and similar means.

It is not long since that we read, in the newspapers, of a child being absolutely killed, at Birmingham, I think it was, by being thus frightened. The parents had gone out to what is called an evening party. The servants, naturally enough, had their party at home; and the mistress, who, by some unexpected accident, had been brought home at an early hour, finding the parlor full of company, ran up stairs to see about her child, about two or three years old. She found it with its eyes open, but fixed; touching it, she found it inanimate. The doctor was sent for in vain: it was quite dead. The maid affected to know nothing of the cause; but some one of the parties assembled discovered, pinned up to the curtains of the bed, a horrid figure, made up partly of a frightful mask! This, as the wretched girl confessed, had been done to keep the child quiet, while she was with her company below. When one reflects on the anguish that the poor little thing must have endured, before the life was quite frightened out of it, one can find no terms sufficiently strong to express the abhorrence due to the perpetrator of this crime, which was, in fact, a cruel murder; and, if it was beyond the reach of the law, it was so and is so, because, as in the cases of parricide, the law, in making no provision for punishment peculiarly severe, has, out of respect to human nature, supposed such crimes to be impossible. But if the girl was criminal; if death, or a life of remorse was her due, what was the due of the parents, and especially of the mother! And what was the due of the father, who suffered that mother, and who, perhaps, tempted her to neglect her most sacred duty!

WINDSOR CASTLE.

A more magnificent and delightful royal residence can hardly be imagined than that of Windsor Castle. The eminence on which the castle stands is detached from every other, and advanced into the plain which it commands; it falls in a bold slope on one side, while it is easy of access on the other; and as the palace occupies almost all the brow, the whole hill seems but a base to the building. It rises in the midst of an enchanting country, and it is there the most distinguished spot: but though the situation is singular, it is not extravagant; it is great, but not wild. It is in itself noble, and all around it is beautiful.

The view from the terrace is not the most picturesque, but it is the gayest that can be conceived. The Thames diffuses a cheerfulness through all the counties where it flows, and this is in itself peculiarly cheerful. It is luxuriantly fertile; it is highly cultivated; it is full of villas and villages, and they are scattered all over it, not crowded together; no hurry of business appears, and no dreary waste is in sight; country churches and gentlemen's seats are every where intermixed with the fields and the trees. Every spot seems improved, but improved for the purposes of pleasure; all are rural: none are solitary: and the amenity of the plain is at the same time contrasted with the rich woods in the Great Park, their height, their shade, and their verdure.

The prospect is the more interesting, as all the environs of Windsor are classic ground. The forest prompted the first essays of Pope's muse; and Denham owes all his fame to his poem on Cooper's Hill. That beautiful eminence overlooks Runnymede, a place illustrious in English history. Behind it is Chertsey, the retreat of Cowley; before it Horton, the residence of Milton; and directly in front of the castle is Stoke churchyard, which Gray chose for the scene of his Elegy, and the place of his burial.

The castle itself and its appendages abound with monuments of antiquity and of genius. The remains of chivalry every where occur in this seat of the Order of the Garter; and the rude achievements of Edward III., his family, and his peers, are proper decorations for the hall of his knights. The pride of Wolsey still appears in the chapel which he intended for his obsequies, and which might be the mausoleum of a race of kings with propriety. The terrace was built by Elizabeth—was the resort of her warriors and statesmen, and is a work worthy of her reign. Here Shakspeare laid the scene of his comedy, when the queen dictated the subject; and Datchet Mead still retains its name; and the sawpit where the fairies lurked, may be traced; and the oak of Herne the hunter is standing. The poets of later days have always haunted the spot, and have celebrated the delights of Windsor as refinements on the pleasures of Charles II.'s dissipated court, and the majesty of the seat as reflecting lustre on the trophies of Queen Anne's triumphant reign.

The vast dimensions, also, and the style of the building, which, however deficient in some points of elegance and proportion, always retains an air of magnificence; the appropriation of distinct apartments to the several great officers of state, and the extent of the domains appendant on the castle; the groves in the Great Park, of eighteen miles in circumference, and the hills of the forest retiring to a distant horizon, are additional circumstances to distinguish this from all other royal residences. Gardener's Magazine.

PETRARCH'S LIBRARY.

The commencement of the reign of Lorenzo Celsi was distinguished by a magnificent bequest from Petrarch, of which the Venetians have proved themselves but little worthy. The poet appears to have contemplated his visits to the Lagune with no ordinary satisfaction; and, in order more substantially to testify his grateful sense of the frequent hospitality of the republic, he offered his library as a legacy. In 1362, while the plague was raging at Padua, he had fixed his abode at Venice, which was free from infection; his books accompanied him, and for their conveyance he was obliged to retain a numerous and expensive stud of baggage horses. On the fourth of September in that year he wrote to the senate, "I wish, with the good-will of our Saviour, and of the Evangelist himself, to make St. Mark heir of my library." His chief stipulations were, that the books should neither be sold nor dispersed, and that a building should be provided, in which they might be secure against fire and weather. The great council gladly accepted this liberal donation, and addressed its thanks in terms of courtesy (perhaps not exaggerated, if we remember the times in which they were written) "To a scholar unrivalled in poetry, in moral philosophy, and in theology." A palace which belonged to the family of Molina, and in later years was converted into a monastery for the nuns of St. Sepulchre, was assigned as a residence for the poet, and as a depository for his books. This collection, which formed the nucleus of the now inestimable library of St. Mark, though by no means extensive, still contained many treasures of no small price. Among them are enumerated a MS. of Homer, given to Petrarch by Nicolaus Sigerus, ambassador of the Greek emperor; a beautiful copy of Sophocles; the entire Iliad, and a great part of the Odyssey, translated by Leontius Pilato, and copied in the hand-writing of Boccaccio, whom the translator had instructed in Greek; an imperfect Quintilian; and most of the works of Cicero, translated by Petrarch himself, who professed most unbounded admiration for the great Roman philosopher. The Venetians, to their shame, grievously neglected the poet's gift. When Tomasini requested permission to inspect the books, in the early part of the seventeenth century, he was led to the roof of St. Mark's, where he found them, to use his own words, "partly reduced to dust, partly petrified!"—dictu mirum! in eam mutata; and he adds a catalogue of such as were afterwards rescued from destruction. Sketches from Venetian History.

BUONAPARTE'S MARRIAGE WITH MARIE LOUISE.

Napoleon had tried every means hitherto, except that of justice and forbearance, to attach to his alliance one of the great powers of Europe. Prussia, Austria, Russia, all had proved insincere, naturally enough, because ill-treated. But Buonaparte, with the self-partiality of his country, did not see the outrageousness and injustice of his own ambition: nevertheless, as this alliance was necessary, he resolved to recur to the old cement of European monarchies, viz. marriage. A wish to have heirs, perhaps the pride of allying with ancient royalty, gave additional strength to his purpose; and, for a long time, a divorce with Josephine had been meditated; she herself had foreseen it, and her voice had from the first dissuaded her husband from assuming the crown. He had sought to show to the French public the inconvenience of there being no heir to the empire. He had adopted prince Eugene as his successor in Italy, the son of Hortensie and Louis as his successor in France. The infant died. After this event, which took place in 1807, whispers of an imperial divorce were circulated at court. At Tilsit perhaps, certainly at Erfurt, there was question of a marriage between Napoleon and a Russian princess,—an alliance which perfectly suited his views at that time. The idea was not relished at St. Petersburg, where the voice of the court and queen-mother was against France. The coldness on this point was one proof of the insincerity of the Roman alliance. At Schoenbrunn, now, the same idea was suggested with respect to Austria; and the emperor Francis, despite his pride, appreciated all the advantage of the offer: it was accepted, and, to cover the agreement, peace was made, apparently severe, really moderate.

The difficulty, to a man of any feeling, was to break it to the unfortunate Josephine. She had been fond and faithful; dignified in her new rank, as amiable in her old. But she was to be divorced—sacrificed to his ambition; or, as he termed it, "to the welfare of France." She used all a woman's entreaties, endured the anguish of wounded love and mortified pride. He was inexorable, and she obeyed; professed her willingness, with tears indeed, to consent to a divorce, and took all the steps necessary to obtain it. Nay, even after her doom was sealed, she consented still to act the empress of the pageant. She attended a solemn ceremonial, the thanksgiving service for a peace, to which she alone was sacrificed; and at length retired to Malmaison, with the state and title of empress. This took place in the last days of 1809. Ambassadors were then despatched to Vienna, to demand, as had been agreed on, the hand of the archduchess Marie Louisa. The suit was granted; and the marriage, by proxy, was performed in 1810. Napoleon went to meet his new empress at Soissons. The ceremony of her reception and entry was modelled after those of her aunt, the unfortunate Marie Antoinette. What comparisons did not the relationship and similarity of each situation suggest! At a ball given by prince Schwartzberg, the Austrian ambassador, in honor of the imperial nuptials, a fire broke out, and many people perished; the prince's sister amongst the rest. In recounting this accident, the Parisians remembered that of the Place Louis Quinze, when, at the rejoicing for Marie Antoinette's marriage, so many hundreds had been crushed to death. Dr. Lardner.

HINTS FOR LOVERS.

If a youth is wooingly disposed towards any damsel, as he values his happiness, let him follow my advice: call on the lady when she least expects him, and take note of the appearance of all that is under her control. Observe if the shoe fits neatly, if the gloves are clean, and the hair well polished: and I would forgive a man for breaking off an engagement, if he discovered a greasy novel hid away under the cushion of a sofa, or a hole in the garniture of the prettiest foot in the world. Slovenliness will ever be avoided by a well-regulated mind, as if it were a pestilence. A woman cannot always be what is called dressed, particularly one in middling or humble life, where her duty, and it is consequently to be hoped, her pleasure lies, in superintending and assisting in all domestic matters; but she may be always neat—well appointed: and as certainly as a virtuous woman is a crown of glory to her husband, so surely is a slovenly one a crown of thorns. Mrs. C. Hall.

TURKISH MARRIAGE.

I cannot better describe a marriage feast, than in the words of a friend of mine, who was present at one of some consequence in Constantinople. "I was invited by the haratshee-bushee, or capitation tax-gatherer, to attend the nuptials of his daughter. The feastings and rejoicings were to be conducted on a scale of unusual splendor, and to be continued three successive days. I found the extensive court-yard, in front of the house, filled with a crowd of common people, in the midst of whom were squatted on the bare ground three Turkish musicians. One of them was exerting all the power of his lungs to force out of a squeaking hautboy certain goose-like notes, which were intended as a leading melody. His next neighbor was beating an accompaniment on an enormous drum, and the third had before him on the ground two very small kettle-drums, which he struck methodically with short sticks, as if to mark the time for the other two, and also serve as an accompaniment. Every part of the house was crowded with male visitors of all ranks, who made a very splendid display of rich clothes and costly ornaments. It was with the utmost difficulty that I succeeded in making my way to the upper end of the principal apartment, in one corner of which sat the bride on a velvet-covered sofa, nearly level with the floor. Her face, though without a veil, was completely concealed under a thick paste, the surface of which was painted in a variety of light colors. This kind of mask kept her eyes and mouth hermetically closed. As a friend of the house, I brought my present, consisting of a diamond ring, and a large gold coin called a mahmon-diary. The former I placed on the bride's little finger, and the latter I endeavored to fasten in front of her head-dress; but like many others which had preceded mine, it fell into her lap. The principal garment of the bride was an ample robe made of rich gold tissue. Her fingers were literally covered up to the nails with diamond rings. On her head-dress were heaps of diamond ornaments, some of which were her own, and others borrowed for the occasion. She wore round her neck some very rich pearl necklaces, joined with diamond clasps, and her long black hair hung in manifold tresses on her shoulders and back, intermingled with a profusion of gold tinsel. In this condition, exposed to the excessive heat of the weather, and of the crowded room, and having to endure all the torments of excessive thirst and hunger, was this poor creature to remain during two whole days, unattended by any one of her sex, excepting at night. At the close of the second day, the mask of paste was to be taken off; on the third she was to undergo the customary ceremonious purification at the vapor bath, and on the morning of the fourth, the bridegroom was left at liberty to enter into his connubial rights. These ceremonies are always observed in Turkey on the occasion of a marriage, and only differ in point of splendor according to the condition and wealth of the parties." Journal of a Nobleman.

FULTON AND THE FIRST STEAM-BOAT.

"When," said Mr. Fulton, "I was building my first steam-boat at New-York, the project was viewed by the public either with indifference or contempt, as a visionary scheme. My friends, indeed, were civil, but they were shy. They listened with patience to my explanations, but with a settled cast of incredulity on their countenances. I felt the full force of the lamentation of the poet,

"Truths would you teach, to save a sinking land,
All fear, none aid you, and few understand."

As I had occasion to pass daily to and from the building-yard, while my boat was in progress, I have often loitered unknown near the idle groups of strangers, gathering in little circles, and heard various inquiries as to the object of this new vehicle. The language was uniformly that of scorn, or sneer, or ridicule. The loud laugh often rose at my expense; the dry jest; the wise calculation of the Fulton folly. Never did a single encouraging remark, a bright hope, or a warm wish, cross my path. Silence itself was but politeness, veiling its doubts, or hiding its reproaches. At length the day arrived when the experiment was to be put into operation. To me it was a most trying and interesting occasion. I invited many friends to go on board, to witness the first successful trip. Many of them did me the favor to attend, as a matter of personal respect; but it was manifest, that they did it with reluctance, fearing to be the partners of my mortification, and not of my triumph. I was well aware, that in my case there were many reasons to doubt of my own success. The machinery was new and ill made; many parts of it were constructed by mechanics unaccustomed to such work; and unexpected difficulties might reasonably be presumed to present themselves from other causes. The moment arrived in which the word was to be given for the vessel to move. My friends were in groups on the deck. There was anxiety, mixed with fear, among them. They were silent, and sad, and weary. I read in their looks nothing but disaster, and almost repented of my efforts. The signal was given, the boat moved a small distance and stopped, and became immovable. To the silence of the preceding moment now succeeded murmurs of discontent, and agitations, and whispers, and shrugs. I could hear distinctly repeated, 'I told you it would be so—it is a foolish scheme—I wish we were well out of it.' I elevated myself upon a platform, and addressed the assembly. I stated that I knew not what was the matter; but if they would be quiet, and indulge me for half an hour, I would either go on, or abandon the voyage for that time. This short respite was conceded without objection. I went below, examined the machinery, and discovered that the cause was a slight misadjustment of some of the work. In a short period it was obviated. The boat was put again in motion. She continued to move on. All were still incredulous. None seemed willing to trust the evidence of their own senses. We left the fair city of New-York; we passed through the romantic and ever-varying scenery of the highlands; we descried the clustering houses of Albany; we reached its shores; and then, even then, when all seemed achieved, I was the victim of disappointment. Imagination superseded the influence of fact. It was then doubted, if it could be done again; or if done, it was doubted if it could be made of any great value."

Such was the history of the first experiment as it fell, not in the very language which I have used, but in its substance, from the lips of the inventor. He did not live indeed to enjoy the full glory of his invention. It is mournful to say, that attempts were made to rob him in the first place of the merits of his invention, and next of its fruits. He fell a victim to his efforts to sustain his title to both. When already his invention had covered the waters of the Hudson, he seemed little satisfied with the results, and looked forward to far more extensive operations. "My ultimate triumph, my ultimate triumph," he used to say, "will be on the Mississippi. I know, indeed, that even now it is deemed impossible by many that the difficulties of its navigation can be overcome. But I am confident of success. I may not live to see it; but the Mississippi will yet be covered by steam-boats; and thus an entire change be wrought in the course of the internal navigation and commerce of our country." THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

This is a sad season for the theatres. Parties, balls, soirees, and sleighing, usurp the attention of the fashionable. Good plays are well acted to select audiences; and the noble operas at the Park resemble those

"Gems of purest ray serene
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear."

The curiosity of amateurs, however, has been considerably excited to hear Mr. Jones sing the music of Masaniello. He executes it sweetly, and sometimes with surprising tenderness, taste, and effect. "I've sworn he shall not perish," and "Calm thee to rest," are given in that ample and rich voice, which is a treasure to a vocalist. On the second night, the barcarole, and the solo, "I've sworn," &c. were loudly encored by, considering the season, an excellent house. The chorusses were, as usual, exceedingly well done. Miss Clara Fisher has concluded her engagement. The lively evidences of gratification, always awarded to her performances, are the surest test of that taste and genius with which this young girl has been gifted by nature. She has departed for the south, where her deserved celebrity will render her a prominent attraction. Mr. Forest played the Gladiador one night, with his accustomed success. Miss Clifton and Mr. Hamblin have returned to the American theatre. Mrs. Duff is re-engaged at the Richmond-hill. As the weather has, in a great measure, prevented our attending the representations of either, we substitute, for further remarks, a letter from a friend.

CINDERELLA IN BALTIMORE.

Baltimore, December 29th, 1831.

GENTLEMEN—In compliance with your request, I follow the peregrinations of the "Fairy and the Little Glass Slipper," and find them installed here under the direction of Mr. Walton. Baltimore certainly can boast one of the prettiest little theatres in the Union, second only to the Park in point of internal construction; the house well warmed and lighted, and the stage remarkably spacious. Mr. Walton, it appears, is the first manager who has thought proper in this city to maintain such an operatic establishment as would enable that species of drama to have fair play, and up to the present moment his arrangements have given general satisfaction. In the arduous undertaking of preparing Cinderella for the public, (a part of which had, probably, witnessed the excellent management of the piece at New-York, where opera is an every day occurrence,) Mr. Walton had much to contend with; however he met the difficulty with considerable ability. His chorus was strengthened from New-York and Philadelphia, as well as his band. Mr. Fisher was specially engaged as the Baron, and Mr. Norton took his place in the orchestra. It may be as well to state that at Philadelphia the opera had in many points improved since our last communication: the Clorinda, the Thisbe, and the Baron (Mr. J. Fisher) had gained confidence, and the latter obtained, and with reason, much credit for his conception of the part. The Pedro, (Mr. Roberts) on the contrary, whose humor and acting we had at first cause to praise, thought proper, latterly, to make a dialogue of his own, with no respect or regard to that written by Mr. Rophino Lacy, and infinitely worse, being a tissue of witless unmeaning epithets, culled from the common transactions of the day, or advertisements in the papers. To give you a specimen of this gentleman's improvement on the author, we have only to mention such epithets as the following, used in addressing the Prince—"Your most anti-dyspeptic highness," "Your anti-bilious highness," "Your anti-masonic highness," and, we suppose, in reference to the price of fuel, "Your anti-ten-dollar a cord highness." This was duly appreciated by the colored gentlemen in the gallery, who roared with laughter until they nearly turned pale; and those gentlemen, who in the boxes and pit crack pea-nuts, and bury their heads in large apples, literally laughed until they turned black; such marks of encouragement were, however, in our poor thinking, severely counterbalanced by the looks of disgust evidently perceptible on the countenances of that class of the community which exclusively occupied the first circle of boxes during the performance of Cinderella in Philadelphia. To return to the town of terrapins and canvas-back ducks; all preparations being completed, Cinderella took the field. Mr. Jones had been countermanded to New-York, and the part of the prince fell on Mr. Walton's shoulders. We cannot fairly compare this gentleman, as a singer, with Mr. Jones; but with considerable tact and easiness on the stage, a competent knowledge of music, and with an imposing figure, set off to the best advantage by dress, he was no bad substitute. The Philadelphian Fairy Queen, Mrs. Smith, had originally been borrowed from Baltimore. Mr. Fisher, as the Baron, we have already spoken of. The Cinderella it would be waste of time to introduce to her patrons in New-York, but the two sisters, Clorinda and Thisbe, demand a word, as do Dandini, Pedro, and Alidoro. Meadames Willis and Chapman acted with spirit, and sang very correctly. If Mrs. Sharpe be the best singing Clorinda in America, and Mrs. Vernon the best acting Thisbe, we have no fault to find with the zeal and attention found in those characters here. Dandini was acted with decency, and some humor, by Mr. Garner: he was very perfect in the music, and correct in the dialogue. The part of Alidoro, by Mr. Chapman, was in safekeeping. Mr. Eberle, a decided favorite with the Baltimore audience, made Pedro a dry half-Dutch, half-Yankee character, but extremely amusing. The scenery was on the whole good; in several instances the machinery was better than either in Philadelphia or New-York. The kitchen scene and transformations were better; the rat and lizards disappeared through the kitchen dresser, and presto, coachmen and footmen appeared from the same place, and the car was drawn by four fat-looking animals, with splendid housings. The house the first night was literally crammed, and every thing succeeded admirably, until the ball-room scene, when the accident already mentioned in the papers took place. The piece went off with eclat. Since then it has appeared to fashionable and excellent houses; the manager has reformed his horses' tails, and the piece is played more perfectly, on every ensuing night, and will, doubtless, continue to be attractive. LETTERS FROM THE ABSENT EDITOR.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER ONE.

AT SEA.

GENTLEMEN—I have emerged from my berth this morning for the first time since we left the Capes. We have been running six or seven days before a strong north-west gale, which, by the scuds in the sky, is not yet blown out, and my head and hand, as you will see by my penmanship, are anything but at rights. If you have ever plunged about in a cold rain storm at sea for seven successive days, you can imagine how I have amused myself.

I wrote to you after my pilgrimage to the tomb of Washington. It was almost the only object of natural or historical interest in our own country that I had not visited, and that seen, I made all haste back to embark, in pursuance of my plans of travel, for Europe. At Philadelphia I found a first-rate merchant brig, the Pacific, on the eve of sailing for Havre. She was nearly new, and had a French captain and no passengers, three very essential circumstances to my taste, and I took a berth in her without hesitation. The next day she fell down the river, and on the succeeding morning I followed her with the captain in the steam-boat. On board the latter I found some ten or twelve acquaintances on their way to Baltimore, and among them Mr. Berrien, of the late cabinet, whom I mention for the sake of recording my last impression before departure. We had arrived at Delaware city, off which the brig lay at anchor, and having parted from my friends, I was stepping over the boat-side into the captain's gig, when Mr. Berrien recalled me. "One word," said he, in a very emphatic tone, as I turned round to the group, "come back American!" They were the last words addressed to me in my native land—"come back American!" I wish they could be said as impressively to every young man embarking from our country for foreign travel.

Some ten or fifteen vessels, bound on different voyages, lay in the roads waiting for the pilot boat, and as she came down the river, they all weighed anchor together and we got under way. It was a beautiful sight—so many sail in close company under a smart breeze, and I stood on the quarter-deck and watched them in a mood of mingled happiness and sadness till we reached the Capes. There was much to elevate and much to depress me. The dream of my life-time was about to be realized. I was bound to France, and those fair Italian cities, with their world of association and interest were within the limit of a voyage, and all that one looks to for happiness in change of scene, and all that I had been passionately wishing and imagining since I could dream a day-dream or read a book, was before me with a visible certainty; but my home was receding rapidly, perhaps for years, and the chances of death and adversity in my absence crowded upon my mind—and I had left friends, (many—many as dear to me, any of them, as the whole sum of my coming enjoyment) whom a thousand possible accidents might remove or estrange, and I scarce knew whether I was more happy or sad.

We made Cape Henlopen about sun-down, and all shortened sail and came to. The little boat passed from one to another, taking off the pilots, and in a few minutes every sail was spread again, and away they went with a dashing breeze, some on one course and some on another, leaving us, in less than an hour, apparently alone on the sea. By this time the clouds had grown black, the wind had strengthened into a gale, with fits of rain; and as the order was given to "close-reef the topsails," I took a last look at Cape Henlopen, just visible in the far edge of the horizon, and went below.

OCT. 18.—It is a day to make one in love with life. The remains of the long storm, before which we have been driven for a week, lie in white, turreted masses around the horizon, the sky overhead is spotlessly blue, the sun is warm, the wind steady and fresh, but soft as a child's breath, and the sea—I must sketch it to you more elaborately. We are in the Gulf Stream. The water here, as you know, even to the cold banks of Newfoundland, is always blood-warm, and the temperature of the air mild at all seasons, and just now, like a south wind on land in June. Hundreds of sea-birds are sailing round us—the spongy sea-weeds washed from the West Indian rocks, a thousand miles away in the southern latitudes, float by in large masses—the sailors, barefoot and bareheaded, are scattered over the rigging, doing "fair-weather work"—and just in the edge of the horizon, hidden by every swell, stand two vessels with all sail spread, making, with the first fair wind they have had in many days, for America.

This is the first day that I have been able to be long enough on deck to study the sea. Even were it not, however, there has been a constant and chilly rain which would have prevented me from enjoying its grandeur, so that I am reconciled to my unusually severe sickness. I came on deck this morning and looked around, and for an hour or two I could scarce realize that it was not a dream. Much as I had watched the sea from our bold promontory at Nahant, and well as I thought I knew its character in storms and calms, the scene which was before me, surprised and bewildered me utterly. At the first glance, we were just in the gorge of the sea, and looking over the leeward quarter, I saw, stretching up from the keel, what I can only describe as a hill of dazzling blue, thirty or forty feet in real altitude, but sloped so far away that the white crest seemed to me a cloud, and the space between a sky of the most wonderful beauty and brightness. A moment more, and the crest burst over with a splendid volume of foam; the sun struck through the thinner part of the swell in a line of vivid emerald, and the whole mass swept under us, the brig rising and riding on the summit with the buoyancy and grace of a bird.

The single view of the ocean which I got at that moment, will be impressed upon my mind forever. Nothing that I ever saw on land at all compares with it for splendor. No sunset, no lake scene of hill and water, no fall, not even Niagara, no glen or mountain gap ever approached it. The waves had had no time to "knock down," as the sailors phrase it, and it was a storm at sea without the hurricane and rain. I looked off to the horizon, and the long majestic swells were heaving into the sky upon its distant limit, and between it and my eye lay a radius of twelve miles, an immense plain flashing with green and blue and white, and changing place and color so rapidly as to be almost painful to the sight. I stood holding by the taffarel an hour, gazing on it with a childish delight and wonder. The spray had broken over me repeatedly, and as we shipped half a sea at the scuppers at every roll, I was standing half the time up to the knees in water; but the warm wind on my forehead, after a week's confinement to my berth, and the excessive beauty lavished upon my sight were so delicious, that I forgot all, and it was only in compliance with the captain's repeated suggestion that I changed my position.

I mounted the quarter-deck, and pulling off my shoes, like a school-boy, sat over the leeward rail, and with my feet dipping into the warm sea at every lurch, gazed at the glorious show for hours. I do not hesitate to say that the formation, progress, and final burst of a sea-wave, in a bright sun, are the most gorgeously beautiful sight under heaven. I must describe it like a jeweller to you, or I can never convey my impressions.

First of all, a quarter of a mile away to windward, your eye is caught by an uncommonly high wave, rushing right upon your track, and heaping up slowly and constantly as it comes, as if some huge animal were ploughing his path steadily and powerfully beneath the surface. Its "ground," as a painter would say, is of a deep indigo, clear and smooth as enamel, its front curved inward, like a shell, and turned over at the summit with a crest of foam, flashing and changing perpetually in the sunshine, like the sudden out-burst of a million of "unsunn'd diamonds," and right through its bosom, as the sea falls off, or the angle of refraction changes, there runs a shifting band of the most vivid green, that you would take to have been the cactus of Venus as she rose from the sea, it is so supernaturally translucent and beautiful. As it nears you, it looks in shape like the prow of Cleopatra's barge, as they paint it in the old pictures; but its colors, and the grace and majesty of its march, and its murmur, (like the low tones of an organ, deep and full, and, to my ear, ten times as articulate and solemn) almost startle you into the belief that it is a sentient being, risen glorious and breathing from the ocean. As it reaches the ship, she rises gradually, for there is apparently an under-wave driven before it, which prepares her for its power; and as it touches the quarter, the whole magnificent wall breaks down beneath you with a deafening surge, and a volume of foam issues from its bosom, green and blue and white, as if it had been a mighty casket in which the whole wealth of the sea, crysoprase, and emerald, and brilliant spars had been heaped and lavished at a throw. This is the "tenth wave," and for four or five minutes, the sea will be smooth about you, and the sparkling and dying foam falls into the wake, and may be seen like a white path, stretching away over the swells behind, till you are tired of gazing at it. Then comes another from the same direction, and with the same shape and motion, and so on till the sun sets, or your eyes are blinded and your brain giddy with splendor.

I am sure this language will seem exaggerated to you, but, upon the faith of a lonely man, (the captain has turned in, and it is near midnight and a dead calm) it is a mere skeleton, a goldsmith's inventory, of the reality. I long ago learned that first lesson of a man of the world, "to be astonished at nothing," but the sea has over-reached my philosophy—quite. I am changed to a mere child, in my wonder. Be assured no view of the ocean from land can give you a shadow of an idea of it. Within even the outermost Capes, the swell is broken, and the color of the water in soundings is essentially different—more dull and earthy. Go to the mineral cabinets of Cambridge or New-Haven, and look at the fluor spars, and the turquoises, and the clearer specimens of crysoprase and quartz and diamond, and imagine them all polished and clear, and flung at your feet by millions in a noon-day sun, and it may help your conceptions of the sea after a storm. You may "swim on bladders" at Nahant and Rockaway till you are gray, and be never the wiser.

The "middle watch" is called, and the second mate, a fine rough old sailor, promoted from "the mast," is walking the quarter-deck, stopping his whistle now and then with a gruff "how do you head?" or "keep her up, you lubber," to the man at the helm; the "silver shell" of a waning moon, is just visible through the dead-lights over my shoulder, (it has been up two hours, to me, and, by the difference of our present meridians, is just rising now over a certain hill, and peeping softly in at an eastern window that I have watched many a time when its pines have been silvered by the same chaste alchymy) and so, after a walk on the deck for an hour to look at the stars and watch the phosphorus in the wake, and think of —, I'll get to my own uneven pillow, and sleep too!

I judge much of men, and of women too, by their voices. The muscles of the face, by long practice, may be subdued to any habitual expression; physiognomy is fallacious; the organs of the head are easily concealed; but I am assured by all my experience, that the tone of the voice has a constant affinity with the tone of the mind.

Friendship, to be permanent, must be perfectly independent; for such is the pride of the human heart, that it cannot receive a favor without a feeling of humiliation, and it will almost unconsciously harbor a constant wish to lower the value of the gift by diminishing that of the donor. We esteem benefactors as we do tooth-drawers, who have cured us of one pain by inflicting another.

THE MUTATIONS OF LIFE.

A SKETCH.

How vain are the schemes and projections of man!
His enjoyments illusive and fleeting!
Since the changes arising through life's narrow span
Are all his fond wishes defeating.

The visions of pride, and those structures sublime,
For fame rear'd with pompous endeavor;
Shall be crush'd into nought by the finger of time,
Like the dreams of ambition—for ever!

Little thinks the vain beauty, so pleasingly gay,
Of speedy decay, age, and sorrow;
And the miser with toil hoards up treasures to-day,
Which a profligate squanders to-morrow.

For our children we image, through life's busy scenes,
Length of years, and the bliss of enjoying,
But, alas! the dark blight of fell death intervenes,
The flower in its blossom destroying.

O'er the mind from these truths sad feelings would steal,
All energy deeply depressing;
If a power Supreme had not deign'd to reveal
A charm, ev'ry evil redressing.

Our duties prescribed will dispel ev'ry gloom,
If to heaven and man purely cherish'd;
They'll hallow this life, and eternally bloom,
When all that is human hath perish'd!

GREAT COATS AND HATS.

There is much to be gathered from a great coat. I believe my subject, if translated into Greek or Latin, with a grave ology after it, would not be found unworthy the consideration of philosophers, especially as I do not remember that the critics have taken notice of it. Here! stand by the window, and look down into the street. See that elderly gentleman talking to his friend on the corner, with the snuff-colored surtout. Nothing could be more plain in its make; yet you may observe it is cut exactly to fit, and the cloth is of the finest. It is buttoned with three buttons around his body, that can scarcely yet be termed capacious. No show, but comfort. His hat is not new. I detest a staring new hat. It's so conceited! I always feel inclined to quarrel with a fellow who has a palpably new hat; but this one betrays neatness without ostentation, and care without pride. It has been brushed, but the servant did it. Then the nap is short. There is something so gentlemanly in a short-napped hat; and the rim has such a modest breadth. There's dignity in a wide rim. It's out of the fashion; but then it's above it. It's retiring and respectable, and casts a shadow over the eyes, as if the wearer were thinking. I have a contempt for a man whose hat has a narrow rim. It tells of flippancy and a whalebone cane? You may depend upon it the old gentleman is rich. You don't feel sure of it? It's clear as daylight. Look at those boots—they are mirrors—and the over-shoes as bright; the snowy-white cravat, without collar; the spotless gloves; the plain gold-headed cane. Take my word for it, that gentleman dines at four, and sips a wine after dinner that glides down the throat like oil.

Here comes a bird of a different feather. There's a cloak, now! with its ample drapery of superfine blue cloth, fitting over the shoulder, the broad collar and facing in front of black velvet; and the hat a little one side. That man likes Pelham better than Waverley. He's a fine fellow, with good blood in his veins. He does not take oysters often, but when he does it is at Windust's. Edgerton makes his clothes; and if you were to tell him of any other hatter than St. John he would stare, and say nothing. You see those cloaks in the box-doors of the theatres? I have heard voices coming out of them late at night, mixed with segar smoke, in catches of "Behold, how brightly breaks the morning," and "Your barcarole merrily singing." That's a buck.

After him comes a broad-shouldered man, with a shaggy double-breasted over-coat, buttoned across his chest, and close up to the chin. Rough, but comfortable! He has a pair of thick gloves, lined on the back with fur. He too is a blood, but in his own way. He scorns a fop, and seeks distinction only among his own set; drives fast horses, and is a leading man at a frolic. He is careless about his apparel. His hat is unbrushed, and boots unclean; but he swaggers with a sort of good-natured savage bravado. His gang now will call him, "prime bang-up." He himself is full of slang and devilry; knocks a man down, and says, "he has fixed his flint for him;" and after staring a modest girl out of countenance, laughs aloud, and tells Dick, she's "not so slow;" who answers, that she's "real bunkum."

There is a kind of surtout people call a "wrapper." It is a blending of the two orders of cloak and great-coat, stuffed with cotton, and lined inside with silk. It has a wide collar, generally of some kind of soft fur, which runs down far in the front, and the cuffs of the sleeves are also of fur. It is sometimes fastened tight around the body with a belt. I have never yet been mistaken in a wrapper; they belong to your true gentleman. None other dare wear it, for it is the most awkward-looking thing ever cut by shears, only for the associations connected with it. It leans towards literature, and has a pretty tinge of aristocracy. The wearer will swear "truth out of England" that he is not any one of consequence, but don't believe him. He thinks he is not, but he deceives himself. There is the true pride of a gentleman lurking in his veins, which bursts out thus in his wrapper. He feels he is not exactly as other men are, else he would never dream of mounting such a solecism in the science of personal economy. Of all the forms and qualities of "those troublesome disguises that we wear," as dear old John Milton says, a practical and meditative mind can gain most information from this. I have despised people for be-dizening and bedaubing their coats with lace, and afterwards found them fine fellows. I have felt a disposition to horsewhip a man for his mustachios; have detested a slender youth, in consequence of the exorbitant magnitude of his whiskers; and once conceived a rankling enmity against a stranger, for wearing an uncommonly low-crowned hat; and I have lived to respect and love each and all of these; but, in your genuine wrapper, there's "no mistake." I only know five, which really come under that class, (for they have been sometimes badly imitated by a few of "nature's ordinary sale work,") and I traced each of them to their source, which clearly confirmed my theory. The first two I was acquainted with; they were editors; one an old veteran, who had weathered more political and literary gales than he could count, and is now rather an oracle in his party—the other a young, ardent, and promising writer, who has advocated his claims to the wrapper by many elegant compositions. The third—you may see it to this day—the identical one, in his pictures, was an author of genius in the humorous, pathetic, and historical, sufficient for ever to consecrate that remarkable garment in my imagination. The fourth I had seen several times when a boy, and one day asked my father who he was?

"Why, is it possible," said my father, "that you do not know who that is? You will be delighted that you have seen him. That is *****"

The fifth and last resembles a comet which has but lately visited our sphere. It rose upon me one day in the street. I was afraid to betray my ignorance by asking who it was, and it passed away. I consoled myself by the hope of meeting it some other time. "Perchance 'twill walk again," thought I. I met it frequently afterwards. It gave me an immense deal of trouble. The conflict in my mind between the desire to know and the shame of betraying that I did not know, was awful. Hats went off to it in the street, pretty faces lighted up with smiles as they passed it; sometimes the great playactors uncovered themselves in its honor; the great publishers stopped it, and whispered in its ear sometimes. My curiosity at length grew too strong for restraint. It crossed my path one day, with one of the other wrappers by its side. There was no bearing that.

"For heaven's sake," exclaimed I, seizing hold of a passing friend, "who is that yonder?"

"What? that gentleman with a double-breasted great-coat?"

"Fire and fury! no! there—that one."

"What? that gentleman there, with the books under his arm, in a wrapper?"

"Yes, yes! If you love me, tell me—quick—who is it?"

"Why! Is it possible," said he, with an incredulous smile, "is it possible you don't know who that is? Why that's *****"

I slapped my hand down on my knee. I have lived many years. I knew it then—I know it now. I never can be mistaken in a wrapper.

SEDLEY.

TO MISS ELIZA SNOOKS.

Eliza Snooks, Eliza Snooks,
'Twas very wrong of you
To send me forth, last Thursday night,
With such a kind adieu.
Thy soften'd tones went to my heart,
And still they murmur there,
Inspiring dreams of bliss, alas!
I ne'er may hope to share.
Eliza Snooks, you kiss'd your hand
On that bright moon-lit eve,
And felt, or kindly feign'd, regret,
That I so soon should leave.
Ah, whether it was feign'd or felt,
Is more than I can tell—
But, that it "smash'd" a foolish heart,
Alas! I know too well.
But why should I confession make
To an indifferent ear?
Hearts only should to hearts confess,
And thine is gone, I fear.
Well, be it so—I shall not weep—
And sighing's all in vain—
I'll keep my heart for six long hours,
Till thine return again.

LOVE OF PRAISE.

"Oh, praise, how sweet thy sound to human ear,
We women love thee, and the men revere."—Anon.

A friend of mine wrote a book, which appeared anonymously. It excited general admiration and curiosity. One day, an acquaintance of his happening to be speaking with him upon the subject, inquired if he had any idea by whom it was written, and receiving a negative answer, placed his finger on his nose, and whispered confidentially, "I don't wish you to say anything about it, but—" concluding with a significant gesture, as much as to say, he was the author.

This natural thirst after praise is one among the clear evidences that we are created for social life. It shows itself in every human being, in various ways; some are, like the person above alluded to, contented to receive it, whether it has been justly earned or not, while others, with a more noble emulation, are satisfied to deserve it, although the world neglect to acknowledge the validity of their claims. Nothing is more characteristic of an elegant and lofty soul than an anxiety rather to act well, than to gain applause and a scorn to wear laurels not justly won. Indeed, they who reject unmerited praise are, for that generous frankness, entitled to more than they have cast off; while they who degrade themselves to paltry shifts to procure a reputation which their own virtues are not sufficient to obtain, betray their unworthiness for that which they desire. I know two characters, very opposite in this respect—the first is idle, dissolute, and of a mean disposition, and takes more trouble to seem what he is not, than would be necessary to make him what he would seem. He is a member of the medical profession, and boasts of an increasing practice, although I know his tailor pays him more visits than he bestows upon any patients, and although he is a regular frequenter of billiard-rooms, it is suspected for more purposes than that of amusement, he is careful to leave a learned technical book upon his table, spread open at an abstruse page, as if he had just left off reading. On entering his room the other day, I found him engaged in such a profound study of an encyclopedia, that he was for a moment unconscious of my approach. He acted the matter so speciously, that I was myself nearly deceived, till a glance over his shoulder informed me that the volume was upside down. I have known him fling half-a-dollar on the pavement to a beggar-boy, and the same day slyly cheat a confectioner out of sixpence. When he believes himself observed, he is the most generous and scrupulously honest creature in the universe, but at all other times, there is no deed too false and petty for him to descend to. How refreshing to turn from such a hypocrite to a different character, who does good for its own sake, from those pure and secret impulses which nature seems to have bestowed on some, and neglected in others. His soul is also cheered by the approbation of his fellow-creatures; any indiscriminate lavish of it pains him more than censure undeserved. Instead of making a parade of assumed virtues, he shrinks from the discovery of those he possesses. His kindness and affections display themselves in the thousand little circumstances of life, which can be rather felt by those around him, than enumerated; and his charity flows unseen, and reminds me of Pope's description of the stream:

"Not to the skies, in useless columns tost,
Nor in proud falls, magnificently lost,
But clear and artless, pouring through the plain
Health to the sick, and solace to the swain."

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE WEATHER.

FOR the following interesting article we are indebted to the American Almanac for 1832, published in Boston by Gray and Bowen.

"The question has been much discussed, whether the winters in the temperate latitudes have become milder or not. There is abundant evidence, it seems to us, in favor of the alleged change. Rivers which used to be frozen over so as to support armies, and which were expected to be covered in the winter season with a natural bridge of ice, as a common occurrence, now very rarely afford such facilities to travellers. The directions for making hay and stabling cattle, left us by the Roman writers on husbandry, are of little use in modern Italy, where, for the most part, there is no suspension of vegetation, and where the cattle graze in the fields all winter. The associations with the fireside annually referred to as familiar to every one, can be little understood now in a country where there is ordinarily no provision for warming the houses, and no occasion for artificial heat as a means of comfort. The ancient custom of suspending warlike operations during the season of winter, even in the more southern parts of Europe, has been little known in campaigns of recent date; not because the soldier of our times is inured to greater hardships, but because there is little or no suffering from this cause.

"In the northern parts of our own country also, the lapse of two centuries has produced a sensible melioration. When New-England was first settled the winter set in regularly at a particular time, continued about three months without interruption, and broke up regularly, in the manner it now does in some parts of Canada and Russia. The quantity of snow is evidently diminished, the cold season is more fluctuating, and the transition from autumn to winter, and from winter to spring, less sudden and complete. The period of sleighing is so much reduced and so precarious as to be of little importance compared with what it was. The Hudson is now open about a month later than it used to be. We are not, however, to conclude that so great a melioration has taken place as might at first be inferred from this fact. The change, whatever it be, seems to belong to the autumn and early part of winter. The spring, we are inclined to believe, is even more cold and backward than it used to be.

"The supposed mitigation of winter has usually been ascribed to the extirpation of forests and the consequent exposure of the ground to the more direct and full influence of the solar rays; and there can be little doubt that a country does actually become warmer by being cleared and cultivated. The favorable change experienced in the New-England and the middle states may, it is thought, be referred to this circumstance. But the very alteration that is observed in the similar latitudes of Europe can hardly be accounted for in this way. It is doubtful whether Italy is more clear of woods or better cultivated now than it was in the Augustan age. No part of the world, it is believed, has been cultivated longer or better than some parts of China, and yet that country is exposed to a degree of cold much greater than is experienced in the corresponding latitudes of Europe.

"The science of astronomy makes us acquainted with phenomena that have a bearing upon this subject. The figure of the earth's orbit round the sun is such that we are sometimes nearer to this great source of heat by three millions of miles, or one thirtieth of the whole distance, than at others. Now it so happens that we have been drawing nearer and nearer to the sun, every winter, for several thousand years. We now actually reach the point of nearest approach about the first of January, and depart farthest from the sun about the first of July. Whatever benefit, therefore, is derived from a diminution of the sun's distance, goes to diminish the severity of winter; and this cause has been operating for a long period, and with a power gradually but slowly increasing. It has at length arrived at its maximum, and is beginning to decline. In a little more than ten thousand years this state of things will be reversed, and the earth will be at the greatest distance from the sun in the middle of winter, and at the least distance in the middle of summer.

"We are speaking, it will be observed, with reference to the northern hemisphere of the earth. The condition alluded to, to take place after the lapse of ten thousand years, is already fulfilled with regard to the southern portions of our globe, since their winter happens at the time of our summer. How far the excessive cold which is known to prevail about Cape Horn, and other high southern latitudes, may be imputed to this, we are not able to say. There is no doubt that the ice has accumulated to a much greater degree and extended much farther about the south pole than about the north. Commodore Byron, who was on the coast of Patagonia on the fifteenth of December, answering to the middle of June with us, compares the climate to that of the middle of winter in England. Sir Joseph Banks landed at Terra del Fuego in the latitude of 50°, on the seventeenth of January, about the middle of summer in that hemisphere; and he relates that two of his attendants died in one night from the cold, and the whole party was in great danger of perishing. This was in a lower latitude by nearly two degrees than that of London. Captain Cook, in his voyage toward the south pole, expressed his surprise that an island of no greater extent than seventy leagues in circumference, between the latitudes of fifty-four and fifty-five degrees, and situated like the northern parts of Ireland, should, in the very height of summer, be covered many fathoms deep with frozen snow.

"The study of the stars has made us acquainted with another fact connected with the variable temperature of winter. The oblique position of the earth's axis with respect to the path round the sun, or what is technically called the obliquity of the ecliptic, is the well known cause of the seasons. Now this very obliquity, which makes the difference as to temperature between summer and winter, has been growing less and less for the last two thousand years, and has actually diminished about one eightieth part, and must have been attended with a corresponding reduction of the extremes of heat and cold.

"It still remains for us to inquire, how it happens that the extremes of heat and cold in the United States are so much more intense than they are in Europe under the same parallels. The thermometer with us in New-England falls to zero about as often as it falls to the freezing point in the same latitude on the other side of the Atlantic. The extreme heat of summer also is greater by eight or ten degrees. This remarkable difference in the two countries, as to climate, evidently arises from their being situated on different sides of the ocean, taken in connection with the prevalence of westerly winds. With us a west wind is a land wind, and consequently a cold wind in winter and a warm wind in summer. The reverse happens on the opposite shore of the Atlantic. There the same westerly current of air, coming from the water, is a mild wind in winter and a cool refreshing breeze in summer.

"The ocean is not subject to so great extremes of heat and cold as the same extent of continent. When the sun's rays fall upon the solid land, they penetrate to only a small depth, and the heat is much more accumulated at the surface. So also during our long cold nights this thin stratum of heated earth is more rapidly cooled down, than the immense mass of the ocean through which the heat is diffused to a far greater depth. At a sufficient distance from land the temperature of the sea, in the temperate latitudes, is seldom below forty-five or above seventy degrees; that is, the ocean is exposed to an annual change of only twenty-five or thirty-degrees; while the continent, in the same latitude, is subject to a variation of one hundred or more.

"We are confirmed in the cause here assigned for the excessive severity of our climate by finding that the parts of China, situated like the Atlantic states, have a similar climate; and that the western coast of this continent, without the benefit of much cultivation, enjoys the same mild temperature that belongs to places similarly situated in the western parts of Europe.

"The principal causes of the unfavorable character of our climate seem, therefore, to be of a permanent nature; and although it is somewhat meliorated, and may, in time to come, be rendered somewhat more tolerable, yet we are probably never destined to enjoy in New-England the fine seasons and delicious fruits of the corresponding latitudes of Europe."

INTELLIGENCE OF BIRDS.

BY MRS. HALL.

I had once a favorite black hen, "a great beauty," she was called by every one, and so I thought her; her feathers were so pretty, and her toppings so white and full! She knew my voice as well as any dog, and used to run cackling and hustling to my hand to receive the crumbs that I never failed to collect from the breakfast-table for "Yarico;" so she was called. Yarico, when about a year old, brought forth a respectable family of chickens; little, cowering, timid things at first, but, in due time, they became fine chubby ones; and old Norma, the hen-wife, said, "If I could only keep Yarico out of the copse it would do; but the copse is full of weazels, and, I am sure, of foxes also. I have driven her back twenty times, but she watches till some one goes out of the gate, and then she's off again; it's always the way with young hens, miss; they think they know better than their keepers, and nothing cures them but losing a brood or two of chickens." I have often thought since, that young people, as well as young hens, buy their experience equally dear. One morning I went with my crumbs to seek out my favorite in the poultry-yard; plenty of hens were there, but no Yarico! The gate was open, and, as I concluded she had sought the forbidden copse, I proceeded there, accompanied by the yard-mastiff, a noble fellow, steady and sagacious as a judge. At the end of a ragged lane, flanked on one side by a quick-set hedge, on the other by a wild common, what was called the copse commenced; but before I arrived near the spot, I heard a loud and tremendous cackling, and met two young long-legged pullets running with both wings and feet towards home. Jock pricked up his short ears, and would have set off at full gallop to the copse, but I restrained him, hastening on, however, at the top of my speed, thinking that I had as good a right to see what was the matter as Jock. Poor Yarico! An impudent fox-cub had attempted to carry off one of her children, but she had managed to get them behind her in the hedge, and venturing boldly forth, had placed herself in front, and positively kept the impudent animal at bay; his desire for plunder had prevented his noticing my approach, and Jock soon made him feel the superiority of an English mastiff over a cub-fox. The most interesting portion of my tale is yet to come. Yarico not only never afterwards ventured to the copse, but formed a strong friendship for the dog that preserved her family. Whenever he appeared in the yard, she would run to meet him, prating and clucking all the time, and impeding his progress by walking between his legs, to his no small annoyance. If any other dog entered the yard, she would fly at him most furiously, thinking, perhaps, that he would injure her chickens; but she evidently considered Jock her special protector, and treated him accordingly. It was very droll to see the peculiar look with which he regarded his feathered friend, not exactly knowing what to make of her civilities, and doubting how they should be received. When her family were educated and able to do without her care, she was a frequent visitor at Jock's kennel, and would, if permitted, roost there at night, instead of returning with the rest of the poultry to the hen-house. Yarico was most certainly a grateful and interesting bird.

One could almost believe the parrot had intellect, when he keeps up a conversation so spiritedly; and it certainly is singular to observe how accurately a well-trained bird will apply his knowledge. A friend of mine knew one which had been taught many sentences; thus, "Sally wants her breakfast!" "Sally wants her tea!" but she never mistook the one for the other; breakfast was invariably demanded in the morning and tea in the afternoon; and she always hailed her master, but no one else, by "How do you do, Mr. A.?" She was a most amusing bird, and could whistle dogs, which she had a great pleasure in doing. She would drop bread out of her cage, as she hung at the street-door, and whistle a number about her, and then, just as they were going to possess themselves of her bounty, utter a shrill scream of "Get out, dogs!" with such vehemence and authority as dispersed the assembled company without a morsel, to her infinite delight. I have heard of another parrot, too, that was caught up by an eagle. The parrot, in its ignorance, was quite amused at such a unique mode of conveyance, and seeing the old gardener, who had lost most of his hair, at work, exclaimed, "Baldpate, I ride, I ride!" "Yes," replied the old man, slowly raising himself, "yes, yes, and you'll pay for it." The story goes on farther to say, that the gardener, no way offended by the bird's unceremonious mode of address, followed the eagle to the next field, where he alighted with his prey, and there actually rescued the parrot, just as the eagle began to strip him of his feathers; by which time, we may presume, the saucy bird had learned, that it was not the pleasantest thing in the world to ride with an eagle. The raven, too, is a bird of humor and sagacity. There was one kept, a few years ago, at Newhaven, an inn on the road between Buxton and Ashburn. This bird had been taught to call the poultry when they were fed, and could do it very well too. One day the table was being set out for the coach passengers' dinner; the cloth was laid, with the knives and forks, spoons, mats, and bread, and in that state it was left for some time, the room door being shut, but the window open. The raven had watched the operation very quietly, and, we may suppose, felt a strong ambition to do the like. When the coach was about arriving, and dinner was carried in, behold, the whole paraphernalia of the dinner-table had vanished! It was a moment of consternation; silver spoons, knives, forks, all gone? But what was the surprise and amusement to see, through the open window, upon a heap of rubbish in the yard, the whole array very carefully set out, and the raven performing the honors of the table to a numerous company of poultry, which he had summoned about him, and was very consequentially regaling with bread.

LITERARY NOTICES.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.—"Feathers from my own wings." The author of this collection is Charles Edwards, formerly editor of the Crystal Hunter. It consists of essays, tales, and poems, most of which, we believe, have been already laid before the public in various journals. Notwithstanding an occasional eccentricity of style, many of these pieces indicate considerable talent. "Rose Raimond," and "The boy with the golden locks," are particularly popular, and have been copied extensively.

McElrath and Bangs have published a little volume, containing many juvenile tales, called "School Library of Useful and General Knowledge."

IN PRESS.—We have already announced that Willis G. Clarke, has put to press a volume of his metrical effusions; since which time the publisher has politely shown us a few of the printed sheets. The entire work, which, we perceive, is dedicated to Bulwer the novelist, will be issued in the course of the present winter. The portion before us contains the commencement of the principal poem, "Manoka," a fragment of an Indian tale. With this we have been so much pleased that we take the liberty of extracting a few passages. They have no relation, however, to the main plot.

Come, Memory, with thy power to paint and sing
The vanished glory of life's little spring!
Back o'er the soul the light of childhood pour,
And bring its blossoms, though they bloom no more;
To fancy's eye unfold each braided wreath,
Once twined on sunny brows, undimmed by death.

Bring back the tale and lay of yore, so dear,
Which fell in sweetness on the thirsty ear,
When hope was singing, like the lark at morn,
And all the flowers of youth were newly born.

Thanks for thy bidden aid—at thy command,
As by the magic of the enchanter's wand,
A thousand scenes returned to life, arise,
Softer than moon-beams in the evening skies:
Upspring a thousand roses, fresh with dew,
And round my path their radiant tints renew:
Their breath seems floating where the winds prevail,
And birds and brooks give music to the gale;
Mid skies where fancy moves her frolic wing,
Life's train of morning stars arise and sing.

Mr. Clarke is extensively and very advantageously known as a writer. The ability with which he conducts the Philadelphia Gazette, one of the oldest journals in our fair sister city, is universally acknowledged; and, in addition to his editorial talents and experience, he uniformly maintains towards his contemporaries a gentlemanly courtesy, that merits marked praise in these times of warm political discussion. As a poet, however, he is more familiar to the literary circles. His productions are numerous, and many of them beautiful. We would designate as among the best, his "Lines to Mary, Queen of Scots," which originally appeared in the Mirror, and have thence been transferred to various publications here and in Great Britain, and translated into several foreign languages. Notwithstanding the volumes of American poetry lately issued, and now in the press, this collection from the pen of Mr. Clarke will be an acceptable offering to the public, and shall receive at our hands an early notice.

We learn from the National Gazette, that Mrs. Haslam, a niece of the late Stephen Girard, is preparing a biography of her uncle, from the papers and continued diary which he kept. A likeness of Mr. Girard will accompany the work.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1832.

Editor's Study.—Being the other evening at the representation of an opera, the admirable skill of the improved orchestra, and the great number of singers assembled together, afforded such a pleasing entertainment that we were for a moment tempted to consider music as a divine art, till the thought struck us that this sound

"Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet,"

was the result of an infinite deal of trouble and labor. How the voice that flows with such a liquid sweetness and apparent ease has wearied itself with repeating those very notes which burst on the hearer's ear freshly and delightfully, like the unmeditated warble of a bird. Hear that low-toned flute, breathing, you would think, as naturally and with as little effort as the summer brook when it leaps bubbling and murmuring on its winding way; but of how many hours of intense application it must be the result. There is not a note in all that blended harmony but has cost toil and vexation. There was something jarring and discordant in this thought. It reminded us of earth, then of editors and authors. The public is a great, good-natured creature, who must be amused, no matter at what cost. He forgets that his luxuries are the fruit of a tree which has been watered with the sweat of other men's brows. Perchance the lashed slave wept as he dug from the Brazilian stream the diamond which flashes on his finger—and his wine came over a stormy ocean—and a kingdom of industrious bees perished to furnish his amber honey. Even the sheet which we present, with diffidence, for his entertainment, is not exempted from the universal decree; and we despair utterly of making him understand, in its full force, the difficulty of spreading weekly, for many successive years, a medley which can enliven without being trifling, or instruct without being dull, agreeable to the opposite tastes, feelings, and acquirements of both sexes, and containing matter which the old will peruse with interest, and the young with profit. Never was seen an animal more hungry than a weekly journal. Its appetite is insatiable. It no sooner swallows one supply, than its ever open throat is ravenous for another. Then it is dainty in its food. A daily is a widely different creature, and much more easily pacified. If the editor is busy, or indolent, or sick, he flings it a few columns of "news from Europe," or a message, or a speech, as one casts a bone to an importunate dog. It would be a curious metaphysical experiment for some new Locke to note the precise difference between an editor and a man. The former gets a mode of thinking exclusively his own. There is nothing else in nature like an editor's thoughts. As the constant dropping of water wears away the rock, so the perpetual necessity of supplying a stated quantity of literary matter by a certain time, gives the oddest character to the operations of his mind. His imagination is cut up and divided into columns. He thinks in paragraphs. The air and the earth are full of "articles." An earthquake or shipwreck are good luck to him, for they "fill so much." Then the shifts he is put to in "making up the form." The little unhappy vacancies at the foot of the columns must be "filled," or sometimes there is too much copy, and it must be cut. Like the victims on the bed of Procrustes, poem, essay, and all must be made to suit. This sometimes produces dire consequences. We have had to cut "six lines" out of a lover's soliloquy, and put "a stick" into the mouth of a dying man; and once, in noticing an American literary production, we were forced to omit the words "native genius," which we, in common with other editors, think should be always introduced on such occasions. Even the Spectator complained of the task of filling his paper, and very ingeniously wrote his complaint and remedy in the following manner. He received, or we rather suspect, pretended to receive, a note to this effect:

"Will's Coffee-house."

"MR. SPECTATOR—Pray sir, it will serve to fill up a paper if you put in this; which is only to ask whether that copy of verses which is a paraphrase of the Isaiah, in one of your speculations, is not written by Mr. Pope? Then you get on another line by putting in, with proper distances, at the end of a letter,

"I am, sir,

"Your humble servant,

"ABRAHAM DAPPERWIT."

To which the Spectator replied:

"MR. DAPPERWIT—I am glad to get another line forward, by saying that excellent piece is Mr. Pope's; and so, with proper distances,

"I am, sir,

"Your humble servant,

"THE SPECTATOR."

We intend these observations for the public in general, but for him in particular who sent the annexed letter. Our readers may conceive what must be the complicated texture of an editor's meditations when those of one of his correspondents are such a medley.

MESSRS. EDITORS—It was my wish to have furnished you with a communication for the present number, but my fatal habit of procrastination has prevailed. To show you, however, that I am becoming literary, I beg you to read the extract I shall give from a blank book in which I am accustomed to note down every subject which strikes me during my daily readings or peregrinations, as capable of being manufactured into an essay, tale, or true history. Many of them are, of course, never used, as I do not follow literature as a business. Besides, an object at one time rises in my mind a set of images which at another are totally forgotten; so that at the end of a week I often find my memoranda as dark as Egyptian hieroglyphics. To detain you no longer, here are my notes. They are so rough, and, in some cases, afford such faint and remote hints of what I was probably thinking of at the time I set them down, that I confess I am now and then at a loss to know my own meaning.

"Quotations from foreign languages—big wig—gratitude—ride 313—on a man's criticising his friend's book in a partial manner—Locke—Plutarch—pleasures of sickness—delights of poverty, tantum animis—reflections on the morality of Milton—ride paper in my drawer—pickles—love—letter from a susceptible young man, begging the editor to request a beautiful girl not to turn her eyes on him when they meet in the street, and petitioning the legislature to compel pretty women to wear veils and long frocks. The poet's reward—no wealth—no luxury—groupe listening to a handsome young girl reading aloud poet's last octavo—summer air stealing in the open window—poet peeps in—hears woman read his lines—woman cries—poet laughs—and acknowledges justice of fate, while the snow beats against him unregarded—(I had drawn my pen over the last line.) Writers of Elizabeth's age rascals for not finding out something about Shakespeare—fires—traveling—engravings on wood—dogs—cats—account of a meeting of the alphabet, and a debate on the subject of Webster's mode of spelling. Sir Francis Bacon—dirty streets—opera—hump—bump—house on fire—letter from my friend in the South Sea—v. 317—horse-shoe—pork—peep into the green-room after new tragedy—description of a girl so pretty that I love her, so satirical that I hate her. Mem. ask editors of the Mirror what I had better do about it. Plot for a story: stranger, Don Carlos de Montfredonia—big cloak—mustachios—old abbey by moonlight—silver edges—clinging ivy—murmuring streams—weeping clouds—stars—been there for ever, and will probably continue there till they pass away; but man must not judge of such things hastily. Don Carlos asleep on the edge of a precipice—moon walking the midnight sky. Donna Miranda comes out to enjoy the balmy zephyr with a book—purest of human beings—more white and innocent than the snow yet unformed in the azure expanse above our heads. Don Carlos wakes, and loves—agree to meet in the bower, when rosy morn scatters the plain with the brilliant, flashing, chaste, and new-wept dew. Donna Miranda fails to come—Don Montfredonia jumps off the precipice in despair—Donna Miranda comes and jumps after him—waves settle over their victims—birds sing as usual—broken-hearted parents fly to a foreign country to drown their sorrow, and plunge into the United States territory among the Rocky Mountains—there find Don Carlos and Donna Miranda turned Indians, and living in a wigwam—tears of gratitude—and wind up with the American eagle."

In looking over all these subjects, Messrs. Editors, and not finding any which I felt disposed to handle, I concluded to copy a couple of pages to show you what fine things you may expect from me soon. I can discern what they are all about. TOM SCRIBBLE.

Let us assure the reader that the next letter is genuine, and we think very sentimental.

GENTLEMEN—Spare me a line or two, and I will be brief. I find cloudy weather in several families where I thought I had sincere friends, because I did not visit them on new-year day. This is to certify that I was not very well on that day, and did not go out of my room, and that I intended disrespect to no family or individual hereby. Is it possible that such a trifle can chill any one's good feeling towards me, and that I am condemned without a hearing? Was that reproachful look of Miss Laura's yesterday in Broadway, intended to tell me our friendship is broken? and that distant civility with which the youthful and kind-hearted Mrs. Rose received my compliments in the afternoon, a sign that a day has destroyed the esteem which I have been years in raising up? Can it be that friendships hang by so slight a thread, that such amiable and valuable acquaintances are so ready to take offence where none was intended? How many wintry snows have wrapped the earth and dissolved away since I first met thee, lovely Julia, in the graceful dance; and never before had I beheld that head tossed with so earnest an appearance of displeasure? And thou too, good-humored Maria, I would go a pilgrimage for thee over a flinty desert, if thy interest required it, and yet that freezing "air"—I protest against it. I honor the venerable custom which we celebrate, and am glad to see you, gentlemen of the Mirror, taking up your pen in its favor. Mr. Paulding's admirable story is every where read with pleasure; and I am sure the influence of his humorous sketch was felt strongly from the North Battery to the Dry Dock, and from the Bowling-green to Stuyvesant's meadows. I would fight under his banner, could I wield a quill like him, and I hope this public acknowledgment will be received as a reparation for my apparent neglect, in not doing my duty as a friend and a native New-Yorker. Pray print this before it is too late. Yours, in great anxiety. AN UNHAPPY MAN.

P. S. If necessary, I can procure a certificate from a physician, or the affidavits of several neighbors to establish the fact that I had the influenza.

P. S. I shall shut myself up till your next paper comes out, and spend the interim in improving my mind.

GENTLEMEN—We all know that Brooklyn is a very pleasant place in spring and summer; parts of it may indeed be justly termed beautiful, especially the healthful heights, which embrace so wide a prospect of our splendid bay, and the surrounding soft and delightful scenery. It is not my present intention, however, to dilate on the perfections of nature, but to allude to an evil which I am persuaded might be remedied. In the course of every winter great interruptions occur at the ferries, in consequence of the ice, which are frequently productive of serious inconvenience and loss. Many times the boats cease running at the twilight, and thus twelve thousand citizens are placed under embargo, and cut off from the civilized world till the return of day. I have been greatly disappointed in being transported over early in the evening, to find myself prevented from returning, although there was no discoverable reason, except in the caprice or wisdom of the ferrymasters, which sometimes led them to stop the boats in anticipation of frightful quantities of ice expected on the morrow, or during the following week. Now if there be any practicable way to maintain the communication uninterrupted in winter, it should be done. It strikes me that there ought to be two sets of boats; one for the icy season, which should be built firmly, and of the strongest materials, and be furnished with powerful engines, of at least double the capacity of those used at present, to enable them to make headway through every description of ice except large sheets extending from shore to shore, but which are always carried away on the receding tide; at least the company ought to be compelled to keep one boat of such a construction that the intercourse could never be impeded, except in seasons of unusual severity and duration. The bows should be sharp, and sheathed with iron, and the rudders and wheel enclosed and protected. I would also suggest that this might be accomplished by means of iron bars passing below the wheel, and forming a sort of cage: the ice would then pass underneath, and the wheel could be kept in motion to force the boat through the opposing obstacles. At present, when ice is encountered, the steersman very sagaciously orders the engine to be checked, thereby decreasing the velocity, and reducing the boat to nearly a quiescent state, she is then permitted to creep through, and to drift on the tide, as if in expectation of a miracle. It would be useful to place a large light at the head of the boat, like the lantern to a carriage, that the steersman might see his way through the surrounding difficulties. As the ferries are under the bane of a monopoly, the public have no hopes but in the mercy of the stockholders, and the approaching expiration of their charter, which ought never to have been granted. If the shores had been open to enterprise and ingenuity, I cannot doubt that long ere this a regular and uninterrupted communication, night and day, would have been established, which would afford advantages and convenience to thousands, of which they have, unfortunately, been long deprived. Yours, respectfully, B. D.

GENTLEMEN—I stole the enclosed lines from a love-stricken friend, who will be so ashamed to see them in print, that I hope it will cure him of his troublesome disease. From the tenor of the poem, which appears to consist mostly of such fragments as have been floating through his mind, you will conclude that he is a pining and emaciated unfortunate, dying of grief. Nothing can be farther from the truth. He is a fat and saucy specimen of humanity, the merriest in a dance, the loudest voice in the glee; who enjoys life like the laughing philosopher. His mistress may answer him in the words of Rosalind to Orlando, in 'As you like it': "The poor world is almost six thousand years old, and in all this time there was not any man died in his own person, videlicet, in a love-cause. Men have died from time to time, and worms have eaten them, but not for love." Yours respectfully, EXPERIENTIA.

NIGHT REVERIES.

Dear soothing night! how many a swain
Hath loved thy cool and silent reign,
And knelt before thy jewell'd brow,
Haply in grief, like him who now
Confides to thy unlist'ning ear
His sad complaint. As some young deer,
Once swift and gay, but now oppress'd
With wounds, while from his snowy chest
Large oozing life-drops slowly pour,
And stain the grass with purple gore;
With fainting steps, and sorrowing eyes,
(While on, the herd, unpying, flies,)
Seeks shades concealed from every eye,
Poor, tender thing! unseen to die;
Or as a bird that lately flew
With his sweet cry the forest through;
Now the lake's surface touched, and now
His gold wings plumed on leafy bough,
Till, lo! the hunter in the shade—
Trembled the vast and echoing glade,
When swift the fatal lightning ran,
And sudden thunder hurled by man—
Dire engine for that little breast,
Made for soft breeze and downy nest.
Unfound the blasted victim there,
But torn and lingering in the air,
A snowy feather eddying round,
Floats light, and slowly sinking, seeks the ground.
While panting, dying, stolen away,
Sweet trembler! whither dost thou stray?
Blood mixed with dust thy bright eyes blind.
Thy slender leg, unused, behind
Hangs shattered; painful, dragged along,
Droops thy soiled, broken-wing—all hushed thy song.
So I, from crowds and pleasure roam,
My only friend, my only home,
This silvery-winged night, this lofty star-paved dome.

* * * * *
Language hath not power to tell
What beauty in the night doth dwell.
I hate the day—its woe, its wile,
For 'tis man's fate to thrive by guile,
And all his better feelings seem
Kept for the night like some pure dream.
When years of traffic o'er him roll
The dreary influence chills his soul.
As some meandering murmuring brook
By verdant banks its way that took,
On dashing in its gay career,
While summer charmed the rolling year;
Till winter meets its waters gushing,
Its rippling music sternly hushing,
Eager its glad course to arrest,
And turn to marble all its breast.
So cold to me are human eyes,
So frozen, in man's bosom, lies
The stream of nature's sympathies.
Behold him daring flood and flame,
For passing power and worthless fame,
As if a happiness were lent
To history or monument.
Let me these fruitless visions shun,
With lonely sadness struggling on;
Reckless! though false all hope hath spoken,
Earth's fairy spells trod down and broken,
Without a joy or friend to bless
My spirit's utter loneliness;
Content the meanest wretch to be
In the same world with Rosalie!

* * * * *
O'er woody vale and steeped town
The spotted moon looks palely down.
The earth, how exquisitely still,
Save softly from yon swelling hill
Sometimes mourns the whippoorwill,
And answers, from the distant tree,
The catydid's sad minstrelsy.
Clustering vines around are wreathing,
And now the balmy zephyr, breathing
On my aching forehead, moves me
As the hand of one who loves me.
Idle thoughts! for me no blessing
Of wife's familiar hand caressing,
But on some other brow shall press
Her hand, for whose dear happiness
How swift my own I would resign!
Though careless she of me and mine,
Above my reach and distant far,
And cold as yonder dazzling star,
Where Cynthia rolls her pearly car;
Both idle, radiant dreams to me,
Sweet star! oh sweeter Rosalie!
Soft-treading night! be thou my love.
To thee I sigh, with thee I rove,
Ever glad to greet thy coming,
When the bee hath ceased his humming,
And the idle bird his song,
And fall o'er fields the shadows long,
And clouds in blazing masses roll'd,
Lustrous with orange, red, and gold;

With farewell glory greet the even,
Bright as the fabled gates of heaven,
And large and red the dying sun,
And peep the stars out one by one;
And weary laborer homeward wends,
And slow the yellow moon ascends,
Winning with soft and holy light,
Thy sober face to smile, oh melancholy night!

Here are two other poems, kindly forwarded by a correspondent. Both are translations, by the late Dr. Samuel L. Mitchill. We believe the first has not before appeared in print.

THE FALL OF NIAGARA.

Written originally in Spanish in 1796, by Mr. Scandella, and translated by Dr. Mitchill.

Borne to the rocky bed's extremest brow,
The flood leaps headlong, nor a moment waits
To join the whirlpool, deep and vast below,
The saltless ocean hurries through the straits.
Hoarse roars the broken wave, and upward driven
Dashes in air; dissolving vapors press'd,
Confound the troubled elements with heaven,
Earth quakes beneath, heart trembles in the breast.
With steps uncertain to a jutting rock,
To gaze upon the immense abyss, I hie,
And all my senses feel a horrid shock,
As down the steep I turn my dizzy eye.
On cloudy steams I take a flight sublime,
Leaving the world and nature's works behind,
And, as the pure empyreal height I climb,
Reflect with rapture on the immortal mind.

THE CELEBRATED ATHENIAN SONG,

In praise of the patriots Harmodius and Aristogiton, who were killed in attempting to overthrow the tyranny of Hipparchus and Hippias, the sons of Pisistratus. From the Greek of Athenaeus, as printed in the Philadelphia Weekly Magazine for May, 1798, by Samuel L. Mitchill.

I'll walk prepared my sword to wield;
My sword by myrtle-leaves conceal'd;
As by Harmodius brave was done,
And fearless Aristogiton;
Who offering tyrant power its due,
The son of Pisistratus slew,
And gave to Athens freed, the reign
Of just and equal laws again.
Beloved Harmodius! though the force
Of murderous weapons gored thy corse,
Thou art not dead;—the fates deny
That friends to virtue e'er should die;—
Thou livest in happiness and rest,
Where, in the regions of the bless'd,
Achilles swift-of-foot abides,
And valiant Diomed resides.
I'll walk prepared my sword to wield;
My sword by myrtle-leaves conceal'd;
As by Harmodius brave was done,
And valiant Aristogiton;
Who offering tyrant power its due,
The lawless prince Hipparchus slew;
Where crowds were met with gazing eyes
Their public feast to solemnize.
Oh, patriot pair! with joy I view
Eternal glory wait on you,
Transcending all that went before,
Nor lost when time shall be no more;
Because resolved to act your part
Ye pierced the oppressor's cruel heart,
And gave to Athens freed, the reign
Of just and equal laws again.

MESSRS. EDITORS—As you have had several allusions lately to mothers, children, and other family relations in your "study," you would please me by adding to them the enclosed verses, by William Lisle Bowles, if only for the sake of the last line. It is descriptive of Saturday night in an English cottage.

Come, let us, e'er we go to bed,
O'er the decaying embers chat;
Though little Mary hangs her head,
And strokes no more the purring cat.

And let us tell how prisoners pine,
In silent dungeons dark and drear;
Whilst in our face the embers shine,
And all is calm and peaceful here.

The English cot is free from cares;
But see, the brand is wasted quite;
Come, little Mary, say your prayers,
Kiss, mother, kiss! good night, good night.

New-York Gazette.—Messrs. John and William Turner have disposed of their interest in this excellent mercantile journal to the senior proprietor, John Lang, Esq. In announcing the change the Messrs. Turner observe, that they wish every success to the remaining editor, and express a hope that "the Gazette may enjoy a continuance of the flattering patronage it has steadily received for a period of more than forty-six years." It would be superfluous to add any thing in favor of the Gazette, where its merits are so well known and highly appreciated.

The Craftsman.—The office of the Albany Craftsman has been lately entered by some malicious person, who destroyed the list of subscribers and account-books, so that the proprietor has been obliged to publish a card, informing his debtors and subscribers that he has no other means of ascertaining their names than a dependence upon their kindness in forwarding their address. This paper has been recently converted into a daily, under the able direction of E. J. Roberts, Esq. It is a neatly printed and valuable miscellany.

STREET VIEWS IN NEW-YORK.

WALL-STREET.

OUR readers will recollect that the twentieth number of the present volume was embellished with an engraving, representing the head of Wall-street, with the old city-hall, as it appeared forty years ago. In that view the spectator is supposed to be standing on the south-west side-walk, a little above the present Phoenix bank, looking towards Trinity-church, in Broadway: the old city hall on the right, occupying the site of the present custom-house.

In the engraving which embellishes the present number, they are presented with another part of the same street, the spectator still occupying his former station, but now looking in a contrary direction, towards the East river, with the Phoenix bank on his right. This is a view of Wall-street as it now is, in January, 1832, with its numerous banks, broker's offices, and insurance companies—in the midst of which rises a splendid edifice, called the Merchant's Exchange, a view and description of which may be found in our seventh volume, No. 12, page 89.

This is the street which contains most of the floating capital of the city; and, indeed, there is little specie to be found any where else. This is the far-famed mart for bankers, brokers, underwriters, and stock-jobbers. Here are planned and consummated speculations of every shape, character, color, and dimensions—from the sale of an orange, to the disposal of an East India cargo. In this focal point of commercial enterprise are converged the countless streams of trade which flow from every part of the city. Here, for five successive hours in each business-day, is exhibited a scene of anxiety, hurry, and bustle, that has no parallel in any other section of this great commercial emporium, commencing at ten o'clock in the morning, and terminating at three in the afternoon. At about half-past two, the excitement reaches its climax; when fortunate stock-jobbers are hastily clinching their bargains; "lame ducks" waddling to an omnibus, and bank notaries preparing their blank protests. At "ten minutes before three," (according to Mead's imitable drama of "Wall-street,") many anxious elongated visages appear in various directions, each afflicted with the same complaint. "A note to lift, and a little short." This must be good authority, for Halleck asks, in his celebrated poem of Fanny—

"And who would now the ancient dramas read,
When he can get 'Wall-street,' by Mr. Mead?"

Notary-fliers, alias ferrets, alias out-door clerks, are now in their respective banks, closely watching, like harpies, the lessening pile of notes that are payable to-day! Many must remain until the magical stroke of three, when the tardy drawer, who has at that moment, perhaps, made up the amount, must walk away with the cash in his pocket, and wait the notary's pleasure. How we pity them!—and how feelingly do we sympathize with those who are still "a little short." The ghosts of protests are flitting about their path, and rudely staring them in the face—shaking their inky locks in cruel derision. How they envy the happiness of that more fortunate tradesman, who appears in the picture, tripping across the street, light of heart, and perfectly happy, having torn his signature from an obligation which he has just discharged.

This is the street in which each pedestrian steps on classic ground; for every flag and paving-stone has been consecrated by the muse. Here it was that the father of "Fanny" was first smiled upon by the monied aristocracy of the city—

'For rumor—(she's a famous liar yet—
'Tis wonderful how easy we believe her!)
Had whispered he was rich—and all he met
In Wall-street, nodded, smiled, and tipped the beaver;
All, from Mr. Gelston the collector,
Down to the broker, and the bank-director.
A few brief years passed over, and his rank
Among the worthies of that street was fixed;
He had become director of a bank,
And six insurance offices—and mix'd
Familiarly, as one among his peers,
With grocers, dry-good merchants, auctioneers,
Brokers of all grades—stock and pawn—and Jews
Of all religions, who, at noon-day, form
On 'change, that brotherhood the moral muse
Delights in, where the heart is pure and warm,
And each exerts his intellectual force
To cheat his neighbor—honestly of course.

This is the street, before any other in the city, for speculations, not merely in commercial affairs, but on the characters, manners, and pursuits of those who are thus occupied. On every countenance can be traced the mark of care and calculation, for every man's mind seems intensely occupied. Very few listless or abstracted faces meet the eye; all are intent on the one purpose, gain. See how the crowds pass, in hasty succession, into and from the entrances of the principal monied establishments: a different aspect may be traced on all at yonder bank—it is discount day; by the elongated visages of several who are descending the steps, you may judge they have been unsuccessful in their applications. See that well-dressed young man, who is shutting his bank-book so hastily, and arranging the papers it contains with a jerk, expressive of irritation; we may infer that he has determined to close his account with the bank; they have hurt his dignity, perhaps, by refusing what he terms 'excellent paper.' Another is now descending; a smile of complacency is visible in every feature; all he required has been done to-day; his friend, the director, or the president, probably, has kept his word; and the bank, with the whole board of management, are all, in his estimation, a perfect concentration of excellence and liberality.

This is the street which Halleck has not only hallowed by his lyre, but also by his own commercial labors. For, however it may astonish the reader, poets are not always in the clouds. The plions of Pegasus require rest as often as those of the eagle; and the animal must have his provender too—real, true, genuine material, substantial victuals and drink. The day has gone by when genius banqueted on air. That we are correct, take his own words,

"No longer in love's myrtle shade
My thoughts recline—
I'm busy in the cotton trade,
And sugar line."

This is the street in which the poet himself has often dealt out bank notes, with as much grace, ease, and nonchalance, as he now pours out the notes of his bewitching lyre; and yet he has caused that very lyre (not fib-teller) to warble the following lines:

"Money is power, 'tis said—I never tried,
For I'm a poet, and bank-notes to me
Are curiosities, as closely eyed When'er I get them, as a stone would be Toss'd from the moon," &c.

A correct and particular history of Wall-street would, no doubt, be interesting to the reader; but who shall write it?—and from what sources are the requisite facts to be collected? As Knickerbocker says, "we have long beheld, with great solicitude, the early history of this venerable and ancient city, gradually slipping from our grasp, trembling on the lips of narrative old age; and day by day dropping piecemeal into the tomb." Wall-street traditions are fading with the rest, and we can only say, "peace to their manes." All that we know about it is, that the name was derived from a stone wall, or a line of fortifications which once extended from river to river, along the line of this very street. This wall which then marked the northern boundary of the city, and was intended for its defence against the Indians, was strengthened by bastions, and furnished with three gates of egress, one in the Broadway, and another at each river. In the year 1699, the corporation petitioned lieutenant-governor Hanfen, and his majesty's council "to intercede with the earl of Bellemont, the governor, then absent at Boston, for permission, as the fortifications were dilapidated, to make use of the stones for building a new city hall, fronting the Broad-street." This petition was granted; the wall was gradually removed, and much of it was worked up in the foundation and walls of the new edifice, which, it is scarcely necessary to add, was the one referred to in the commencement of this article.

Nassau-street, as all our readers are aware, commences in Wall-street, at this celebrated point, and extends to Chatham-street, into which it merges near Tammany-hall. One hundred and thirty-six years ago, (1696) there was no such street as Nassau, as appears from "the petition of Captain Teunis De Kay, that a carte-way be made, leading out of the Broad-street to the street that runs by the pye-woman's (then Shipp, now Nassau-street) leading to the commons of this city; and that he will undertake to doo the same, provided he may have the soyle." At this period the whole population of the city did not exceed six thousand souls, very few of whom reside outside of the wall. The records to which we have referred, notice great complaints on account of the scarcity of bread during the same year.

In describing the engraving which accompanies this number, little more can be said than merely naming some of its prominent features; and of these, the Merchants' Exchange in the distance, and the Phoenix bank in front, on the right, are the most conspicuous. The former has already been described in the twelfth number of the seventh volume, and the latter possesses no peculiar claims to an elaborate notice. It is merely a small neat building of white marble, with a portico and pediment supported by four solid fluted columns of the same material.

A small section of another building is seen on the extreme right of the picture, on which are two signs—part of the lettering of each being visible. On the highest appear the characters HA, the commencement of "Hawley's book-store;" and on the other PHI, part of "Philip Henry, draper and tailor."

Between the Phoenix bank and William-street, on the right, are three brick buildings, of three stories in height. The first is occupied by the Manhattan Fire Insurance Company; the second by Peter A. Mesier, bookseller; and the third, (which covers two lots)

by S. W. Benedict, watchmaker, and R. L. Nevins, who keeps an exchange office on the corner.

On the next corner below, in a three-story building, formerly occupied by Mapes and Waldron, merchant tailors, is the publication office of the "New-York American Advocate," next to which is the office of the Fulton Fire Insurance Company. In the adjoining building are the offices of the "Standard" and the "American," between which and the Exchange is a small confectionary shop. Below the Exchange, on the corner of Hanover-street, is the office of the Atlantic Insurance Company; next to which is that of the Jackson Marine; and, adjoining the latter, the National, American, &c. Fortunately for us, (and perhaps for the reader also) the artist has so judiciously placed one of the Greenwich stages, that a further detail of objects on the right side of the picture, is rendered unnecessary. The street extends to the East river; and were it not for the vehicle just mentioned, ships, brigs, and schooners, engaged in the "southern trade," might be seen lying at Coffee-house slip, discharging their cargoes of cotton, indigo, and tobacco; for it is necessary that the distant reader should know that this celebrated slip is at the foot of Wall-street, deriving its name from the Tontine Coffee-house, on the corner of water-street. This establishment was erected expressly for a mercantile exchange, and used as such until July 1827, when the present Merchant's Exchange was completed. In the language of a late writer, "eclipsed are thy ancient glories, venerable Tontine!"

On the left of the engraving we have a distinct view of only four buildings: two of which are above William-street, and two below it. Those above, are the Bank of America, and the office of the Morris Canal Company. The New-York Bank forms the other corner, adjoining which is a large brick edifice, occupied by the Farmer's Fire Insurance Company, and the New-York Insurance Company. Next to this, concealed by the trees, is the City Bank, of some unenviable notoriety, conferred by the adroit robbery which was committed on the contents of its vaults, on the twentieth of March last. This edifice is directly opposite the Merchant's Exchange.

Verily this goodly city of Gotham has undergone wonderful mutations and alterations within the course of a century! In 1732, there was only one vehicle in the city that bore any resemblance to a coach! Forty years afterwards, there were not more than four or five coaches at most. Men were then deemed rich who kept a chaise. The governor had one coach, and Mr. Walton had one. Lieutenant-governor Colden also had a coach. So had Mr. Murray, and a Mrs. Alexander. "Mr. Murray, being a quaker, called his a 'leather convenience,' to avoid scandal." What would our ancestors have said, had they seen one of our Wall-street conveniences, called an omnibus; carrying as many passengers as a small steam-boat, and furnished with almost as many means of comfort—dinner-table and bar only excepted? Hundreds of the first merchants, who reside two miles from Wall-street, though still surrounded by as dense a population, step from their marble stoops, after breakfast, into one of these flying palaces, and find themselves in Wall-street before they have finished picking their teeth! When business closes at three o'clock, they again find themselves with their families, before they have concluded a computation of the losses or gains of the morning! There awaits them the ready-furnished mahogany dinner-table, loaded with all the substantial luxuries of the season, garnished with dainties from every clime. Beneath their feet are spread the richest carpets of the east. Around them hang tapestry, drapery, and costly ornaments of every description. All the fruits of commercial speculation.

How was it in the year 1732, one hundred years ago, when the exchange, the place "where merchants most do congregate," was near White-hall? At the hour of twelve, precisely, our staid ancestors walked on foot to their place of residence, where their frugal dinners awaited them on plain oak or maple tables, (mahogany not being introduced until the year 1770, and then at most was only displayed in a desk, or small round tea-table.) No carpet prevented the welcome sound of their manly tread; for "all the houses were sanded with white or silver sand, in figures and devices." Their silver-buckled shoes—for boots were then confined to hostlers, seamen and watermen—carefully scraped at the door-step, added their own neat impress to the sandy devices beneath them. At one o'clock they again returned to their business.

"Bless me!" exclaims a modern belle. "No carpets! no mahogany! no coaches! What did they do?" They did very well, we can assure you, miss. They made honest fortunes, paid their honest debts, and never spent a thousand dollars at a gala or a route, while the poor were famishing with hunger, and freezing for the want of a little of that fuel which monopolizers hoard up to speculate on! They had every thing that was necessary and comfortable, and that was all they wanted. The luxury of a pair of gloves was not enjoyed in the colony, and umbrellas and parasols had not been heard of. They ate from pewter plates, drank from pewter goblets, for China-ware was unknown. They had no daily newspapers, no steam-boats, no anthracite coal, no wild beasts, no theatres, museums, or public, no Magdalen reports, no temperance societies, no public improvements, no philosophers, no gas-lights, no new lights, no street preachers; and yet they lived, and thrived, both in body and purse; and they acquired a reputation for as many virtues as any of their descendants, and died at a good old age.

LITERARY NOTICES.

POEMS BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

AN edition of Mr. Bryant's collected poems has been so generally called for, that the publication of the present volume may be considered rather a compliance with the universal wish, than an experiment attended with an author's usual hopes and fears. Many of the pieces of which it consists have, long since, passed the ordeal, and been circulated and treasured up till, we venture to say, there are but few readers of poetry unable to repeat from memory passages from "Thanatopsis," the "Waterfowl," the "Evening wind," or "Green river." These, and others from the same source, have been so long floating about the world, marred by typographical errors, some without a name, and some, after having sunned themselves in the light of British favor, ushered back to the notice of our countrymen, as the offsprings of the best among the foreign poets, that those who take pride in our own rapidly growing literature, might well inquire why these among its brightest ornaments should be left thus scattered. We have at length in our hand, the long desired collection, carefully revised by the author; and though we sat down to peruse it at a late hour of the evening, and when "The timely dew of sleep

Now falling with soft slumberous weight inclines
Our eye-lids,"

the clock has told twelve—one—two, and we have been led on, like Ferdinand, in Prospero's island, by strains not to be resisted.

The subjects which Mr. Bryant has chosen, and upon which he has written at long intervals, and his manner of viewing them, are, perhaps, although he himself may be unconscious of it, uniformly and strongly characteristic of one feeling—melancholy; deep, all-pervading, sensitive melancholy. It is, however, of the highest and noblest kind. Byron also wrote under the influence of melancholy, but of a most opposite nature—powerful, but not pleasant and touching to the reader. We admire and tremble, but cannot sympathize. It has neither hope, morality, reason, nor religion. We turn from his page excited, not instructed. He not only complains—he blasphemes. There is no gentle philosophy in his nature, by which he is enabled, when the tempest of grief is on him, to wait cheerfully till the thunder shall cease to bellow, and the clouds break away from the azure, and the golden sunlight stream down on plain and valley; but, with the spirit of Lucifer, he braces himself up against the elements, and fate itself; and he reminds us of that fallen spirit, "vaunting aloud, but racked with deep despair," on his entrance into the infernal regions:

"Hail, horrors! hail,
Infernal world! and thou, profoundest hell,
Receive thy new possessor, one who brings
A mind not to be changed by place or time:
The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven.
What matter where, if I be still the same,
And what I should be, all but less than he Whom thunder has made greater! Here at least
We shall be free," &c.

Neither is the turn of Mr. Bryant's poetry similar to that of poor Keats. The grief of that unfortunate young writer is touching, also, but unmanly; and while we pity him, we wonder at his too early and unnecessary self-abandonment. His sensitiveness is a disease. In his darkness there is no relief—it is not twilight, but night. "I can already," said he, "feel the flowers growing over me." This is poetry, but it is also despair. The melancholy of the poems which we are considering, is a different spirit. She hushes mirth, but not happiness. She is to be found, not in dark places brooding, but amid the loveliest and richest creations of nature. If she seek the storm, it is to behold it roll away. She flies from men, but does not hate them; and if tears are sometimes on her cheeks, they tremble there but a brief time, and smiles glitter through them as they pass away. She is dearer than merriment, and holier than triumph. She is the companion of a mind too finely organized to live contentedly amidst the jostling of crowds; but, at the same time, gifted with power to rise far above them. As an evidence of this feature in Mr. Bryant's compositions, take his verses on June. How many unbidden associations leap up at the word! What is sweeter than June's breath—brighter than her leaves—lovelier than her flowers and sky—merrier than the voice that rings through all her woods? We look for a carol now of living joy, of forest rambles, of daybreak upon the hills and river. But observe of how different a character are the poet's thoughts. We do not remember to have read a more artless, tender, and perfectly beautiful composition.

JUNE.

"I gazed upon the glorious sky
And the green mountains round;
And thought, that when I came to life
Within the silent ground,
'Twere pleasant, that, in flowery June,
When brooks sent up a cheerful tune,
And groves a joyous sound,
The sexton's hand, my grave to make,
The rich, green, mountain turf should break.
"A cell within the frozen mould,
A coffin borne through sleet,
And icy clouds above it rolled,
While fierce the tempests beat—

Away! I will not think of these—
Blue be the sky and soft the breeze,
Earth green beneath the feet,
And be the damp mould gently prest
Into my narrow place of rest.

"There, through the long, long summer hours,
The golden light should lie,
And thick young herbs and groups of flowers,
Stand in their beauty by.
The oriole should build and tell
His love tale, close beside my cell;
The idle butterfly
Should rest him there, and there be heard
The housewife bee and humming bird.

"And what, if cheerful shouts, at noon,
Come from the village sent,
Or songs of maids, beneath the moon,
With fairy laughter blent.
And what if, in the evening light,
Betrothed lovers walk in sight
Of my low monument.
I would the lovely scene around
Might know no sadder sight nor sound.

"I know, I know I should not see
The season's glorious show,
Nor would its brightness shine for me,
Nor its wild music flow;
But, if around my place of sleep,
The friends I love should come to weep,
They might not haste to go.
Soft airs, and song, and light, and bloom,
Should keep them lingering by my tomb.
"These to their softened hearts should bear
The thought of what has been,
And speak of one who cannot share,
The gladness of the scene;
Whose part in all the pomp that fills
The circuit of the summer hills,
Is—that his grave is green;
And deeply would their hearts rejoice
To hear, again, his living voice."

This same pensiveness, mingled with contentment, seems a luxury to him, and runs through nearly all his pieces. The "Evening wind" leads him to the shutting flowers—the faint old man leaning his silver head to feel it, and to the invalid's bed; but it comes to cool his brow, and passes away to its "birth-place of the deep once more," floating to the senses of the home-sick mariner, "sweet odors in the sea-air, sweet and strange." Always a light shines in to tinge his loneliest sadness: he discovers something to admire and be grateful for, in all events and objects; even death itself comes to him clothed with a thousand softening associations.

Another curious and beautiful example is to be found in the "Indian girl's lament." The mind is filled with delightful thoughts by the number of touching and delicate circumstances and sentiments expressed, and by the melody of the language. The reader will not overlook the exquisite image in the verse preceding the last.

THE INDIAN GIRL'S LAMENT.

"An Indian girl was sitting where
Her lover, slain in battle, slept;
Her maiden veil, her own black hair,
Came down o'er eyes that wept;
And wildly, in her woodland tongue,
This sad and simple lay she sung:

"I've pulled away the shrubs that grew
Too close above thy sleeping head,
And broke the forest boughs that threw
Their shadows o'er thy bed,
That shining from the sweet south-west
The sunbeams might rejoice thy rest.

"It was a weary, weary road
That led thee to the pleasant coast,
Where thou, in his serene abode,
Hast met thy father's ghost;
Where everlasting autumn lies
On yellow woods and sunny skies.

"'Twas I the broidered mocsen made;
That shod thee for that distant land;
'Twas I thy bow and arrows laid
Beside thy still, cold hand;
Thy bow in many a battle bent,
Thy arrows never vainly sent.

"With wampum belts I crossed thy breast,
And wrapped thee in the bison's hide,
And laid the food that pleased thee best,
In plenty by thy side,
And decked thee bravely, as became
A warrior of illustrious name.

"Thou'rt happy now, for thou hast past
The long dark journey of the grave,
And in the land of light, at last,
Hast joined the good and brave:
Amid the flushed and balmy air,
The bravest and the loveliest there,

"Yet, oft thine own dear Indian maid
Even there thy thoughts will earthward stray,
To her who sits where thou wert laid,
And weeps the hours away,
Yet almost can her grief forget,
To think that thou dost love her yet.

"And thou, by one of those still lakes
That in a shining cluster lie,
On which the south wind scarcely breaks
The image of the sky,
A bower for thee and me hast made
Beneath the many-colored shade.

"And thou dost wait and watch to meet
My spirit sent to join the blest,
And, wondering what detains my feet
From the bright land of rest,
Dost seem, in every sound, to hear
The rustling of my footsteps near.

The "Burial-place, a fragment," after having regretted the abandonment of the custom once so prevalent in England, of adorning grave-yards with shades and blossoms, and strewing the tombs with flowers, closes thus with, it is true, a mournful image, but how beautiful!

"Yet here
Nature, rebuking the neglect of man,
Plants often, by the ancient mossy stone,
The briar rose, and upon the broken turf
That clothes the fresher grave, the strawberry vine
Sprinkles its swell with blossoms, and lays forth
Her ruddy, pouting fruit."

There are several pieces of considerable length, which we have purposely hurried over, as familiar to our readers, many of them having already appeared in this journal. "Thanatopsis," the "Waterfowl," the "Forest hymn," the "Summer wind," the "Song of Marion's men," are among the number. It would be superfluous to speak of their uncommon merit. Another characteristic of our author's effusions is their pure, quiet simplicity and nature. They affect you, after a perusal of the productions of many others, as a ramble into the country from the glare, splendor, and artificial excitement of the town—when meadow, hill, and river spread away beautifully around, and the freshened air comes scented and cool from the fields. No effort is required to understand them. His ideas are expressed in few words, selected with taste, and a full knowledge of all their different shades, force, and meaning, and arranged with skill, but without ostentation. His thought is never encumbered, but his style is delightfully perspicuous and graceful. If occasionally a rough line ripples the perfect smoothness of the verse, or a word appears for which a better might have been substituted, we must either ascribe it to intention, or the error of the press. To the latter, we presume, are owing the obscurity in the opening of the seventh verse of the "Indian girl's lament," and the trifling tautology, in the last of the annexed otherwise perfect stanzas:

"I BROKE THE SPELL THAT HELD ME LONG."

"I broke the spell that held me long,
The dear, dear witchery of song.
I said, the poets' idle lore
Shall waste my prime of years no more;
For poetry, though heavenly born,
Consorts with poverty and scorn.

"I broke the spell—nor deemed its power
Could fester me another hour.
Ah, thoughtless! how could I forget
Its causes were around me yet?
For whoso'er I looked, the while,
Was nature's everlasting smile.

"Still came and lingered on my sight
Of flowers and stars the bloom and light,
And glory of the stars and sun;
And these and poetry are one.
They ere the world had held me long,
Recalled me to the love of song."

There is some fine poetry in the translations; but we infinitely prefer the pieces from our author's own pen. We had marked the following as the best, which we afterwards perceived by the notes, is acknowledged as rather an imitation than a translation.

LOVE AND FOLLY.—FROM LA FONTAINE.

"Love's worshippers alone can know
The thousand mysteries that are his;
His blazing torch, his twanging bow,
His blooming age are mysteries.
A charming science—but the day
Were all too short to con it o'er;
So take of me this little lay,
A sample of its boundless lore.

"As once, beneath the fragrant shade
Of myrtles breathing heaven's own air,
The children, Love and Folly, played—
A quarrel rose betwixt the pair,
Love said the gods should do him right—
But Folly vowed to do it then,
And struck him, o'er the orbs of sight,
So hard, he never saw again.

"His lovely mother's grief was deep,
She called for vengeance on the deed
A beauty does not vainly weep,
Nor coldly does a mother plead.
A shade came o'er the eternal bliss
That fills the dwellers of the skies:
Even stony-hearted Nemesis,
And Radamanthus, wiped their eyes.

"Behold," she said, "this lovely boy,
While steamed afresh her graceful tears,
'Immortal, yet shut out from joy
And sunshine, all his future years.
The child can never take, you see,
A single step without a staff—
The harshest punishment would be Too lenient for the crime by half."

"All said that Love had suffered wrong,
And well that wrong should be repaid;
Then weighed the public interest long,
And long the party's interest weighed.
And thus decreed the court above—
'Since Love is blind from Folly's blow,
Let folly be the guide of Love,
Where'er the boy may choose to go."

Three or four pieces are of a lighter character than those already quoted: "A meditation on Rhode Island coal," "To a mosquito," "Spring in town," &c. We copy a song, most gracefully written:

"Dost thou idly ask to hear
At what gentle seasons
Nymphs relent, when lovers near Press the tenderest reasons?
Ah, they give their faith too oft
To the careless wooer;
Maidens' hearts are always soft,
Would that men's were truer!
"Woo the fair one, when around
Early birds are singing;
When, o'er all the fragrant ground,
Early herbs are springing;
When the brookside, bank, and grove,
All with blossoms laden,
Shine with beauty, breathe of love,
Woo the timid maiden.
"Woo her, when, with rosy blush,
Summer eve is sinking;
When, on rills that softly gush,
Stars are softly winking;
When, through boughs that knit the bower,
Moonlight gleams are stealing;
Woo her, till the gentle hour
Wake a gentler feeling.
"Woo her, when autumnal dyes
Tinge the woody mountain;
When the dropping foliage lies,
In the choked-up fountain;
Let the scene, that tells how fast
Youth is passing over,
Warn her, ere her bloom is past,
To secure her lover."

We reluctantly refrain from further extracts, and lay aside the volume, with the conviction that its destiny will be a high one. It will be cherished at home, as a thing to be proud of, and will go abroad as an offering honorable to the country.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

LETTER FROM A REVIVED MUMMY.

"Me miserable! which way shall I fly?"

I WAS one of those unfortunate beings, who, dazzled with the military glory of the duke of Marlborough, followed him into the Low countries, where, as a reward, I received a blow on the head, which, till within a few years, has rendered me insensible. I have understood that I was preserved as a natural curiosity in the vaults of the museum at Brussels for one hundred years. At the expiration of that time another specimen of the same kind was obtained from the centre of an avalanche of the Alps, and I was consigned to New-York, with some other wonders of nature, on speculation. On my arrival, I fortunately fell into the hands of a gentleman renowned for the extensiveness and solidity of his scientific attainments. He entertained the idea that life was but dormant, not extinct in my frame, and that by a little coaxing and gentle measures, she might be wheedled forth from her hiding-place. At first (as he has since informed me) he allowed me to swelter before a hot fire of anthracite, (by the by, this word was new to me,) he then inclosed me in a hog-head of New-England spirits (another novelty) for a few days, leaving merely my head above the surface, and at the expiration of that period, applied the galvanic battery (as he called it) with so much success, that at the third exhibition I leaped on my feet, shouted hurrah for merry England! and darted forward, as in the act of charging. My next idea was, that this was the Bastille, and my venerable friend the jailer. But these fears or apprehensions were soon dispelled, and I have since lived with the sage, and under his tuition, for a year or so. At first I was continually talking of the events of Queen Anne or James the second's reign, as recent affairs, and was surprised that so little was known concerning these circumstances, which before my swoon were the subjects of tea-table and coffee-house chat. I have had no time to fill up the chasms in my knowledge, because I have heard so many strange rumors, and witnessed so many strange sights, and been so interested with your newspapers, which, I should suppose, were leaves bodily abstracted from the tree of knowledge, that I have had no time to dive into, or even to wet the wings of my mind in the calm pool of historical relation. Before my unfortunate swoon I had been a great traveller. I had visited most of the countries of Europe and Asia, and the northern part of Africa, and sojourned many a month among the venerable relics of antiquity. But now the whole world is metamorphosed; Troy, which I left peaceably mouldering on the shores of the Hellespont, is a flourishing place, of considerable magnitude; and your state, which appears from the accounts of its proceedings that I read, to be ruling the universe, proposes to lay out a road from Troy to Utica. This, in my days, would have been an extremely difficult task, something like Satan's constructing a road through chaos, as related in a book by one Mr. John Milton, who was much in vogue in my days, although not much heard of at present. I suppose it will entirely choke up the Bosphorus, and, after winding among the isles of the Archipelago, will take a straight cut to Algiers. But I fancy it will be a worse job to make a road on the dry sands of Africa than even in the Mediterranean. I understand that they are erecting a new capitol at Rome, and that Carthage and Rome are inhabited by the same nation. Is it possible, that the colony planted in Carthage should have existed to this day? And poor Belgium! she is metamorphosed from a poor amphibious state, between land and sea, into a fine healthy situation up in the mountains. The doctor has invited me to go and spend the summer in Paris, but I prefer a country residence during the dog-days, and shall therefore go to Boston, which I recollect is a fine little village near York, in England, but which, I understand, can be reached in two days' travelling from this city. I yesterday saw a person from the Highlands, but the only mark of his nation was what he called a plaid cloak. When I asked for news, he said there was none of consequence, but after a moment's reflection, he added that Edinburgh was burnt down, and that a nail factory had been erected in Birmingham! Both of these items were certainly new and surprising to me; and I believe my informer was an idiot, for when I asked him the amount of loss, he answered, "Oh, not much, only a tavern and a blacksmith's shop." Last week I saw some beautiful tobacco from Petersburg, which I suppose was raised in a hot-house, but Dr. — informs me that the climate is undergoing an amelioration. I did entertain an idea that the Neapolitans spoke Italian, but last evening I conversed with three natives of that place, who spoke English so fluently that I feel convinced of my error. They stated that they had travelled in a stage-coach as far as Hamburgh, and the remainder of the distance, which was through Athens and Corinth, in a sleigh! Even my kind friend appears to have linked himself to my enemies. I asked him yesterday, after a few hours' absence from the city, whither he had been? He answered, only as far as Bergen!!! I scorned to ask an explanation. To-morrow he says he has business at Jericho, I hope the Dead Sea may not swallow him, or the uncivilized inhabitants of those regions assassinate him. By this evening's newspaper I observe that a man has been taken up at Palmyra for passing a counterfeit note of the bank at Babylon; and by the next paragraph, that a burglary had been committed at Prague, for which the perpetrator was to be tried at Lisbon, and in the interim was to be committed to the jail at Leghorn. What an extensive empire is yours, and how speedy its communications! I have heard, much to my surprise, that Jerusalem is a famous place for oysters, and Moscow for peaches; that Attica was but four miles square and that it never had been any larger; that Rome was in Attica, and Athens within a stone's throw of Gibraltar; and that the Alexandrian library could never have been burned, for there never had been any there to burn. Thebes is celebrated for its shoes, and Troy for its candles. No such person as Shakspeare was born in Stratford-upon-Avon; and the inhabitants of London intend applying for a charter. All these things surprise and confound me. I begin to believe that I have never altogether recovered from my trance. I often wish myself again in the vaults of the museum at Brussels, and actually one time contracted for my conveyance there in three days, but was solemnly assured that there was no museum there, or even the thought of one. I have addressed one of my new acquaintance, who has gone to Pekin, requesting him to obtain some situation for me; and Dr. — assures me that I will receive an answer by Friday, although but Monday last I dropped my letter in the post-office. If it be in your power, dear sirs, give me some explanation of this subject, and help to enlighten one who at present, like Æneas, is under a cloud.

THE FIRST FEE.

After a long probationship of three years my time of examination approached. It had been for several weeks my constant practice on awaking in the morning, to calculate how many days yet remained before the second Thursday in October term. From thirty it ran down to twenty-nine, twenty-eight, twenty-seven, until at last it reached seven, six, five, and off I started, like a hound from the leash, for the ancient city of Albany. Suffice it to say, I did obtain my license, and in the first boat thereafter I was on my way to New-York. I was unaccustomed to sleep amid the noise and jarring of a steam-boat, and my nerves being in rather an excited state, my slumbers that night were none of the soundest. I fancied that I was surrounded by persons eager to engage my professional services, and every stroke of the piston-rod was to my fancy the closing of the door after a new client. At breakfast the next morning I was still dreaming, though wide awake. I came near troubling one gentleman for the retaining fee, instead of fish; and once actually sent my cup for a second dish of costs into the place of coffee. My eyes saw nothing but declarations, pleas, &c.; and I have a vague idea of carving up a bill of exceptions, and bolting it down my throat in the shape of a beef-steak, exclaiming to myself, after each mouthful, "over-ruled," or "disallowed." Well, my first business was to get a good situation for an office, and nothing less than two rooms in Pine-street would answer me. I could have obtained one large enough for all my business, heaven knows! in a neighboring street for one-tenth the money, but my genius could not be "cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd." The next thing was to prepare for my clients, so I ordered two dozen chairs, and had three large paper-cases made; but alack! no client's cheering rap was as yet heard at my door. The next week, all things being prepared, I sat down to wait for clients. I was in the midst of a flaming speech in a case of bigamy, when rap, rap, rap at the door. What a vision flitted before me! It was either some extensive shipping merchant from South-street, or a rich grocer from Front-street. What a train of business it would bring me! my heart rose in my throat, my pulse beat with the strength of a town-clock. I could scarcely bid my visiter walk in. He only pushed the door open, and asked, "Have ye anny ashes the day?" "Confound you and your ashes," roared I, and Coke upon Littleton discharged at his head, almost rendered necessary the coroner upon the intruder. I then sat down again to wait for clients. I nibbled one of my pens, still unconscious of the ink, scribbled my name on a sheet of paper, folded it up in legal style, and filed it away in paper-case number three. A week passed—I took down the paper on which I had written my name, endorsed, and returned it—nothing like regularity. One day, when I was waiting in an undefinable expectation of a client, I heard a terrible roaring in the chimney, which, in the bustle of my office, and the hurry of my business, having been neglected, had become foul and taken fire. I at first had an idea of instituting a suit against myself, in the name of the corporation; but having no opponent to contend with, I relinquished it, and sat down, with a desperate resignation, to wait for a client. At length one came, as welcome as the first rose of summer, or "as sky and stars to prisoned men." He held, it appeared, a promissory note, drawn by one wealthy merchant, and endorsed by another; it was about falling due, and he desired to know in case they did not pay, in what court he had a right to sue. This was a novel case. I hunted through several books, but could find nothing directly to the point; I, however, concluded, from general principles, that he could recover at least in one of the courts, and committed my opinion to writing, for which I received five dollars. I counted over the bills a dozen times. Five dollars! a three and a two. I opened them out on the table—I leaned my ear to hear their silky rustle—then I hastened to a broker, to ascertain if they were genuine, and thence to the bank, and got one in halves and the other in quarters. Franklin's whistle was nothing to them. In the midst of these reveries I was interrupted by a second call. Briefs and fees! how my business is increasing! I shall need a partner. My visiter entered, took a seat by the fire, cocked his legs on the mantel-piece, spit all over the carpet, and at last drawing a bundle of papers from his pocket, handed me one. "A statement of his case," thought I. I shall charge now twenty-five dollars. Interesting moment! I could scarcely unfold it for pleasure; when lo! it was a notification of a fine for not having my chimney swept according to law, amounting to exactly five dollars. There was no redemption. I had just five dollars by me; so I drew out half after half, and quarter after quarter. The scoundrel coolly deposited them in his pocket. I heard them jingle as he went out.

"Ah, ever thus, from childhood's hour,
I've seen my fondest hopes decay;
I never loved a tree or flower,
But 'twas the first to fade away!"

CHAPTER NOT TO BE FOUND IN COKE UPON LITTLETON, BUT SUPPOSED TO BELONG THERETO.

In the following trifle, it is not the intention of the writer to ridicule the learning or wisdom of my Lord Coke, which are so extensive and solid, but merely the quaintness of his style, and, to use a legal term, the hodge-podge mixture and disorder of his commentaries. Like the friend of the Frenchman's wife, in the Itinerant, he is "one very shenteel man, but his hair is von leetle bit out of his hat."

TEXT.

So if a man enfeoff another of certain lands, &c. and afterward the feoffee discover that the lands do not belong to the feoffor, clearly and manifestly, he shall take nothing by the grant, and the feoffee shall be holden to have no interest in the said lands.

Be it remembered, that the feoffee shall not be bound to pay the consideration of the purchase.

Item, si un homme enfeoffa, &c. un autre de certain terres, &c. et apres le feoffee, découvre que les terres non appartiennent a le feoffor, clairement et manifeste il tiendra soit nil par le grant, et le feoffee tiendra aver nul interet en les dites terres.

Memorandum: que le feoffee non soit tiendra payer le prix des terres.

COMMENTARY.

Item—so, or also. By this the diligent student shall observe that there hath been something precedent, for item is a species of corollary from some established proposition.

Un homme, &c. That is, bonus et legalis homo, not one who is ullagatus, outlawed, for since such a one cannot hold lands, it seemeth to follow that he cannot enfeoff another of lands. So, an alien cannot enfeoff, for he cannot hold lands, "Ubi nulla est destra ibi nullum est tempus." Where there is no right, there is no seisin. How clearly doth this set forth the beauty and consistency of the law! And by this, &c. four things are denoted—First, that by homme in this place is implied mankind, for the same law would be of the like feoffment of a woman. Secondly, That the feoffment must be regularly made, for to the plainest understanding it would appear manifest, that an invalid agreement would not be cogent. Thirdly—This must be a regular man; neither a ragamuffin, barney-lofer, dock-walloper, nor roarer; for albeit that these be of the human species, yet, as they never possess any lands, the law, alma mater rationis, decides that they shall not pass any land. This, &c. the reader shall observe is of great meaning, and albeit Littleton never annexed to it the significations which we have, yet he plainly intended something thereby. Then, Fourthly, if a man should disguise himself as a feme, and make a feoffment, it shall not alter the established law, for—

"Vestes non sexus mutant qui in shifts eunt."

Enfeoff. It is a maxim of the law, which maxims our student should treasure up as pure gold, that when a feoffment is made, it must be of something, as there is in this case, as clearly appeareth by the context.

Un autre. Here is understood homme, &c. and these words were more necessary, inasmuch that if there was no person to be enfeoffed, there could necessarily be no feoffment.

De certain terres. Here is explained of what such feoffment should be made, and if this example had been of certain lands indeed, the feoffee could have taken them. But here they were so extremely uncertain, that he could not even find them.

Et apres le feoffee découvre. If he had discovered it before deed made, it had been immaterial. But note, if a stranger discover that the feoffer had no land, is he compelled to inform the feoffee of the same? As by illustration, for there through doth light come. If A should give to B and his heirs, his certain lands, &c. in England, and C travelling in a foreign country should know that A had no lands to give, it is the better and more received opinion that C should not be bound to inform B of the same, or if of his uncompeled will he did, that he might do it with as little expense to himself as possible. And this case I myself heard argued for six days before the judges with great learning and wit.—Nota bene. That if the feoffee find instead of discover, the law shall not be altered.

Que les terres, &c. non a lui appartiennent. The discovery that any other substance did not belong to the grantor, would be immaterial, as per exemplum; it matters not whether A be possessed of a brass kettle, in order to alien his land; and even the discovery that the lands granted did not belong to a third person, shall not affect the grant.

Clairement et manifeste il tiendra, &c. Herein the perfection of reason, (which is but another name for law) is apparent, for albeit it could not well have happened in any other manner, yet much credit do our forefathers deserve for not choosing what had been the extreme of foolishness et sic de similibus.

Et le feoffer. And the feoffer shall be holden or considered to have no interest in the said lands. And this upon two good reasons. First—Because he hath none whatever; and, secondly, having no interest, by his conduct he forfeits whatever he had—as from him that had none, was taken even that which he had.—Memorandum. This being a special point of law, Littleton has placed it with a memorandum to fix attention. What followeth is so evident that it needeth not explication.

NEW MISERIES OF HUMAN LIFE.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER TWO.

AT SEA.

OCTOBER 20.—We have had fine weather for progress, so far, running with north and north-westerly winds from eight to ten knots an hour, and making, of course, over two hundred miles a day. The sea is still rough; and though the brig is light laden and rides very buoyantly, these mounting waves break over us now and then with a tremendous surge, keeping the decks constantly wet, and putting me to many an uncomfortable shiver. I have become reconciled, however, to much that I should have anticipated with no little horror. I can lie in my berth forty-eight hours, if the weather is chill or rainy, and amuse myself very well with talking bad French across the cabin to the captain, or laughing at the distresses of my friend and fellow-passenger, Turk, (a fine setter dog, on his first voyage) or inventing some disguise for the peculiar flavor which that dismal cook gives to all his abominations; or, at the worst, I can bury my head in my pillow, and brace from one side to the other against the swell, and enjoy my disturbed thoughts—all without losing my temper, or wishing that I had not undertaken the voyage.

Poor Turk! his philosophy is more severely tried. He has been bred a gentleman, and is amusingly exclusive. No assiduities can win him to take the least notice of the crew, and I soon discovered that when the captain and myself were below, he endured many a persecution. In an evil hour, a night or two since, I suffered his earnest appeals for freedom to work upon my feelings, and, releasing him from his chain under the windlass, I gave him the liberty of the cabin. He slept very quietly on the floor till about midnight, when the wind rose and the vessel began to roll very uncomfortably. With the first heavy lurch a couple of chairs went tumbling to leeward, and by the yelp of distress, Turk was somewhere in the way. He changed his position, and, with the next roll, the mate's trunk "brought away," and shooting across the cabin, jammed him with such violence against the captain's state-room door, that he sprang howling to the deck, where the first thing that met him was a washing sea, just taken in at mid-ships, that kept him swimming above the hatches for five minutes. Half drowned, and with a gallon of water in his long hair, he took again to the cabin, and making a desperate leap into the steward's berth, crouched down beside the sleeping creole with a long whine of satisfaction. The water soon penetrated however, and with a "sacré!" and a blow that he will remember the remainder of the voyage, the poor dog was again driven from the cabin, and I heard no more of him till morning. His decided preference for me has since touched my vanity, and I have taken him under my more special protection—a circumstance which costs me two quarrels a day at least, with the cook and steward.

The only thing which forced a smile upon me during the first week of the passage, was the achievement of dinner. In rough weather it is as much as one person can do to keep his place at the table at all; and to guard the dishes, bottles, and castors from a general slide in the direction of the lurch, requires a sleight and coolness reserved only for a sailor. "Prenez garde!" shouts the captain, as the sea strikes, and, in the twinkling of an eye, every thing is seized and held up to wait for the other lurch, in attitudes which it would puzzle the pencil of Johnson to exaggerate. With his plate of soup in one hand, and the larboard end of the tureen in the other, the claret bottle between his teeth, and the crook of his elbow caught around the mounting corner of the table, the captain maintains his seat upon the transom, and, with a look of the most grave concern, keeps a wary eye on the shifting level of his vermicelli; the old weather-beaten mate, with the alacrity of a juggler, makes a long leg back to the cabin pannels at the same moment, and with his breast against the table, takes his own plate and the castors and one or two of the smaller dishes under his charge; and the steward, if he can keep his legs, looks out for the vegetables, or if he falls, makes as wide a lap as possible to intercept the volant articles in their descent. "Gentlemen that live at home at ease" forget to thank Providence for the blessing of a water-level.

OCT. 24.—We are on the Grand Bank, and surrounded by hundreds of sea-birds. I have been watching them nearly all day. Their performances on the wing are certainly the perfection of grace and skill. With the steadiness of an eagle and the nice adroitness of a swallow, they wheel round in their constant circles with an arrowy swiftness, lifting their long tapering pinions scarce perceptibly, and mounting and falling as if by a mere act of volition, without the slightest apparent exertion of power. Their chief enjoyment seems to be to scoop through the deep hollows of the sea, and they do so quickly that your eye can scarce follow them, just disturbing the polish of the smooth crescent, and leaving a fine line of ripple from swell to swell, but never wetting a wing, or dipping their white breasts a feather too deep in the capricious and wind-driven surface. I feel a strange interest in these wild-hearted birds. There is something in this fearless instinct, leading them away from the protecting and pleasant land to make their home on this tossing and desolate element, that moves both my admiration and my pity. I cannot comprehend it. It is unlike the self-caring instincts of the other families of heaven's creatures. If I were half the Pythagorean that I used to be, I should believe they were souls in punishment—expiating some life-time sin in this restless metempsychosis.

Now and then a land-bird has flown on board, driven to sea probably by the gale, and so fatigued as hardly to be able to rise again upon the wing. Yesterday morning a large curlew came struggling down the wind, and seemed to have just sufficient strength to reach the vessel. He attempted to alight on the main yard, but failed, and dropped heavily into the long boat, where he suffered himself to be taken without an attempt to escape. He must have been on the wing two or three days without food, for we were at least two hundred miles from land. His heart was throbbing hard through his ruffled feathers, and he held his head up with difficulty. He was passed aft, but while I was deliberating on the best means for resuscitating and fitting him to get on the wing again, the captain had taken him from me and handed him over to the cook, who had his head off before I could remember French enough to arrest him. I dreamed all that night of the man "that shot the albatross." The captain relieved my mind, however, by telling me that he had tried repeatedly to preserve them, and that they died invariably in a few hours. The least food, in their exhausted state, swells in their throats and suffocates them. Poor curlew! there was a tenderness in one breast for him at least—a feeling, I have the melancholy satisfaction to know, fully reciprocated by the bird himself—that seat of his affections having been allotted to me for my breakfast the morning succeeding his demise.

OCT. 29.—We have a tandem of whales ahead. They have been playing about the ship an hour, and now are coursing away to the east, one after the other, in gallant style. If we could only get them into traces now, how beautiful it would be to stand in the fore-top and drive a degree or two on a summer sea! It would not be more wonderful, de novo, than the discovery of the lightning rod, or navigation by steam! And, by the way, the sight of these huge creatures has made me realize, for the first time, the extent to which the sea has grown upon my mind during the voyage. I have seen one or two whales, exhibited in the docks, and it seemed to me always that they were monsters—out of proportion, entirely, to the range of the ocean. I had been accustomed to look out to the horizon from land, (the radius, of course, as great as at sea) and, calculating the probable speed with which they would compass the diagonal, and the disturbance they would make in doing it, it appeared that, in any considerable numbers, they would occupy more than their share of notice and sea-room. Now—after sailing five days, at two hundred miles a day, and not meeting a single vessel—it seems to me that a troop of a thousand might swim the sea a century and chance to be never crossed, so endlessly does this eternal horizon open and stretch away!

OCT. 30.—The day has passed more pleasantly than usual. The man at the helm cried, "a sail," while we were at breakfast, and we gradually overtook a large ship, standing on the same course, with every sail set. We were passing half a mile to leeward, when she put up her helm and ran down to us, hoisting the English flag. We raised the "star-spangled banner" in answer, and "hoove too," and she came dashing along on our quarter, heaving most majestically to the sea, till she was near enough to speak us without a trumpet. Her fore-deck was covered with sailors dressed all alike and very neatly, and around the gang-way stood a large group of officers in uniform, the oldest of whom, a noble-looking man with gray hair, hailed and answered us. Several ladies stood back by the cabin door—passengers apparently. She was a man-of-war, sailing as a king's packet between Halifax and Falmouth, and had been out from the former port nineteen days. After the usual courtesies had passed, she bore away a little, and then kept on her course again, the two vessels in company at the distance of half a pistol shot. I rarely have seen a more beautiful sight. The fine effect of a ship under sail is entirely lost to one on board, and it is only at sea and under circumstances like these, that it can be observed. The power of the swell, lifting such a huge body as lightly as an egg-shell on its bosom, and tossing it sometimes half out of water without the slightest apparent effort, is astonishing. I sat on deck watching her with undiminished interest for hours. Apart from the spectacle, the feeling of companionship, meeting human beings in the middle of the ocean after so long a deprivation of society, (five days without seeing a sail, and nearly three weeks unspoken from land) was delightful. Our brig was the faster sailer of the two, but the captain took in some of his canvas for company's sake; and all the afternoon we heard her half-hour bells, and the boatswain's whistle, and the orders of the officer of the deck, and I could distinguish very well with a glass, the expression of the faces watching our own really beautiful vessel as she skimmed over the water like a bird. We parted at sunset, the man-of-war making northerly for her port, and we stretching south for the coast of France. I watched her till she went over the horizon, and felt as if I had lost friends when the night closed in and we were once more

"Alone on the wide, wide sea."

Nov. 3.—We have just made the port of Havre, and the pilot tells us that the packet has been delayed by contrary winds, and sails early to-morrow morning. The town bells are ringing "nine," (as delightful a sound as I ever heard, to my sea-weary ear) and I close in haste, for all is confusion on board.

LETTERS FROM WASHINGTON.

Intercepted for the New-York Mirror.

NUMBER ONE.

Washington, Friday, January 5th, 1832.

DEAR TOM—You probably expected (as little as I did myself) that I would ever fulfil the promise I made you, upon leaving town, to send you occasional sketches of men and things in this truly American metropolis. But the truth is, I have been so long in the habit of unbosoming myself to you, of prosing and of egotizing, of venting my spleen, and letting off my superfluous good humor, that I find I cannot now live without it.

You know me, Tom: expect no method. I must ramble, like an untrained pointer; digress without returning, commence without concluding; flush a bird here, and run over one there. This is my nature, my habit, or what you will. But a great craniologist once told me that I had a bump—a wonderful bump—not reducible within any of the ordinary classified bumps, which rendered it quite impossible that I should ever stick to one thing. I forget the name he gave it; but I recollect he turned six Greek words into one English one, which consisted of only twelve syllables, and expressed with surprising accuracy the precise nature of my necessary eccentricities.

I make one condition—show my letters to no one—this I insist upon. I don't care what I say to you, but I shall not waste paper for any body else.

On new-year's day the president receives visitors; a custom, I believe, introduced by General Washington. Averse to sights, I nevertheless went with the crowd. It was a motley scene. There were the Cherokees, over whom our northern philanthropists weep and whine; (I understand they are half Yankees;) and there were the diplomatists in costume, very fine; and our own people, from every state and of every class: the heavy Pennsylvania farmer, and the pert New-York dandy; the old Virginian, (I love him,) tall, ill-dressed, careless, but a thorough-bred gentleman. Here you encountered the restless, inquisitive eye that marks the descendant of the pilgrims; and there (I feel it yet) the independent tread of the unembarrassed Kentuckian; the courtly Carolinian, suspiciously polite; the red-hot Georgian; reformers from the far west, where people eat with two-pronged forks, and land sells for a sixpence an acre; travelled men, (to look at, they don't talk,) with beards and whiskers, dire and portentous; all these there were, and mingled with these, what will give interest to any crowd, Eve's frail daughters, (I beg pardon,) "the American fair." And here, too, was variety. What is your taste in beauty, Tom? But I suppose that of the many, you would admire now and rave about that brilliant complexion, bleached in Rhode-Island fogs. It is beautiful, I own; and the eyes are bright, and the lips red, and the teeth white; yet it touches me not. But look at, listen to for a moment, that little Georgian, hanging on the arm of the old gentleman; to the right, a bachelor uncle, I presume. What grace in every motion! Do you not love it? That childishness, that playful tenderness. How sweetly she "syllables" her words! How elastic the step of her delicate feet! If I dared, I should be in love already. But no,

"Suffolk's imperial tongue is stern and rough,
Used to command, untaught to plead for favor."

Isn't that a fine rant? But to return. What is there more to say? Rooms, and furniture, and "household stuff," have been before described. The celebrated east room, for furnishing which, with too little regard for republican simplicity, Mr. Adams was assailed, (though, in point of fact, he never furnished it at all,) is now, at length, actually furnished; well, I think, and with some taste, but not sumptuously. It is an oblong quadrangular room, with a straight ceiling, and, of course, (in my opinion,) without beauty. Only necessity or economy can excuse this style of building; the larger a room is, the more unpleasant is the effect.

The president appears in good health, but he looks very old. His manners are those of a kind man, with more of the farmer than the general. I expected a certain stateliness, and a more polished courtesy. It is very well, however, as it is. He shakes hands with every one. I am sorry for him. I believe if he consulted his own feelings only, he would return to the Hermitage to-morrow.

There has been, as yet, very little to interest in the proceedings of congress. In the senate some preliminary skirmishing on the tariff has excited attention, chiefly as indicating the probable course on that question of some of the leading members. I have not been so fortunate as to be present on any one of these occasions.

Yesterday there was a spirited little discussion in the house. The question was nothing; but I had an opportunity of forming some judgment of the manner, at least, of several distinguished men. Mr. Adams spoke, and exceeded expectation. McDuffie I knew instantly by his vehemence and perpendicular see-saw. Mr. Everett was fluent, and distinctly heard. His voice is musical, and his manner graceful, but not, I think parliamentary. He wants earnestness; his cadences are too measured; he seems to know too well when he commences a sentence what the end of it will be; so much so, that though his speech was very short, yet I could not help suspecting that he had not trusted to the moment even for his words; more especially as there was little or no reference, in the course of his remarks, to what had been said that day in the debate. You might perhaps guess that he had been a clergyman. When Mr. Burgess rose there was a general turning round of heads; it was evident that, for some reason or other, he was generally listened to. He uses much gesture, and his manner is very vehement; but vehemence of manner requires vehemence of matter to support it. There was little on that occasion in what he said.

You know, Tom, I have no taste for politics, therefore you may depend upon the impartiality of any sketches which I may hereafter find time to send you. I have no disposition to meddle with parties, but I shall not refrain from speaking of a man because he happens to be a politician.

In New-York you call the weather changeable. Changeable! Come here. It will shine, and rain, and snow, and thaw, and freeze all in the course of an hour.

I expected one thing here, a good table, in which I have been grievously disappointed. With the exception of canvass-backs, there is nothing to eat. Beef tough, butter bad, potatoes wretched. They say that the closing of the Potomac materially affects the market. If so, may it (the Potomac) speedily yield to southern breezes.

In haste for the mail, I remain your half-famished friend, V.

Acer et indomitus, quo spes, quoque ira vocasset,
 Ferre manum, et nunquam temerando parcere ferro;
 Successus urgere suos; instare favori
 Numinis; impellens quidquid sibi summa potenti

ALL who have risen to eminence by the force of intellect, may be divided into two great classes; those whose sphere of observation and experiment has been external nature alone, and those who have either studied or acted upon the equally extensive and diversified field of the human mind. In the first class are the geometrician and the naturalist—the minute experimentalist and the generalizing philosopher; in the other the artful demagogue, the successful political leader, the overwhelming orator. To the former of these we are accustomed to look up with the greater and more perfect admiration, and at first sight it would appear the more reasonable. The comprehensive mind of a Newton, grasping the links which bind together the various portions of this harmonious all, following up the minute ramifications of nature to the great fountains of light and life, may well be viewed with reverential awe; while the stupendous powers with which feeble mortals are clothed by the creative and beneficent genius of Archimedes, Galileo, Faustus, and Fulton, claim their warmest gratitude.

Yet, at the same time, it may be doubted whether they have a more imperious claim to our admiring notice than those who have dwelt more immediately among, and for their fellow-beings; whether the lessons they furnish be more vitally important than those we gather from the career of the men who have lived lives of active exertion instead of speculative retirement; who have not toiled to control the elements to man's uses, but whose equally daring purpose has been to subdue mankind themselves, to sway the passions and the vices, the powers and the weaknesses of humanity.

It is not, however, that their superiority is less felt, but that its foundations are less firm and steadfast: they are, like those they would rule, and the renown they seek, but the children of a moment. Yet the benefits they confer, if not eternal as the principles whence are deduced the axioms of geometry and the laws of physics, are yet deep and lasting. Society looks to them as her guardians, if not as her benefactors; as those who, if they do not invest her with the regal robes of wealth and knowledge, can alone preserve uninjured her dear-bought acquisitions. They lay the foundations of her happiness and dignity, they give order and stability to her magnificent but tottering masses. These are the men of practical wisdom and practical utility, who can seize the spirit of the moment when favorable, or subdue it when adverse, and whom their country rewards for promptness of thought and ability of action in her cause, by throwing her powers, her resources, her interests, and her hopes into their hands. They do not indeed make

"Fire, flood, and earth,
 The vassals of their will,"

but they hurl the thunder of a nation's collected energies; brutum fulmen, indeed, but more terrible to mankind in its destroying fury than all the rage of angry nature. These are the men to whose supremacy we bow, as to the visible image of the Deity; and not without reason, for it is at least the reflection of god-like intellect. Common minds feel their inferiority, and with selfish prudence follow blindly those whose wisdom they know can alone guide and protect their ignorance.

A man of this stamp has a far harder game to play than the philosopher, who theorizes in the ease and security of his solitude. He does not, like him, tread on firm and secure ground, nor can he assure himself that every advance he makes is in the right and safe path; he stands on a precipice, giddy from its elevation, tottering from its unstable foundation, where one false step may precipitate him to infamy, and where even the clearest judgment, the firmest course, the most bounteous fortune cannot ensure his triumph. He cannot anticipate that secure enjoyment of the fruits of his labors, which animates the philosopher in his painful progress; a word, a breath—the caprice of a fickle and ignorant multitude—may baffle his utmost prudence and disappoint his fairest hopes. Trusting to superior skill, he stands alone against a thousand adversaries, and a thousand hostile chances, and stakes life, fame, and fortune on the "hazard of the die." Yet, at the same time, his career is as brilliant as hazardous. To control a thousand different opinions, and passions, and prejudices; to curb the natural instinct of self-love, and to direct all its acquiring energy to building up a name for himself; to rule men as men rule timid sheep and stupid cattle, by the supremacy of intellect, and to rise among them in the majesty of mind; this is their noble prerogative. Such was Pericles, the earthly representative to his countrymen of the might and majesty of Jove the Thunderer: such was Cæsar, who, while he immolated the liberty, fame, and power of his nation to private interest, could win over the sufferers to assist with smiles at the sacrifice: such was Cromwell, whose iron grasp could tear down throne and altar, and erect the idol of his own authority on their fragments: such was Napoleon, the gigantic march of whose mind trampled down a kingdom at every step: and such too was Mirabeau, who plunged boldly into the torrent where so many "strong swimmers" perished; and, amid all its vicissitudes, rode the red billow of the revolution in triumphant security. His career was short, and more than half of it was wasted in infancy, in exile, and in prison; but he was only strengthened to endurance and action by the very contests and reverses by which his enemies hoped to break his spirit. He was preceded, at his entrance into the world, by strong prejudices, the result as much of other's calumnies as of his own faults; but his restless ascendancy triumphed over every obstacle, and he died at last, when he was about to give the noblest proof, at the same time of his influence, his wisdom, and his generosity, by upholding with his atlas strength the falling monarchy, in the full splendor of the greatest glory he could have obtained or desired.

Honoré Joseph Gabriel Riquetti de Mirabeau was of an old and illustrious family of Provence. His father was a noble of the old school; one of those who, as Ségur tells us, while firm in their devotion to the crown, and bigotedly attached to aristocratic institutions, amused themselves by indulging in liberal speculations on paper, which they would have shuddered at seeing carried into practice. He was severe, prejudiced, and narrow-minded, dead even to that family pride and nice sense of honor, which, in the absence of better feelings, preserved most of his class from the disgrace of meanness. As if to show how little connexion there may be between theory and practice, how little profession may have to do with principle, though the most enthusiastic disciple of the would-be science of the economists, he dissipated his immense patrimony; a pretended philanthropist, he defrauded his children of their inheritance; an eloquent apostle of liberty, he silenced the complaints of his injured family by the discipline of a prison of state. At the age of eighteen, Mirabeau's persecutions commenced. He was imprisoned by virtue of a lettre de cachet, for the accumulation of a few debts; an indiscretion which a rigid moralist might censure, but which the parent whose churlishness compelled him to expenses, of which his prodigality set him the example, should not have visited with this full measure of vengeance. We can hardly conceive the wide and deadly influence which this tremendous engine of arbitrary power then exercised. These mandates allowed not their victims to speak in their own defence, or even to know "what ignorant sin they had committed." They seized them in the dark, and transported them, as it were, out of the world; for dead to the world, to comfort, to consolation, and to hope they indeed were; their fate and their very existence being kept profoundly secret. To such a refinement of oppression had this abuse arrived, that these missives were openly sold to heads of families, as an easy method of getting rid of obnoxious relatives, without openly outraging public opinion.

After his first arrest, Mirabeau lived for nine years in captivity, varied only as it became more strict and comfortless, until banished to Pontarlier, a fortress in the most inclement region of the Alpine frontier. Here he met with Madame de Monnier, whom, under the name of Sophia, he loved, and celebrated, and ruined; but for whose sake he endured disgrace, poverty, toil, exile, ruin; every thing, in short, that armed and ruthless malice could inflict on its helpless victim. He loved her with all the energy and warmth of his glowing soul; it might not have been a pure and hallowed flame, but it was intense and lasting. No time could diminish his ardor, no sufferings exhaust his patience, no temptation shake his constancy. He forgot his own sorrow in anxiety for her welfare; he roused himself from sickness, he shook off despair, to cheer and console the partner of his fate; and refused to desert her, though wealth, fame, and tranquillity were to be the rewards of the sacrifice, and lingering death the consequence of refusal.

Irritated beyond endurance by the unrelenting hostility of his father, who refused him relief in his necessities, spurned his complaints, defied his feeble attempts to obtain redress, blasted his prospects and blackened his character, Mirabeau resolved on a desperate measure, but the only one which offered a chance of safety or happiness—flight into a foreign land with Sophia.

He lived for a time in Holland in contented obscurity, supporting himself by his pen. He led a life, as he describes it himself, of unwearied application, with penury staring him in the face, and the evils from which he had escaped, and all that irritated, because eluded vengeance could add to the black catalogue, lowering in the horizon. But, on the other hand, he had the solace of her presence for whom he had sacrificed every thing, and whose strong confiding love had left all to follow him; her bright smile to lighten up his hours of gloomy despondency; her warm heart to share and soothe his griefs. And it surely is no slight proof of the natural purity of his feelings, that he was capable of this generous self-devotion, this tried and constant love; and that even on the giddy height of his after glory, he could remember and regret this humble valley of his happiness.

This interval of repose did not last long. The bloodhounds of relentless malice tracked him to his peaceful retreat; and, as a punishment for having obeyed the voice of nature and duty in struggling against oppression, for seeking to exchange misery for happiness, the groans and tears of his dungeon for the free air of heaven, he was condemned to have those insupportable cruelties repeated and redoubled, which alone had driven him to error or crime. He was carried a prisoner into France, cast into solitary confinement in the castle of Versailles, and taught to consider his prison as his dwelling and his grave.

Of all the torments which ingenious cruelty has invented to test man's powers of endurance, the horrors of solitary confinement are the most appalling. Every other variety of suffering has at least something to relieve its monotonous intensity. The laborer, exhausted by his daily toil, eats bread sweetened by the pride of honest poverty; the anxious interest and fond attentions of friends are a healing balm to the throbbing brain and sinking heart of the invalid; even the criminal on the rack is cheered by the rapid approach of death, come to rescue him from his tormentors. But there is no relief for him whom powerful cruelty condemns to solitary desolation. He hears no affectionate voices, the echo of whose music may linger around his prison walls; he sees no beloved faces, whose image may people his dreary solitude; he is cheered by no friendly visits, to be waited for and hailed with tearful joy, and counted and dwelt upon. There is no oasis in the desert where he may gain strength for fresh endurance, no rallying point where reason may concentrate her energies to combat the thousand foes that threaten her empire. The wretch who is to quit at once "this pleasing, anxious being," finds his enemies more merciful in their cruelty; for the captive is, like him, cut off from the world, from pleasure, and from hope; but not, like him, from torment and despair. His relations with his fellow-men are severed, his very heart-strings torn asunder, and thus abandoned, dismembered, and isolated, he is bid to live on a life, which, however the acuteness of his anguish may shorten it, is to him an eternity of misery unutterable. The heart is oppressed, the brain is crushed, by the leaden weight of unbroken, hopeless suffering, by the dreadful certainty that to-morrow will be as dark and comfortless as to-day. The void which the loss of natural affection has left in the heart, is soon filled by a fearful company; the fair temple of the mind becomes a cavern for all foul and unholy ideas to "knot and gender in," until madness mercifully interposes to snatch the sufferer from the overwhelming consciousness of his misery.

No wonder that ordinary resolution should sink under such trials, and ordinary minds yield to such foul and fearful enemies. But Mirabeau's were of no ordinary stamp: the iron, indeed, entered his soul also, but it was of the temper of adamant, and only struck fire from the collision. He was determined that though his pursuers had "taken the strong man captive," to make sport for them, they should not feast their eyes on the spectacle of his despairing weakness. He was determined to struggle even against that torrent, which had swept away his hopes and his happiness, and lived on in the vague but exciting thought, that he might one day repay the long account of injuries and sorrows, and trample under foot the unholy altar at which he had been sacrificed. Love of liberty at length bent even his stubborn pride; he sued for mercy humbly, fruitlessly, perseveringly, and was finally released, on conditions as severe as could be extorted from his utter helplessness. He emerged from confinement at the age of thirty-one; desolation surrounded him, and clouds and darkness covered the picture. Life was to him a desert, but in that desert he reared the everlasting temple of his fame.

Mirabeau passed his time in endeavoring to retrieve his ruined fortunes, until summoned to play a part in the busy scenes of public life. The fame of his talents and sufferings had preceded him, and he was greeted with applause that soon increased to rapturous enthusiasm. He reappeared at the most propitious moment. It is not necessary here to trace the chain of events that ushered in the French revolution, or repeat for the thousandth time how the unjust privileges and arrogant usurpation of the higher classes gradually became too oppressive for endurance; nor how, afterwards, those who had been irritated by servitude and excited by combat, were intoxicated with success; nor need we retrace the splendid but bloody pageant of revolutionized France through its alternate scenes of despotism and anarchy. Suffice it to say, that soon after Mirabeau was restored to liberty and the world, the struggle commenced.

Though a noble by birth, and proud of his family connexions, Mirabeau had little cause to love his equals. He came forth from the ordeal of persecution with hopes and fortunes blighted, heart seared, and manhood wasted. He had been ignominiously driven from the career that opened brilliantly before him, his affections had been outraged, the sanctity of his domestic life violated, his bright day-dreams darkened by the clouds of premature suffering; and he had grown old in sorrow and in care. His bosom swelling with its load of maddening recollections and implacable revenge, he was well fitted to lead the ranks of turbulence, to scatter the firebrands of discord, and to call up around him the storm that raged in his own breast. He joined the party of the people; he was their leader and their friend, the tower of their defence, the idol of their affections. The thunder of his indignant eloquence swelled the feeble cries extorted from them by suffering, into the stern tones of determined remonstrance, the menaces of fierce resentment; his voice shattered the walls which had swallowed up the pride of his youth and the promise of his life; his vehement spirit encouraged the assembly to resist arbitrary orders, though enforced at the point of the bayonet. His first public effort was an attempt in the states of Provence to recover for the lower classes their natural right of representation. For daring thus to oppose the arguments of reason to the dogmas of divine right, he was banished from among the nobility as a traitor. This injury only increased and confirmed his influence with the people. He was a martyr in their cause; he had been the first and ablest to preach liberty, and it was but right that her most zealous apostle should lead the crusade proclaimed in her name. The torrent rolled on in resistless strength, and Mirabeau rose to supremacy on the swell of the billow.

His career, however it may have been attacked by interested calumniators, was fearless, and generally just and consistent. He was far, indeed, from being a statesman of sterling, unwavering integrity and patriotism; but neither was he the mere factious leader his enemies would make him—the base pander to the people's fantasies, the sordid slave of avarice, the mad votary of ambition. His first great triumph was the establishment of those two pillars of civil liberty, the freedom of the press and the inviolability of representatives. The most splendid efforts of his oratory were made in his country's cause, and his noblest monument is the privileges his exertions obtained for her. He was from the first the advocate of a constitutional monarchy, on the model of that of England. He indeed struck the first blow at the royal power, but his aim was only to lop off the rotten limbs and unsightly excrescences, not to lay the axe to the root of the stately tree, nurtured by the cares of so many statesmen, and the blood of so many patriots. It is a mistake that does cruel injustice to his memory to suppose, that because his eloquence and his ascendancy were popular, he was on that account only the agent of sedition; he was a liberal and enlightened statesman as well as a bold demagogue, and labored as often to still the waves of popular commotion, as to rouse the angry surges from their repose.

His influence was overwhelming; his popularity amounted almost to frantic enthusiasm. He was not the leader of any faction; he united, he managed, he subdued them all. He was the defender of the people, and the terror of the royal party, until the pride of the one was sufficiently humbled, the rights of the other amply secured, when he threw all the weight of his supremacy on the side of the latter. This was the moment of his greatest triumph, when the nobles, who had stigmatized the "plebeian count" as an outcast, supplicated his protection; when his queen entreated him to become her champion, and the throne trembled before him—it was the exiled Coriolanus receiving the ambassadors of humbled Rome.

His career was brief as it was brilliant: his excesses shortened his life, though they never clouded his talents or relaxed his diligence. In one respect he was as fortunate in his death as he had ever been in his life—he died in the full vigor of his intellect, in the meridian glow of his prosperity. It was not like the sun, gradually sinking to repose, it was the same luminary suddenly veiled from sight by an eclipse; and his death, too, "disastrous twilight shed o'er half the nations." His loss was bewailed as a national bereavement, and not without reason, for France lost in him the presiding genius of her revolution. Others may have had purer and clearer views, but he alone had the requisite controlling energy. His magic influence alone could have made order arise out of chaos, and caused the discordant elements of the mighty system to move regularly and harmoniously. He died, too, at the very moment when his exertions were most imperiously necessary, when a chance yet remained to save the drowning state, and when he had pledged himself to a task every way worthy of him. How far his fair promises might have been performed, into what further error his wayward passions would have hurried him, we cannot judge; but almost his last words were a regret that he had lived only to desolate, and that he must die without repairing the ruin he had caused.

Mirabeau undoubtedly surpassed all his contemporaries in strength of intellect. His memory was prodigious, his application incessant; he felt intensely and spoke with energy. Leaving his eloquence out of the question, he holds a high rank among his country's authors. His essays on "Despotism," and on "Prisons of State," are filled with profound research, close reasoning, bitter irony, and touching yet lofty lamentations. Both were written in confinement, as his biographer expresses it, "under the inspiration of the dungeon," and the descriptions flow from his pen as they were impressed upon his breast, in characters of fire. His famous "Lettres à Sophie," are, on many accounts, a literary curiosity. Here is no thrilling excitement, no artful train of incidents, no highly-wrought descriptions; they are full of incoherent passion, of insignificant details; they are merely a strong and powerfully excited mind pouring forth its feelings into a sympathizing breast; yet the book is one of the most intense interest that a reader can peruse. It is the breathings of tender, devoted love; the voice of nature speaking from and to the heart. They have none of the artificial character of French literature, none of that sickly sentiment which even Rousseau's burning eloquence cannot always embellish; at the same time they are full of those dangerous sophisms which, disguised by all the richness of his glowing fancy, first disturbed his victim's peace, and conquered her virtue.

Mirabeau's style is never pure or polished; he breaks up his language to make it follow the turns and changes of his mind; it is rude and harsh, often wanting in precision and almost always in elegance; abounding with strong but incorrect expressions, and phrases tortured into new and improper constructions.

But all these defects are forgotten, or rather vanish, when we come to his oratory. Here he stands without a rival in modern times. No public speaker, whether in the British parliament or French assembly, understood his art so well; no political combatant wielded his weapons with such skill, facility, and success. He could vary the mode of his attack, the very character of his mind, at pleasure. Bold, yet calm in danger, impetuous in attack, persevering in exertion, master of himself even when he seemed most abandoned to his intense emotion, he united the most opposite qualities, and all that could ensure success. The style of his eloquence is strong and copious, full of lofty language, bold figures, and abrupt transitions. He seldom argued coolly with his auditors: he did not pause in his impetuous career to gain over their dispassionate reason; he carried them along with him in triumph; and those whom he could not convince he silenced, he astonished, he disturbed, he subjugated. He made even the iron and lead of common minds sparkle and glow with his own ardor; he communicated, as it were, an electric influence, which all must involuntarily obey. "His eloquence attacked at once and resistlessly; there were no cold intervals of calculation or deduction; every thing was amalgamated and beaten into one mighty thunderbolt of reason and passion, ridicule and invective—"

"Tres imbrī tortos radios, tres nubis aquosae
Fulgores nunc terrificos, sonitumque metumque
Miscuit—flammisque sequacibus iras."—Virg.

He has often been compared to Demosthenes; and the mere ability to support the comparison is a sufficient eulogy on his genius. Both possessed clear perceptions and great powers of argument; both were formidable in accusation and invective; both fearlessly supported their country's interests and denounced her enemies; and both, to the disgrace of humanity, stained their reputation by degrading vice and pitiable weakness. The character of their oratory differs like that of their auditory. The ancient spoke to an assembly who prided themselves on their refinement, and the fastidious nicety of their taste; hence his discourses are marked by severe simplicity and studied neatness; his words, like his thoughts, flow on in a strong and rapid, but pure and sparkling stream. Mirabeau, called to address the "moving theatre" of a popular assembly, far less refined and more impassioned, could not regulate in the leisure of his study the imposing array of his arguments, the stately march of his periods. Demosthenes was indebted to study and careful preparation for that very dehors, that earnest energy, that overpowering logical strength, which is his chief merit: Mirabeau came forward unprepared, but ready to meet whatever combat the accident of the moment might call him to. Then it was, while all around were troubled, and anxious, and hesitating, that he put forth his strength, and

"Collecting all his might, dilated stood."—Milt.

He was named by his countrymen "the thunderbolt of war;" and it was, indeed, like Jupiter thundering and lightening over an awe-struck world, when he poured forth the winged arrows of his keen invective, his fiery indignation:

"Media nimbamur in nocte, corrusca Fulmina molitur dextrâ."—Virg.

Of the private character of Mirabeau, truth will not allow us to speak in such eulogy. With all his greatness, he had no moral grandeur. He knew not that lofty principle which teaches us to tame the wild voice of passion, to silence the murmurings of nature, and to bow to the decrees of an inscrutable providence. He flew to the feverish excitement of debauchery to fill the "craving void" left in his restless mind, when ambition or party spirit no longer gave its energies employment. He was, indeed, a gross and abandoned profligate. But at least he was not, like Ulysses' soldiers, changed to a beast by the Circean cup; even its deadly potion could not paralyze his faculties; and, like Silenus in Virgil's Eclogue, he rose, his veins yet swollen with debauch,* to speak of the eternal principles of reason and justice, and to enchant his hearers with the music of his eloquence.

Yet, though we cannot defend, we may be permitted to lament his errors. The stately tree was, indeed, rotten at core, even when its head towered highest, and its verdure was most luxuriant; but then it sprung up in the poisoned atmosphere of corruption; the iron weight of oppression checked its growth; the "bleak winds and pelting storms" of adversity; stripped it of its blossoms, and it might, perhaps, have flourished in healthy vigor, had it grown up in the sunshine of parental affection, and had the dews of virtue and peace been permitted to descend upon it. But Mirabeau had not a father's guiding hand to direct him in the right path, the reflection of a father's virtues to encourage him to self-denial—he was cast upon the world to wander

"Quocunque ferat melior fortuna parente."—Hor.

Is it surprising that he should have been led astray by temptation? He began life filled with high hopes and generous sentiments: he found himself baffled, persecuted, and abandoned; is it surprising that cruel and unmerited suffering should have embittered his temper, and shaken his confidence in the divinity of virtue? He had writhed under "The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely," and is it surprising that the deep sense of his injuries should rankle in his heart, until it poisoned every healthy feeling?

What he might have been under other circumstances we cannot judge; we speak of him only as he was—an erring and guilty mortal, but great even in his miseries, his follies, and his crimes:

"This should have been a noble creature—he
Had all the energy which would have made
A goodly frame of glorious elements,
Had they been wisely mingled—as it is,
It is an awful chaos—light and darkness,
And mind and dust, and passions and pure thoughts,
Mixed and contending without end or order,
All dormant or destructive."—Byron.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

QUOTATIONS.

I do not recollect with certainty whether Miss Edgeworth, in her admirable Essay on Bores, specifies the quotation-loving bore, as one of that horrible genus. Two species are known to exist at the present day, the one distinguished by the appellation of the conversational quoter, and the other as the writing quoter. It would puzzle a Linneus or a Buffon, however, to assign them any distinct situation in a cabinet of natural history, as they partake partly of the nature of beast, and partly of that of birds. Their bestial nature consists in their browsing in the fields of literature, and cropping the fairest flowers; they are of the ruminating class, for they preserve their food a long while before making use of it, rolled up in little detached parcels, and concealed in a place called the cranium, or in a sort of kangaroo pouch, commonly called a common-place book. Their second nature is marked by their predatory habits, and by the talons with which they seize on their prey. They belong to the class vulture, and are supposed to be described by

* "Infatum hesternum venas, ut semper, iaccho."—Virg. Ecl. 9.

Virgil under the name of harpies. The conversational quoter has the power of speech in a degree equal to the parrot or magpie, repeating what it hears from others, and this is all that is known of their natural history.

The presence of the last mentioned can be discovered by his enforcing his observations, at the great hazard of proving himself a clipper of coin, (I speak figuratively,) by some beautiful but hack-nied rhyme or threadbare paragraph; and the former is always known by his continually tagging and dovetailing his sentences with some appropriate lines, introduced by a flourish of "as the poet says," or, "as a great writer on this subject remarks." I leave the solution of the question whether the former or the latter be the worse evil, to the ingenious and philosophical author of the "Miseries of Human Life." I am rather inclined to the opinion, that the conversational quoter is the worse evil, from the force with which I can imagine the uneasiness of the poor gentleman of whom Mathews related one of his humorous stories, whose every observation was met with a scrap of an old song, as, when he remarks on the coldness of the weather he receives for answer, "Blow, blow, thou wintry wind;" and when he informs his fellow-traveller, he considered such language very rude, was told, "Cease, rude Boreas, blustering railer."

The inclination to quote can be traced in the portfolio of the traveller, and in the cabinet of the philosopher. The traveller could not bring home the Waterloo bridge or St. Peter's church, but he gratified his admiration of the original by a sketch; and when displaying it to his friends, feels all the consciousness of having crossed the one and gazed upon the other. So the quoter, when he cannot transfer to his pages the whole of a favorite author, indulges himself in some slight touches, which, to his pedantic satisfaction, is sufficient to convince the reader of his acquaintance with the quoted.

It seems to be an opinion that the older the author is from whom the quotation is made, the better. One from Gower or Chaucer is beyond all price; as the philosopher values his brick from the tower of Babel more than a whole modern city. It may be an opinion current with them, that literature improves by keeping, like wine; and that the dust of antiquity in which it is shrouded gives it a sort of religious mystery. The more unintelligible it is, the better it gives the reader a higher idea of the author's learning and comprehension.

An occasional and apt quotation is often highly ornamental. I object to quotations for the mere purpose of quotation, and when it occurs too often. A beautiful exotic adds variety and life to a whole garden, but the foreign plants should not be placed so thickly that the natural productions of the soil cannot shoot. A book interlarded with marks of quotation appears as if its author, or rather compiler, had borrowed from sheer necessity. What a ridiculous figure he would cut if, like the jay in the fable, he were stripped of his borrowed plumage! There is a very picturesque description of this retributive justice in Washington Irving's dream in the Westminster library; where, from a respectable-looking and well-dressed man, one person reclaimed a pair of small-clothes, a second a hat, a third a wig, and so on, until the poor pilferer stood stripped of his borrowed dignity and respectability, a scorn and a jest to all.

The quotations of Burke are remarkably felicitous. He observed the happy medium, neither wholly wanting nor too full. They unite with his subject so smoothly, they harmonize so well with his ideas, they astonish so much by their peculiar appropriateness, that far from appearing grafts or excrescences, they seem to be inherent to his reflections, and to have been created with them. This resulted from extensive reading, an excellent memory, and an excellent formation of mind. He did not ransack his library for them, they offered, they pressed themselves upon his attention. His mind was overflowing with knowledge; and when he drew on its inexhaustible reservoirs, he could not divide the rich drops of literature from the overwhelming stream of intellect. His quotations did not consist of the musty pedantic furniture of a college-furnished brain, they were jewels of literature brought up from its deep profound. They were not the waifs of a purloiner, or the estrays of another's signory; no sentence was tortured, no language was strained for their introduction; but all the parts harmonized together, forming a grand and impressive whole. While busy with one statesman, it may not be amiss to observe of another, the late Mr. Canning, that it has been remarked that all his quotations were from the first six books of the Æneid.

Quotation is not of modern origin, for Cicero and the Latin historians indulge in it; but the most singular instance occurs in Roocommon's poetical essay on English verse, wherein he quotes three or four pages of Milton's blank verse, by way of elucidating his argument, but to the utter derangement and discomfiture of all congruity and unity of design.

Although all authors of merit, and some of no merit at all, are considered by the quoters as their property, yet those to whom they more particularly lay claim are among the ancients, Seneca, Virgil, Horace, Cicero, and Juvenal, not troubling the Greeks much; and among the moderns Shakespeare, Milton, Butler, and Pope. But the fate of the productions of these, from Milton down, is incomparably happier than that of Shakespeare. It were well if scribblers would consider his anathema against those who disturbed his physical remains, as applying to his intellectual also. If a writer can discover a line, nay, even a word, in Shakespeare, in any manner applicable to his subject, he immediately notes it down, and bolsters it with proper marks of quotation on either side; the mere exclamation, "holloa!" has been quoted, with the name of Shakespeare for authority.

Varied quotation certainly displays knowledge, but used for that purpose it becomes a species of pedantry. It is not so great a sin as plagiarism, but misquotation is a much greater; for plagiarism is merely raising yourself to the level of another, whereas misquotation consists in the grosser misdemeanor of bringing another down to your own level. Byron detected Campbell, in three or four instances of misquotation, and has passed his reprehension on it.

Sir Walter Scott led the way in prefixing a motto to each chapter of his works, and the whole tribe of novelists followed his footsteps. So far did he give the reins to his desire of mottoes to prefix to his chapters, that when ready-made ones were wanting, he manufactured suitable ones for the purpose. All those signed Old Play are indebted to this motto mania for their existence. So general has this practice become, that there are several books compiled expressly for the purpose of quotation; one by a clergyman of this city, who doctored and remodelled passages from all authors at his pleasure, in order that the purchasers of his book could fit them in their places without further trouble. With merciless hand he transferred from the fields of their birth, where they grew in wild and untrammelled beauty, the fairest flowers of poetry, to the leaves of his herbarium, where each bright leaf withered, and each sweet tint faded.

But if persons will use quotations, let them be original, not the quotations of quotations. Any passage remarkable for beauty is quoted and requoted, until it becomes as hacknied as the nursery tales of old Mother Hubbard. How long the poet's eye will roll in a fine frenzy is not only a matter of conjecture but of alarm. As for the "light fantastic toe," it is worn to the bone, but nevertheless steps it off as merrily as in its best days. It is to be feared that it resembles the good people of Communipaw, who, according to John Bull in America, danced to the devil's fiddling, until not only their light fantastic toes, but even their ankles, were worn off. Poor man has been the study of mankind, so long, we should suppose that resurrection-men would have starved to death ere this. It is remarkable that now-a-days every newspaper essayist and scribbler has a dream, which is not all a dream. It is a melancholy fact, that since the days of that dozy fellow, Byron, people never get their old-fashioned sleep and dreams. This may yet be remedied, for we have observed a change coming over the spirit of a great many dreams lately, and it is to be hoped that things will again fall into the old routine. But the hacknied quotation of "jam satis," popping into my head, reminds me that it is time to finish, and moreover, my impatience is continually whispering, "claudite rivos."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1832.

Portrait of Washington Irving.—We intended, as previously announced, to have embellished this number with a very superior steel engraving of Washington Irving, by Hatch and Smillie. But that not being quite finished, we think this a proper opportunity to publish the view of Wall-street, mentioned in our prospectus as the only one on copper to appear in the present volume, all the others being on steel. The likeness of Mr. Irving, respecting which we are pleased to observe so much interest manifested, will be ready in the course of a month.

Editor's Study.—Our sheet to-day is filled entirely with original matter, and in looking it over and making it ready to be lanced, irrevocably, upon the world, our mind is crossed with several thoughts. What mistakes are here hidden from us which the multitudinous eyes of the public will detect? What latent personality is lurking under a demure description—what political heresy disguised beneath a bon mot—where has an impertinent semi-colon thrust itself into the rightful place of a comma—where is there a letter upside down—or a p for a q to mar the sense of our offering, and lower our character, and disturb our dream to-morrow night when we shall discover it but too late? Come, reader, as this is a department sacred to familiarity, we will lay aside our editorial dignity, and you shall put off your critical acumen, and we will enjoy a moment's friendly examination of our own affairs. Reflect now upon the evils that have sometimes resulted to you from a word carelessly spoken. Have you not ever abused lawyers or doctors, and in the midst of your animadversions been startled by one at your elbow; or condemned the conduct of some public man, and been informed in a whisper that the person next you was his nephew or his son; or ridiculed a book, till the extraordinary coincidence of nods and winks among your hearers betrayed that the whole had been overheard by the author? But these are incidents soon forgotten and trifling when compared with the regular necessity of having all your daily thoughts and opinions—written in every mood—denied the advantage of a revision—arrested and exhibited to the world for deliberate inspection. And then the immutability of a printed piece! When we and the objects of our hasty remarks, and the tastes of the times, and the very generations around shall be changed, our miscellaneous comments will be staring us in the face, and we shall be haunted by the ghosts of old paragraphs, unless (which to most of our fraternity would be still worse) Lethe, that potent stream against an universal deluge from which the literary world has no promise, shall silently spread its stagnant waters over us and all our errors. That last is rather a forlorn comfort, and no consolation for reading in our own writings that we sat out for such a place, or that we read to a maiden while she sowed, or any other of the inadvertencies, to guard from which requires the eyes of an Argus.

The fourth page is occupied with two letters. The first from an associate, to whom we look for many interesting sketches. The second is by a hand practised in literature, whose situation at Washington invests him with certain facilities for observing both the character of statesmen and orators, and the operations of that lower but more delightful vale, animated with the light of beauty and the hum of fashion. We wish some one would hint to the brilliant circles who dwell in that metropolis or are crowding thither from various parts of the United States, to be on their guard:

"A chiefs' among them taking notes,
And faith he'll prent 'em."

We commend the outline of "Mirabeau" to attention, but wish to complain of the writer, as an individual meriting reprehension. He is an enemy to the public, and snaps his fingers at them in a most disrespectful manner; for although his writings are enriched with an uncommon force of thought, and elegance of diction, he commits them to paper in the intervals afforded by other, (and as he impudently observes,) more serious avocations, solely for his own selfish amusement. We called in to his office the other afternoon, and found him in the act of lighting his cigar with a manuscript, twisted up into the form of a match, on which we caught the words, "his voice shattered the walls," and "crusade proclaimed in her name." A gentle flame just waved from the tip, when, by our timely intervention, we rescued the glowing biography of Mirabeau. Budgett relates a story of Rosicrusius, whose disciples pretend to new discoveries, which they are never to communicate to the rest of the world. The sepulchre of that philosopher, long after his death, was discovered, containing one of the ever-burning lamps of the ancients, the secret of which he had discovered. It was still lighted, but by its side was the brazen statue of an armed man, so constructed, that on the entrance of any one it raised a club, and dashed the suspended lamp to pieces. There are several Rosicrusians about town, in a literary way. We have reason to believe there is an organized society here. One of our best poets has been sworn in; and a person who knows much respecting these things, told us as much as that another has lately been permitted to collect and publish in a volume a number of admirable pieces before printed, on condition that several, not yet completed, but which might be as perpetual as the lamp of the ancients, should remain forever buried and concealed in his own imagination. We have regretted, more than once, that our periodical was established in a city so infested by the followers of this surly Rosicrusius.

The short article on "Quotations" was much wanted. Read it, old and young, and act accordingly. The excellent mind that furnished our description of Wall-street, on the first page, is guilty in this particular. He calls the Exchange the place "where merchants most do congregate." We shall hereafter be compelled to establish a severe censorship over our pages, and to strip correspondents of their borrowed decorations. The author of Mirabeau has also sinned in this respect, in the untranslated "acer et indomitus," over his paper, but he, being a Rosicrusian is, in some degree, excusable. Of all quotations, which, to nine-tenths of the human family must be intolerable, those dragged in from the dead languages, or, indeed, any foreign tongue, are the most provoking. A writer addicted to this tells you that "so good and virtuous a youth could not commit the crime, because "Nemo repente fuit turpissimus—" but adds, "his father was a scoundrel, and I confess 'κακὸν κἀγαθὸν κοινὸν αἶμα.'" Then there are the misquoters, and those who mix up their words with the author's, and change moods and tenses to suit the occasion; like the man who, wishing to express emphatically the agreeable manner in which he was spending the evening, observed, "tempus certainly does fugit much more rapidly than usual." For calling attention to this great evil, our correspondent merits the thanks of the reading community. We dismiss the quoters, only adding, that in the "Extracts from a Modern Dictionary" on the last page, Milton has been made responsible for the term "domestic bliss," instead of "wedded bliss."

There is another habit into which some of our kind correspondents are falling, viz. punning. He who prepared the above-mentioned sketch of Wall-street—if you only knew him—the kindest, the most cheerful, benevolent being—but he will forever astound you with that long discarded piece of wit. It bursts out from him on all occasions, like a cork from a champagne bottle, or a bubble on the surface of a running stream. No matter how he is engaged—talking, writing, grave or gay, business or pleasure—pop—there it comes, and you must make the most of it. It reminds us of the leaping sturgeon in a glassy river, when all around is smooth and you least expect it, up he comes, and a splash startles you from your meditations. Our heart misgave us when we saw our friend in his article sailing towards bank notes, dealt out by the poet he mentions, and sure enough the notes of his bewitching lyre soon sounded in our ears. We said nothing, however, till he gravely informed us the lyre is not a fib-teller, and we then seriously resolved to give the subject a grave consideration. We know Shakespeare admitted these annoyances into his most highly-wrought scenes; so much so indeed, that some of his characters, instead of tears on any great calamity, invariably shed a flood of puns. A lover losing his mistress, strikes his breast and puns away in an agony of disappointment, and dying men pun in their last prayers. Even Milton could not soar above "this visible diurnal sphere" without a small parcel of these useful little machines, and he lets them down on his reader from the skies, or out from the garden of Eden in true earthly style:

"And with one bound high overleaped all bound," &c.
"If our proposals once again were heard," &c.
"Leader! the terms we sent were terms of weight,
Of hard contents, and full of force urged home;" &c.

We give public notice that we shall, hereafter, set our faces against puns and quotations; and we hereby declare war against the Rosicrusians, great and small, and warn them that whenever any of their productions fall in our way, or, to speak figuratively, whenever we dig down into any of their hidden sepulchres, we shall seize whatever we can, and hold it up to posterity. One of this sect has a poem, by Dr. Drake, called the "Culprit Fay." We do not know where it is buried, but hope some lucky accident will bring it to light. Why the numerous friends and admirers of that estimable man and admirable poet, should be denied the gratification of perusing a work from his pen, so remarkable for rich fancy and exquisite style, is a question frequently asked.

We have accidentally omitted to notice the establishment in this city of a weekly paper, called the Rail-road Journal. Its leading object is to disseminate a general and accurate knowledge of the extraordinary and almost incredible perfection to which rail-roads are brought, and the facts respecting their general adoption throughout the country. The reader, however, must not allow the title to mislead him into a belief that its sphere is circumscribed, its materials dull, or its pages unattractive. Besides a mass of historical and scientific information concerning the various branches of internal improvement, it contains a valuable supply of foreign and miscellaneous intelligence, and furnishes a convenient and entertaining record of what is passing in the literary world. It is published by Mr. D. K. Minor, and, we understand, the literary department is under the direction of Mr. Charles Hoffman, one of the editors of the American, a gentleman to whom the town is already indebted for many of the lively and popular sketches upon new publications, and other subjects, which have within a year enhanced the value of that excellent journal as a family paper.

The career of the Morning Courier and Enquirer has been successful in an almost unprecedented degree. The proprietors have exhibited unusual talent, energy, and skill in conducting its concerns. Their great facilities in procuring the earliest foreign news, their liberality and enterprise in furnishing their readers, by express, with public documents, and the endless variety of miscellaneous information to be found in their columns, have rendered this one of the most extensively circulated and important journals in the country. Of course we have nothing to do with its politics, of which we do not pretend to judge. The additional improvements lately made in this gazette are of such a nature as must command universal attention. The recent enlargement makes it the most ample and elegant sheet issued from the American press. It is printed on fine paper, with new type, by means of a double cylinder press, by which two thousand sheets are struck off in an hour. The annual cost of this, as well as each of its contemporaries in this city, is only ten dollars. It would puzzle a foreigner to conceive how morning newspapers can be afforded on such moderate terms. Similar publications in London command several times the amount. The inadequate price paid here for this species of labor, is a serious disadvantage, against which both dailies and weeklies have to contend, and one which exercises an extremely pernicious influence upon the exertions of our editorial brethren. A very general circulation, or an extensive advertising patronage is absolutely necessary to any suitable remuneration for the drudgery, labor, and enormous expenses incurred. The sum of ten dollars is but a slender compensation for any morning journal published in the city of New-York.

The operatic corps of the Park are nearly perfect in the forthcoming opera of the "Maid of Judah," and Mrs. Austin will soon appear here as Elvira, in Masaniello. She lately sang with Mr. Sinclair at the Musical Fund of Philadelphia, and also in Cinderella to a fine house. She will be warmly welcomed to our boards. Her tour to the south has been unusually brilliant. Cinderella, at Baltimore, was played twelve times in a fortnight. Jones improves in Masaniello. Mr. Richings rather overacts his part in "Behold how brightly breaks the morning." Nothing should be allowed to interfere with that delightful barcarole; and even although his playing be good, he should guard against diverting the attention of the audience. It disconcerts the singers, and destroys the effect of the music. In other respects he is excellent. Mr. Wilson and Mrs. Duff have been sustaining their round of characters, at the Richmond-hill, with considerable success. The Chatham has been re-opened for the reception of playgoers in that part of the town.

We are compelled, reluctantly, to exclude several notices of books, etc. and to postpone the reading of a number of communications till next week. Three or four letters are received, one from "a bachelor," complaining that the young ladies of this city are too grave and distant to their beaux, thereby frightening their sweet-hearts from tender thoughts; and a few lines from "Julio" asking advice touching a courtship which he declares has been broken off by the jealousy of two elder sisters. Charles informs us that he is passionately fond of music, and that a young Miss, for whom he has a "warm respect," has had a cold these two years every time he asked her to sing, and that the opening of a piano always sets her coughing. We recommend him to send her a box of Dr. Slangwhanger's cough drops! We sympathize, however, most deeply with a poor gentleman who says he occupies a room in the attic of a house without fire-places, and warmed by a furnace situated in the cellar. The people down stairs, he adds, are ill-natured, and shut off the heat when they please; and he assures us, with tears in his eyes, that after every new quarrel, they are sure to revenge themselves by nearly freezing him to death. The poor man adds, that when he wishes to know how he stands with his landlord, he always looks at his thermometer! We are much pleased to find the sphere of our correspondence lately much enlarged, and promise, that if our friends will forward their grievances to us, we will, like all great moralists, either furnish a remedy, or prove that their best method is to bear them as well as possible.

FALL OF JERUSALEM.

'Twas sunset—and high above Jerusalem
Was seen the form of Wrath—his brow begirt
With storm—his arm with living thunder clad,
And in his red right hand was poised the bolt
Of retribution!
That ancient city! queen of Israel—joy
Of all the earth—the home of holy song—
Her time had come! From age to age
Her God had sent his servants forth, and they Had knelt in sackcloth at her gates, and shed
Their tears, and groaned their prayers along her streets,
And pined away within her prison walls,
And poured their reeking blood upon her soil:
And, last of all, the Prince of Glory came—
Disowned, rejected, scorned; his name cast out;
His claims disputed, and his works despised:
Yet on he labored, toiled, and fainting not.
He wept, he prayed, he groaned, he bled, he died;
But, ere they led him forth, a prayer they said,
“On us and on our offspring be the guilt of all
His blood!” O damning prayer! 'Twas answered soon—
'Tis answered yet! a lasting curse, deep branded
On the brow of Judah's scattered children!
The die was cast—the ban of reprobation fell;
And though the wrathful hour was still delayed,
'Twas that her cup of guilt might overflow,
And all who would, escape the ruin of her fall.
And now the Roman legions came, and swarmed
Like locusts round her proud and lofty walls;
But ere the gates were shut, a little band
Went straggling forth, and wandered on among
The neighboring hills—'twas not a warlike band,
It was the flock of Jesus, led by angels forth;
For his own word was pledged to save them
From the coming storm.
And now Jerusalem had filled her cup;
Her streets had overflowed with blood
Of holy men; and weeping Mercy, that long
Had plead her cause with most beseeching words,
Sealed up her lips for ever! Meantime
The soldiers, at the mandate of their chief,
Had compassed in the city, with a breast-work
Broad and high.
Within her walls were scenes of nameless woe,
While lank-jawed, meagre Famine strolled about
The empty streets, and lapped at every door
The oozing blood—no less did hellish Faction
Claim an offering large of human gore.
The dank and loathsome tombs were filled
With princely carcases, and those of lower rank
Were scattered in the public ways. None mourned
The loss of friends, but rather wished them dead,
That fewer mouths might claim a share in food
That still remained. The strongest ties that bind
Together human souls were loosed, and none
Took care to see another fed. The mother
Thrust aside her starving child; and when
She heard its piteous moan, a laugh
Of maniac wildness told no mother's heart
Was there.
The tragedy of heaven had now begun—a few
More hours and God would let the curtain fall!
But ere the ruin burst, there was a deep
And awful calm. 'Twas such as when
The darkening tempest overspreads the clear
Blue vault, and Nature seems to hold her breath
In dread expectancy, while heaven prepares
To launch its thunders at the crouching earth.
'Twas like the hectic flush that comes before
Eternal paleness!
That day was fair as ever shone on Palestine,
And when the morning beams first fell upon
The city's golden domes and brazen towers,
The Romans hid their faces, for they could
Not look on such a flood of glory.
And Titus turned away, and wept to think
How soon those ancient piles would make a satire
On the pride of human art. The day passed on
And eve approached; but when the sun now rolled
His car adown the steep of heaven, and bathed
His burning forehead in the Ægean wave,
His lingering beams sketched signs of most Unwonted wrath upon the eastern sky.
All marked the omens—all the Jews belied
Their import. When they saw their city
Pictured on the sky, besieged by mighty hosts,
And men of war, with fiery steeds careering
On the golden clouds, they said “'twas sign
Of great deliverance soon to come.”
These wonders passed; the night came down,
And Nature, as a meek and peaceful child,
Slept sweetly on the bosom of her God.

The beauteous queen of night shot out her barge
Upon the wide ethereal sea,
And myriads of shining orbs, that circle
Through the farther deep of heaven, beamed forth
A fainter radiance on the crystal air.
And there were mournful sounds, that trembled
On the ear like speech of dying men, and seemed Prophetic of some dire calamity.
For in the far-off distance, hoarsely chimed
The heaving billows, as they broke upon
The Tyrian rocks; and to him that held
His ear awake, the low whisperings of fate
Stole on his sense, like music of some Lonely hour; and all the scenery round
Was such as stirred the soul to look upon:
For there was Olive's mount, where Jesus wept,
But now 'twas Titus' camp; and here and there
The Roman eagle stood; and scattered groups
Of weary soldiers on their shields had laid
Them down to sleep; and there the garden
Where he prayed in agony; and there
Was Kedron's lonely brook; and there
Siloe's sweeter fount, grown putrid now
With blood of slaughtered men, and stench
Of pestilence!
The night advanced, and deeper silence came.
The noise and bustle of the day had now
All ceased, and weeping nature too had hushed
Her moan; not e'en a timid zephyr fluttered
On the bosom of the quiet air.
The moonbeams still were sleeping on
The temple's gilded turrets, and the stars
Looked down, and seemed to say, “Farewell!”
To that great city, soon to be no more:
And nought was heard, save step of weary
Sentinel, as on he walked his round upon
The wall or neighboring hill; or now and then
The Roman or the Jewish watchword echoed
Through the hollow air, or dying groans came up
From Salem's lonely streets.
And now the hour of midnight came,
And earth and heaven and hell seemed full
Of awful preparation. The moon, that lately
Shone so bright, turned deadly pale, and all
The stars drew weeds of mourning on,
Still shedding forth a wan and sickly beam;
And birds of evil omen flapped their wings
Above Jerusalem, and croaked aloud;
And spirits lost came flying through
The fevered air, as if some fearful errand
Call'd them from the pit, and angels of the living God
Swept down the starry road; and when they reached
The city, some reclined upon the temple's roof,
Then hovered in the air, as if God's house
Were not a sanctuary.
Just then a sound unearthly rolled around
The temple gates; its firm and lofty pillars
Rocked like cedars in a tempest;
The solid pavement shook, and then a voice
Of muttering thunder came from out
The holy place, and said, “Let us depart.”
A troop of flaming seraphs wheeled away
To heaven, and all was hushed again.
O Salem! Salem! where is now thy God?
Go call thy priests, and let them bring their incense;
O haste, and pour the blood of all thy beasts
Upon the altar. Go quickly, call
Thy slaughtered prophets from their graves,
And let them kneel and cry for mercy.
O that thou hadst a Moses or a Daniel,
To stand and plead thy cause, for thou
Art old in sin, and all the things belonging
To thy peace are hidden from thine eyes.
Alas! nor blood, nor incense-smoke, nor prayer
Of martyred seers, could change thy doom.
Thy lonely grave is dug, and devils
Gather now to chant thy funeral song.
What means yon heavy column, bright
With shields, as on it moves with noiseless step,
In march circuitous from Olive's brow,
And bends its course to yonder gate?
What means that din of battle-axes, and clash
Of armor, and the thundering crash
Of falling towers, and shouts of victory,
And groans of dying men?
Ha! See those pillars huge of rolling dust,
That mark the victors' path through yonder street!
Whence comes that heavy cloud of smoke
That towers to heaven, and whence that sheet
Of livid flame? Alas! alas! the temple burns:
O weep! daughter of Zion, weep! put sackcloth
On thy loins, and ashes on thy head; go sit
In dust and weep! O Jerusalem!
Jerusalem! thine hour is come, thy glory gone,
And desolate thy house!
The morning came, but now the city was

No more. To him who stood upon
The neighboring hills, the valley seemed
A moving sea of smoke and noisome vapor,
Rolling up to heaven. Nought could be seen,
And nothing heard save dying groans; or now
And then the falling crash of massive Columns, that had stood the fury
Of the night.
And when the orient sun first looked aslant
O'er Olive's brow, he seemed as a timid child,
That dares not lift the pall and gaze
Upon the ghastly face of one that's dead;
For when his newest beams caught glimpses
Of the ruin, they seemed recoiling back
To their primeval source, as if the sun
Were sick to look on such a scene.
But day advanced; the vapor ocean rolled
Away, and showed where once fair Salem stood.
And there stood Wrath—he leaned against
A broken marble shaft, his bow relaxed,
And quiver empty at his feet. And there
Was Desolation, in his wild sepulchral
Garb, and held a leaden sceptre in his Bony hand; he too stood still, and looked
As if his work were done. And there
Was soft-eyed Pity, strolling up and down
The streets; her robe of crape was loosely thrown
About her fragile form, and she appeared
As if her work were just begun.
And now the silence ended
In the captive's mournful wail; and here
And there, amid the smoking plain, were seen
The scattered remnants of an ancient race.
From yonder distance went a group of aged men
And matrons, bowing down with weight of years;
And when they came where late the temple stood,
And saw the altar broken down, and holy
Vessels strewn upon the earth, and thought
Of other times, when they had gone up there
To pay their morning vows, they lifted up
Their eyes and wept.
That day the soldiers turned the last
Remaining column off its base, and strewn
The land with salt, and ere the sun had set
They struck their tents, and all prepared to march.
In front was seen a countless throng
Of Jewish captives, from the hoary sire
To tender infants resting in their mothers' arms.
These moved in solemn silence up
The adjacent hill, and, when they reached
Its farthest peak, these sons of Abraham
Paused. They threw one lingering glance
Behind, and thought of all they once
Possessed, and then a note of lamentation
Swelled upon the breeze.

ORIGINAL BIOGRAPHY.

SKETCHES OF DISTINGUISHED CHARACTERS.

THOMAS ADDIS EMMET.

It was a remark of the lamented subject of this sketch, that “his life belonged to and would be embodied in history.” It was made, not in a spirit of egotism, but (and it is the only occasion, says Sir Philip Sydney, when boasting may be pardoned) while repelling the charge of a calumniator. The remark, however, was a true one, in whatever feeling it was uttered, and the name of Emmet belongs to and will be embodied in the history of Ireland. When the men of that country shall obtain as a boon, or seize as a right, the freedom of thought and of expression; when they shall assume the inheritance of which the union has deprived them; and when justice shall be at length awarded to patriotism, however misguided, and virtue, however slandered: when that time arrives, the actions and qualities of Emmet will become history; and until then he himself would but demand and receive a grave and a memory in the country of his adoption. To the historian, then, whose duty it will become to vindicate his actions and to display his qualities, we commit both, as he did, in the perfect confidence that both will be rightly appreciated. It is not, it cannot be ours, to perform such a duty; but we can, at least, in our humble sphere, fondly and not unprofitably remember what he was, point to the virtues we might proudly emulate, though at a distance, and dwell with pride and sorrow upon that character which has by his own voluntary act become a noble part of our national possession. The task of the biographer is often most difficult and delicate, requiring an intimate knowledge of human nature, and varied and extensive acquisitions; he may have, as in the case of Napoleon, to distinguish between virtues, follies, and crimes; but in that of Emmet he may tell his story without a comment, for in that character there was no veil, no concealment; the temper and soul of the man were in every deed, thought, and gesture. He need only appeal to the hearts of our community, and he cannot utter an eulogium to which their voice will not respond.

Thomas Addis Emmet was, we believe, the youngest of three sons of a highly respectable physician in Dublin. The family appears to have been remarkable for talent of a high order. Robert, whose unsuccessful effort to restore his country to her ancient independence, drew down on him the vengeance of the government, has displayed in his dying speech a proud specimen of moral courage and nervous eloquence. Temple, another brother, was distinguished for oratory in a country which seems to be the birth-place of orators, and stood very high in his profession, which there collects in its ranks all that is noble in birth or by nature. Thomas, the youngest, pursued his father's profession; but after receiving his diploma, he relinquished it, and chose the law as his permanent occupation. In the struggle which accompanied and succeeded the union, every man, and especially every professional man, took his determined stand on one side or the other. It was not in the temper of the times, it did not comport with the Irish character, that there should be found a neutral in the country. On the one side were arrayed the office-holders and the pensioners of England: men who had either received the rewards for betraying their country, or had it in animating prospect; on the other were the honesty and talent of Ireland, the men to whom the lower classes looked up for counsel, and whom they acknowledged as their champions in the confusion of that critical moment. On this latter side we find recorded with Grattan, and Curran, and Plunkett, the family of the Emmets. To the men we have mentioned it was a period of awful responsibility. They had opposed, with all the conviction of argument and every appeal of eloquence, the subjection of their island to Great Britain: they had proclaimed it an act if passed not binding on their constituents, and contrary to the constitution. Was it not natural that this people should revolt, under these circumstances, from the union? Was it not to be certainly expected, that they would commit those acts which are the inevitable results of the indignation of a whole people, who supposed themselves robbed of their rights, and sold, as it were, by their own brothers, into political slavery? The more influential men among them saw more definitely the dangers which to the mass had all the adventitious coloring of the imagination. They saw in their union with a manufacturing people the cramping and subservience of that spirit among themselves; they saw in their system of representation, in the English parliament, their country in a contemptible minority; and in that minority the creatures of any ministry, responsible not to their own countrymen, but to the paymaster in St. Stephen's, and cringing and fawning for a smile at St. James's. They saw in the promise held out to them of religious emancipation, the word of that promise broken to their hope, without even the poor consolation of keeping it to their ear. They saw all this, and they heard in the loud voice of the people, opinions which should not be slighted, expressions which could not be mistaken; and in obedience to both they united with their common fortunes, and were willing to stand the common hazard of the die. While, however, we award equal justice to them, let us not forget to be just to England. It was their undoubted interest, in a commercial and political view, to secure the consolidation of Ireland with, or her subjection to themselves. Her statesmen were aware how in the olden time France, which had avowed herself at once the natural enemy of the one island and the ally of the other, had, through the medium of Ireland and Scotland, endangered her very existence by violence or intrigue. One of these means of communication she had cut off, the other only was wanting to present to the ambition of France a front of undivided opposition. Having attained her objects, by bribery and intrigue, she found the truth of the expression of Erskine, that a government can only control by fear where it is in vain to look for affection, and accordingly her steps, as she advanced in her career of terror, were guided by no rules but her fears, encircled by no forms but such as could secure her victims, and smoking with the blood of those whom she could not bend, and must necessarily break.

Such was the situation, the anomalous situation, of both countries at the time when the family of Emmet appeared in that theatre, and witnessed that drama, which was at once a tragedy and a farce. They saw a comparative handful of foreigners, lording it over millions of natives, destroying their lives, confiscating their property, proscribing their religion, offering to him who had been bred in a faith of all others the most imposing, attractive, and deeply rooted, to those who had been baptized in the words of its sacrament, who had prayed in the forms of its dictation, and who loved it with superstitious and jealous affection, the alternative of abjuring it, or of being compelled to be degraded in themselves, and abject in their posterity. It was, as it were, tearing out the very fibres of the heart to preserve its existence. Was it strange that they did not yield; that many of them, who had been brought up in a state of wild independence, did not at once change their very character, and become abject and tamely submissive? Was it wonderful that the lion who had snuffed the free air of his breasts, and roamed their sovereign, should not, when goaded to desperation by cruelty and confinement, cower submissive to the lash, and look with complacency on the bars of his cage?

At this period came forward Robert Emmet. With great mental and physical courage, with information and eloquence, he combined a pure and gallant patriotism. He heard the indignant cry of his countrymen, and offered himself eventually a martyr in their cause. The calumnies which they whose interest it was so to do, circulated against his character, in order, if possible, to wash their white by the contrast, need not be refuted. His own dying and burning denial need not be repeated, and can scarcely again be equalled. It is the outpouring of a mind conscious of its virtue, noble and pure in life, triumphant and victorious in and over death; it is the very climax of contempt and pity for those that could not and would not appreciate its motives. It was an appeal which is echoed now by the hearts of Irishmen as warmly as it then rung on the ears of persecution and slander. Let the only boon he begged, the only petition he condescended to offer, be superstitiously granted. In the brighter days of his country, which assuredly are yet to come, and by an Irishman only, let the epitaph be written of him, who lived and died for Ireland.

The other branches of his family partook of the same spirit, and the blood of the brother produced men to whose moral strength and resolution armed men would have been children in the comparison. Temple, the other brother, died young, in the very height of professional and patriotic confidence; and the subject of our sketch was left, the only and not unworthy representative of a family whose name is synonymous in Ireland with genius and integrity.

The peculiar circumstances of his public life in that country we do not know, but it is enough to say that he distinguished himself so much as to attract the attention of government, to be confined in a state prison, to be examined before a committee of the house of commons, and to narrowly escape that death which he preferred to servitude and dishonor. In his examination before the committee he displayed his acuteness and his spirit. The first question they addressed to him, "Were you not one of the United Irishmen?" met the indignant avowal and fearless response, "I am one of the United Irishmen." The committee, of whom Lord Castlereagh was one, were delighted, we expect, to get rid of so formidable and decided an enemy. He and his brother patriots in their search for a place of refuge on which they should settle the little ark of their future fortunes, when the deluge of ruin had overwhelmed their native land, could not long hesitate. They beheld in our country that refuge, and fondly hoped that here they might worship at the altar of religious and political freedom undisturbed and untrammelled. They accordingly applied to our minister at London to know if they would be received into the communion of our rights and privileges, and were permitted to number themselves among the citizens of our commonwealth. The state of parties at that time was extremely warm, and the collisions fierce and frequent. When Emmet and his friends arrived here, one of the political parties was afraid that these men were coming to sow the seeds of a crop of political doctrines, whose harvest would be matured with the blood of a civil war, and reaped in the rankness and destruction of our republic. They were undoubtedly honest and conscientious in their fears, and although those fears were grounded in an utter misapprehension of the character of these men, they did not find us groaning under a despotism, which ground the poor to the earth, and robbed the wealthy and noble of every thing but their self-respect. They found us, it is true, divided on certain points of national policy, but yet ready to unite with one voice, one heart, one arm, to strike down him who should dare to lay his unhallowed finger on the ark of our independence. They found us happy in the full enjoyment of domestic ties, in the unlicensed freedom of the press, in our foreign relations, and in our peace and tranquillity. They did not come to destroy, but to share our individual and collective felicity; they did not come to undermine, but to seek a sanctuary in that temple, under the roof of which one of them lived and died; at one of whose altars consecrated to justice he ministered with pure heart and clean hands, and for whose duration he prayed then with as much devotion as we do now. These feelings of reverence for our country he has always shown; he mingled not in her political struggles, he ministered not to party excitement. He knew her independence; and his strongest feeling was that his country might be like her.

Sometime after his arrival in this city, he obtained his license, and commenced the practice of the law at an age more than usually advanced. His course in that practice I need not mention. Most of us have seen and heard him, some of us while yet in his professional prime. His eloquence was Irish, not only in the variety and beauty of his figurative illustrations, but in that vehement energy which denoted that the heart and the judgment went together in his course. His legal arguments are sound and convincing, and clothed in a style classically and chastely rich. He is not gorgeous, like Curran, often glittering with the mere tinsel of words, but he is bright and heavy with massy gold. He was not, like Wells, measured and precise in gesture, which yet was beautiful; but his actions, like his thoughts, came unbidden, and denoted that his physical man was wrought up to a conformity with, and yet subservient to, his mental excitement. As a jury lawyer, he was decidedly the greatest I ever listened to. Men who had controlled and enchained senates, were powerless beside him, when he thundered on or conciliated the jury-box. In the last cause which tasked his mighty effort he soared above Webster and Van Buren and his compeers, unrivalled and unapproachable. He died as a great lawyer should die, in the midst of his professional exertions, surrounded by his professional associates, in the very room, and within the very walls that but a few hours before had echoed to his thrilling eloquence. I need not recall to my readers the deep emotions that settled with a gloomy influence on the face of a whole community. I need not tell them of the tears of those whom he had loved and who loved him, of men with whom he had measured his strength, who had known and felt his superiority. Never shall I forget the meeting assembled to testify its respect to his memory. There were judges, whom he had delighted even when they differed from him; and brethren in the profession whom he had made to forget themselves and their clients in the charm of his genius, and who now poured out the tears of their bitterness of heart. To me there is something in the tear of a man inexpressibly striking: the wailings of a woman or a child are the outbursts of feelings that soothe even when they thrill the hearer with kindred emotion: but in the tear that streams down the cheek of a man, there is an intenseness of agony; there is so much fortitude to conquer, so much physical and mental strength to prostrate, so much hardihood of soul to melt, before that tear comes, that when it comes it is more afflicting than the loudest and most extravagant demonstrations of grief. I looked around upon that assembly, and was not ashamed to find in my own eye the moisture that dimmed it in sympathy with theirs. Whenever I go into any of the courts in which I was wont to listen with a full anticipation of delight that was never disappointed, I hear for a moment in the dreaming ear of memory the music of that voice which I am doomed never again to hear, except in that memory. Always honorable, always forcible, always courteous in his demeanor, he was the model, and almost the beau ideal of a great lawyer. Not a great case lawyer merely, not confined in his literature to his precedents, in his history to the terms, but sallying beyond this narrow boundary to bring to the elucidation of his subject the extensive information of a scholar. The law with him was not an undigested set of rules, but a perfect science, and a science demanding in its professors a wide and solid and various range of acquirements. Those acquirements he possessed and displayed, and they made him the pride and the ornament of the profession.

Such was the character of Emmet. He died with armies of friends, and, I do believe, not a single enemy; with a fame which will proudly survive him, and prove to posterity that, as it requires such genius and knowledge to be what he was, the reputation of a great lawyer does not expire with the breath of his eloquence, and is not forgotten with the lineaments of his person. Such was he as a citizen of our country. Let the history of his own do justice to his virtues, and record him as one of those who preferred the gratification of their own patriotism to the places and pensions they might easily have received; and as one who sacrificed only when the alternative was dishonor, the last wish of a noble-minded man: to live for his country's interest, to die for her glory, and to be buried in her soil.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE YEAR, WITH OTHER POEMS.

A THIN octavo, bearing this title, has lately made its appearance. The author is already known to the reader by another volume, "The Fall of the Indian," also containing several smaller pieces. We thought that composition extremely creditable to his talents, and noticed it as such in this journal. It was therefore with a prepossession in favor of the writer that we entered upon the perusal of "The Year"—a prepossession which we are sincerely sorry the present work does not warrant. It is a production of little interest, crowded with tautologies, both in word and idea; the former not redeemed by the value of the thought, nor the latter arranged with any ingenuity of fancy. With one or two trivial exceptions, we must declare the dull common-places of "The Year," and its companions, to be totally unworthy the source from which they came. We cannot ascribe their deficiencies to want of talent in the poet, but to an almost unpardonable carelessness which has led him to fling upon paper all the results of his most ordinary and uninspired meditations. A string of prose, pretty enough for fire-side chat, divided off gravely into measured lines, or arranged with good set rhymes, with now and then a swelling expression, or the fragment of a splendid simile, or a piece of fashionable sentimentalism, that have served in their turn half the writers in all languages from Homer to the present day. If our author imagines that because he has written poetry, all he thinks and feels must contain the same heavenly essence, he has a lesson to learn which many a more renowned person has learned before him. He might as well expect the flint to emit a perpetual flame, instead of carrying in its dark breast sparks struck out at times. It is therefore of vital importance to a poet that he should wait and seize the truly beautiful and original conceptions which roll through his imagination, and separate them as far as possible from the common-places every where uttered, and in poetry, too, a certain grace and flow of expression are expected not requisite in prose, so that the lines may have a greater perfection in themselves than a given number of words in any other species of composition. The author of "The Year" appears indeed to have separated his fine conceptions from the rest, but to have reserved them to himself instead of giving them to the reader.

He seems continually to forget that poetry consists in the thoughts, and that as a noble idea is beautiful, even when sparingly draped with words, so on the contrary, no profusion of language can give to a lean and common one dignity or grace. Yet take one of his short effusions, and consider its meaning alone, away from the meretricious importance with which the measure and music of rhyme invest it, and it appears careless, inconsistent, uninteresting, and destitute of order and plan. Here is one; let us examine it:

THE FLIGHT OF TIME.

Like the yellow harvest-moon,
Shining bright and fading soon;
Like the summer's golden sun;
Setting when his course is run;
Like the meteor, sprinkling light
On the gloomy brow of night:
Such is Time!—So from his wing,
He doth light—then darkness, fling;
Now like sunbeams is his track,
Now 'tis starless, wild and black;
Shedding light and life to day,
Which, anon decays away;
Having now a look of sorrow,
And a gleeful laugh to-morrow.

Walk along Time's lengthened shore,
Hear his waters lap—or roar;
Now they sport along the land
Kissing all the golden sand;
Curling their white crests the while,
Like an infant's placid smile.
Time will tell you that the Deep
Never rouseth from its sleep.
That the sunshine loves it well,
That his billows ne'er rebel.
He would thus the picture show
In its best and brightest view.

Walk along Time's rugged shore
When his gloomy billows roar.
They will tell you that the Past,
Had its tempests, and its blast;
That their turmoil, and their rage
Ceaseth not from age to age.
In their bosom deep and dark
Crazy craft and gallant bark
Sink, in wild and hopeless fear,
Never deeming Death so near.
Look then to thine own gay prow,
That no rocks beset thee now!

Now remove the thoughts of this piece from the little glare in which the poet has placed them, and coolly examine their quality. The first fourteen lines! What does he mean to say in them? "Time is like the moon, shining bright and fading soon; it is also like the sun, and like a meteor sprinkling light on the night." He then changes it to the common form, and describes it as flinging first light, then darkness from its wing. Then again it is the sun's track, then the night, and then he repeats that it sheds "light and life" to-day which soon "decays away;" then the old idea, the third time, "having now a look of sorrow and a gleeful laugh to-morrow." In the succeeding stanza his subject has spread out into an ocean whose waters lap and kiss the sand and smile like an infant. The next lines are an enigma: "Time will tell you," &c. The author next proceeds to request you again to walk along time's shore when his billows roar, and they are to tell you something else, viz. that the past had its tempests, &c. and that their "turmoil and their rage ceaseth" not; and although he left you walking on the shore, he winds up by begging you to look to your own prow, and beware of rocks.

We protest against this gross negligence in one whom nature has gifted with much poetic talent. If we entertained a lower opinion of Mr. M.'s abilities, we should not take the pains to analyze his productions; but if men of mind will thrust crude compositions before the world, and if they have so improper an idea of poetry as to suppose it may be flung out as easily as an ordinary conversation, they must expect severe criticism, and they richly deserve it. We have to complain in the present work of another fault—the abundance of similes to be found in the writings even of every school-boy. A star is a jewel on night's brow; the everlasting spring comes blushing, her brow covered with flowers, and gives a light-hearted laugh; and "the blue wave springs also with a laugh; and summer has a carpet green, while the golden (?) robin sings; and autumn also comes bounding with a mirthful laugh, and dies of a consumption; and the moon hangs like a silver urn." Poor Cynthia is a sadly abused personage. No wonder she has such a melancholy look; compelled to admit of such familiarities as so many poets, good and bad, are forever taking with her. Sometimes she is, as in the present instance, an urn; then she grows into a lamp, then a lovely queen, then a modest maiden. We have scarcely time to fall in love with her in that capacity, when, presto, she is a hypocritical jade, unworthy an honest man's affections.

"The devil's in the moon for mischief."

We have known a poet lanch her off in the commencement of the evening as a boat, and drive her down the western heavens a very stylish chariot and four. It is needless to add, that these hacknied figures of speech should be carefully avoided. We dismiss the volume, only extracting the following lines, and begging the reader to compare them with the charming poem, by the same author, called the "Song of the Birds," which we copied into a previous number of this journal, in a review of the "Tale of the Indian."

"Oh! merry's the winter day!
When the sled flies down the frozen way;
And the school-boys slide on the crackling ice;
And the snow-fort is levelled in a trice;
And the steel of the skater rings on the lake,
And the smoke of the gunner curls in the brake."

The seventeenth number of the Harpers' Family Library has just appeared. It consists of the "Smuggler," by the author of "Tales by the O'Hara family," "The Denounced," &c. This series of works continues to be marked for its neatness, and forms a choice and entertaining collection of novels.

Mr. H. C. Sleight has published a volume of poems, entitled the "Literary Remains of Joseph Brown Ladd, M.D. with a sketch of the author's life by W. B. Chittenden." We have only given it a cursory perusal, but will notice it more attentively hereafter.

IN PRESS.—The brothers Harper have announced, and will shortly publish the following works: "Palestine, or the Holy Land, by Dr. Russell;" "Memoirs of Josephine;" "Civil wars of Ireland, by W. C. Taylor;" "Memoirs of Lavalette;" "Lives of Female Sovereigns, by Miss Jameson;" "Adventures on the Columbian River;" "Polynesian Researches, by W. Ellis;" "Romance and Reality, by Miss Landon;" "Works of the Rev. Robert Hall, A. M.;" "Evelina, by Miss Burney;" "Eugene Aram, by E. L. Bulwer;" "Cavendish, or the Patrician at sea;" "Cameron, a novel;" "Keith on Prophecies;" "Lives of celebrated Travellers, by James St. John;" "Romance of History, Italy;" "Brown's Dictionary of the Bible;" "Gibson's Surveying;" "Law of Husband and Wife;" "The British Spy, with a biographical sketch of the author, William Wirt;" "Toar in England, Ireland, and France, with remarks on the manners and customs of the inhabitants, and anecdotes of distinguished public characters."

Mr. James Conner, of this city, is now preparing a stereotyped edition of a work entitled the "Treasury of Knowledge." It will consist of several parts, viz. a compendious English grammar, by Gould Brown, an English Dictionary, by Lyman Cobb, a new Universal Gazetteer, prepared by Mr. Edwin Williams, author of the New-York Annual Register, and a classical dictionary, followed by Scriptural names accented, a chronological analysis of general history, a dictionary of law terms, proverbs of all nations, &c. &c. All the departments are committed to the care of competent persons. The whole will be furnished for two dollars, in an elegant form. Two brief extracts from the gazetteer will be found on our last page—the one, Galena, a new town, never before described, we believe, in a geographical work, the other, Sunderland, where the Indian cholera recently broke out in England.

"Williams's New-York Annual Register" is to be continued for 1832. It will be offered by subscription at the price of one dollar and fifty cents, and we hope will be sustained by a liberal sale.

Carey and Lea will immediately issue Sir Walter Scott's new novel, "Count Robert, of Paris." It constitutes the last series of "Tales of My Landlord."

Mr. Doyle has nearly ready for publication, "Cobbett's English and French Grammar;" "A collection of four thousand songs;" "The Douay Bible, the authorized version of the catholic church;" "Catholic Piety;" and "The End of Religious controversy."

The following works are preparing for publication in Philadelphia: "Two biographies of the late Stephen Girard;" "Wood on Rail-roads, with plates;" "Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine;" "Donegan's Greek and English Lexicon, abridged for the use of schools;" "History of the progress of Ethical Philosophy, by Sir James Mackintosh;" "System of Physiology, by R. Dunglison;" "Bourrienne's Memoirs of Napoleon, new edition, with great additions, complete in one volume;" "American Ornithology, by Charles Lucien Bonaparte;" "Works of Johanna Baillie;" "Elements of Mechanics, by John Renwick, Esq. Professor of Natural Philosophy in Columbia College, New-York."

THE FINE ARTS.

ORATORIO OF THE MESSIAH AT ST. PAUL'S.

THIS wonderful production will be repeated on Tuesday evening next by the New-York Sacred Music Society, an institution already greatly distinguished for the surprising improvement of its own members, and for the beneficial influence which it has exerted upon the public taste. Its exhibitions always comprise the best talent to be procured in the country, and are conducted with a spirit and care meriting the strongest praise. The attraction of the approaching performance will be enhanced by the powers of Mrs. Austin and Madame Brichta, among the female vocalists, and Messrs. Jones, Kyle, and Pearson among the male. It will also comprehend Mr. Hill, conductor, W. Taylor, leader, Cole, vocal leader, Norton, trumpet, and Blondel, organist. We regard the efforts of this society as intimately connected with the cultivation of a correct taste for sacred music, and as peculiarly interesting to a large class unaccustomed to enjoy the fine operas brought forward at the Park theatre. It is a department of the art at once so noble and pleasing in itself as perhaps to transcend every other, and the serious grandeur and sublimity which are its chief characteristics, are so appropriate in religious worship that we need scarcely press its importance upon a community where pious congregations so frequently assemble, where churches are so numerous, and an organ considered by so many as an indispensable requisite. These considerations, aided by the genius of Handel and the brilliant talents of many of the performers will, no doubt, engage the attendance of a large auditory.

CONCERT OF THE MESSRS. HERRMAN AND CO.

These gentlemen have delighted the lovers of music with two exhibitions, both of which have been attended by large assemblies of beauty and fashion. Among the pieces executed were several by Mozart, Rossini, Auber, and Weber. We have seldom witnessed in an audience more lively signs of surprise and gratification than those excited on the present occasion. Their performances are almost entirely vocal, the only instrument on the stage being a piano-forte and one violincello, which they seldom put in requisition. We are told that entertainments of the same description are not uncommon in Europe. We have certainly never heard any thing of the kind here. And although critical predictions on these subjects are not always verified, we will venture, on this occasion, to prophecy that if they continue any length of time in the city, (which seems to be a matter of some doubt) they will receive brilliant tokens of public admiration, which it has been the lot of few to secure. The astonishing base voice of Mr. Heartl quite deserved the encomium passed upon it by an auditor, unlearned in the art. "It is tremendous," said one; "it is better than Angrisani. It goes down to the lower C." "To C;" ejaculated the other, "nonsense! it goes to Z!"

On Monday evening, on which they gave their second concert, we found difficulty even at an early hour in gaining entrance, but our exertions, and also the necessity of remaining for several hours in a standing position, which we endured in common with a great number of others, were amply compensated by the performances of these really admirable artists. "The Chapel," (four voices) was repeated with great applause, and during the execution of the "Laughing Trio," a serious face among the audience was a thing not to be seen.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

THE opera of Masaniello appears to be growing into favor with the public, and has latterly been performed to full houses. Its magnificent music, from the novelty of its style, requires to be heard more than once to be properly appreciated. By practice the actors have become more perfect in their respective characters, and the concerted music of the piece is executed with a precision and effect really admirable. We only require Mrs. Austin in the part of Elvira, and some competent person in that of Alphonso, to render Masaniello as great a favorite with the public as Cinderella. Jones, who has succeeded Sinclair in the principal character, has exceeded all our anticipations. His acting is quite effective, and he sings the music allotted to him with a sweetness, taste, and pathos, which justly rank him as an artist of the first order. It is impossible that any thing can be so splendidly executed than the song "I have sworn;" its effect is electric, and invariably calls forth an universal encore. We confess ourselves warm admirers of Mr. Jones, because we have in that gentleman an evidence what genius and talent are capable of effecting. Depending upon those qualities alone, he came amongst us a stranger, unaided by friends, and unsupported by the press. Through the prejudice of the managers, to whose theatre he was originally assigned, he was scarcely permitted to emerge from obscurity, until the Boston public, who had judgment enough to estimate true merit, and liberality sufficient to foster it, brought him forward, and gave him the rank he now holds in his profession. The unpretending demeanor, and the modesty with which he has received the applause of the New-York audience, have won for him a general and high estimation. He has become an established favorite.

We owe it to the cheerful exertions of Mrs. Vernon, in Masaniello, as well as in every other piece in which she bears a part, to say that her efforts at the Park could not be dispensed with. If she is not brilliant, she is always correct, and with much versatility of talent appears to equal advantage, and with great effect, in characters of the most opposite description. While she enters into an accurate and spirited conception of the whole part, she has an admirable facility in making the most of a trifle, and an incident which many others would overlook entirely, in her hands is brought out strongly, and tells with force. The reader will recollect, as examples, her air when the mock prince in Cinderella greets her with a salute, and her admirable personation in "No song—no supper." In Masaniello she has but an inefficient part, which her talent and animation render a prominent feature in the opera.

A new comedy, called the "Discarded Daughter," has been produced at the Richmond-hill theatre. It is by a gentleman of this city, and is much praised. Mrs. Duff and Mr. Wilson attract good houses. The lady is an actress who, if she has an equal, is certainly without a superior on the American stage. Her representations are full of the most touching pathos and tenderness. Her own powers should be sufficient to fill the theatre.

We have sometimes been censured for the severity of our remarks upon the stage. In looking over the pages of the "London Harmonicon," the other day, we met with the following heavy broadside discharged against an unfortunate Madame Vespermann, which, in the paucity of theatrical intelligence, may cause a smile in the reader. As for us, we should not sleep at night if we had so handled any of the fair daughters of Eve.

"Some short time ago, there lived a Madame Vespermann, who, by the Germans, was esteemed a very good singer. She, like many other good things, was more distinguished by merit than longevity, and died while her bloom was yet on the increase. Her afflicted husband, anxious again to enjoy that connubial bliss of which he so unexpectedly found himself bereft, speedily paid the handsomest compliment in his power to the married state, and wedded another lady. The lady of this second choice is the very Madame Vespermann who now offers herself as a candidate for the favor of the British public. But as there were two Alexanders, so there are two Mesdames Vespermann, and the conqueror and the copper-smith were not more unlike, according to all accounts, than the late and the present Madame Vespermann.

"A cold is a bad thing always, and a good excuse sometimes: so Madame Vespermann, under the shelter of such a malady, was withdrawn till Tuesday evening, when she reappeared, in the part of Zoraide, without any deprecatory apology. From that time, therefore, critics have been in full possession of the right to exercise their functions, without the danger of being charged with precipitation or indelicacy.

"Madame Vespermann is in voice high—in stature low, and in both, particularly the former, grievously thin. If she decorated her person as much as her music, the burden would be too great for her to sustain, and the ornaments in the one case would be as generally mistaken for caricature, as they are in the other for burlesque. Her requisites, as an actress, are about on a level with her vocal qualifications; and, in short, her second appearance, without any cold, nay, without even an apology, confirmed the suspicions which her début excited; we may therefore, fearless of the charge of rashness, venture to foretell, that very little more will be heard of Madame Vespermann."

A new tragedy, entitled "Conrad of Naples," has been produced at Philadelphia, with much success. The prologue, from the pen of Robert Morris, Esq., editor of the Philadelphia Inquirer, is written with spirit and talent. Only want of space prevents us from copying it into our columns.

LETTERS FROM THE ABSENT EDITOR.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER THREE.

HAVRE.

THIS is one of those places which scribbling travellers hurry through with a crisp mention of their arrival and departure, but as I have passed a day here upon custom-house compulsion, and passed it pleasantly too, and as I have an evening entirely to myself, and a good fire, why I will order another pound of wood, (they sell it like a drug here,) and Monsieur and Mademoiselle Somebody, "violin players right from the hands of Paganini, only fifteen years of age, and miracles of music," (so says the placard,) may delight other lovers of precocious talent than I. Pen, ink, and paper, for number two!

If I had not been warned against being astonished short of Paris, I should have thought Havre quite an affair. I certainly have seen more that is novel and amusing since morning than I ever saw before in any seven days of my life. Not a face, not a building, not a dress, not a child even, not a stone in the street, nor shop, nor woman, nor beast of burden, looks in any comparable degree like its namesake the other side of the water.

It was very provoking to eat a salt supper and go to bed in that tiresome berth again last night, with a French hotel in full view, and no permission to send for a fresh biscuit even, or a cup of milk. It was nine o'clock when we reached the pier, and at that late hour there was, of course, no officer to be had for permission to land; and there paced the patrol, with his high black cap and red pom-pom, up and down the quay, within six feet of our taffel, and a shot from his arquebuss would have been the consequence of any unlicensed communication with the shore. It was something, however, to sleep without rocking; and after a fit of musing anticipation, which kept me conscious of the sentinel's measured tread till midnight, the "gentle goddess" sealed up my cares effectually, and I awoke at sunrise—in France!

It is a common thing enough to go abroad, and it may seem idle and common-place to be enthusiastic about it; but nothing is common, or a trifle, to me, that can send the blood so warm to my heart, and the color to my temples as generously, as did my first conscious thought when I awoke this morning. In France! I would not have had it a dream for the price of an empire!

Early in the morning a woman came clattering into the cabin with wooden shoes, and a patois of mingled French and English—a *blanchisseuse—spattered to the knees with mud, but with a cap and kerchief that would have made the fortune of a New-York milliner. Ciel! what politeness! and what white teeth! and what a knowing row of papillotes, laid in precise parallel, on her clear brunette temples.

"Quelle nouvelle?"† said the captain.

"Poland est a bas!"‡ was the answer, with a look of heroic sorrow, that would have become a tragedy queen, mourning for the loss of a throne. The French manner, for once, did not appear exaggerated. It was news to sadden us all. Pity! pity! that the broad christian world could look on and see this glorious people trampled to the dust in one of the most noble and desperate struggles for liberty that the earth ever saw! What an opportunity was here lost to France for setting a seal of double truth and splendor on her own newly achieved triumph over despotism. The washerwoman broke the silence with "Any clothes to wash, Monsieur?" and in the instant return of my thoughts to my own comparatively pitiful interests, I found the philosophy for all I had condemned in kings—the humiliating and selfish individuality of human nature. And yet I believe with Dr. Channing on that dogma!

At ten o'clock I had performed the traveller's routine—had submitted my trunk and my passport to the three authorities, and had got into (and out of) as many mounting passions at what seemed to me the intolerable impertinences of searching my linen, and inspecting my person for scars. I had paid the porter three times his due rather than endure his cataract of French expostulation; and with a bunch of keys, and a landlady attached to it, had ascended by a cold, wet, marble staircase, to a parlor and bed-room on the fifth floor; as pretty a place, when you get there, and as difficult to get to as if it were a palace in thin air. It is perfectly French! Fine, old, last century chairs, covered with splendid yellow damask, two sofas of the same, the legs or arms of every one imperfect; a coarse wood dressing-table, covered with fringed drapery and a sort of throne pincushion, with an immense glass leaning over it, gilded probably in the time of Henri Quatre; artificial flowers all round the room, and prints of Atala and Napoleon mourant over the walls; windows opening to the floor on hinges, damask and muslin curtains inside, and boxes for flower-pots without; a bell-wire that pulls no bell, a bellows too asthmatic even to wheeze, tongs that refuse to meet, and a carpet as large as a table-cloth in the centre of the floor, may answer for an inventory of the "parlor." The bedchamber, about half as large as the boxes in Rattle-row at Saratoga, opens by folding-doors, and discloses a bed, that for tricky ornament as well as size might look the bridal couch for a fairy queen in a panorama; the same golden-sprig-damask looped over it, tent-fashion, with splendid crimson cord, tassels, fringes, &c. and a pillow beneath, that I shall be afraid to sleep on, it is so dainty a piece of needlework. There is a delusion about it, positively. One cannot help imagining that all this splendor means something, and it would require a worse evil than any of these little deficiencies of comfort to disturb the self-complacent, Captain-Jackson's sort of feeling, with which one throws his cloak on one sofa and his hat on the other, and spreads himself out for a lounge before this mere apology of a French fire.

But for eating and drinking! if they cook better in Paris, I shall have my passport altered. The next prefet that signs it shall substitute gourmand for editeur. I will profess a palate, and live to eat. Making every allowance for an appetite newly from sea, my experience hitherto in this department of science is transcended in the degree of a rushlight to Arcturus.

I strolled about Havre from breakfast till dinner, seven or eight hours, following curiosity at random, up one street and down another, with a prying avidity which I fear travel will wear fast away. I must compress my observations into a sentence or two, for my fire is out, and this old castle of a hotel lets in the wind "shrewdly cold," and, besides, the diligence calls for me in a few hours, and one must sleep.

Among my impressions the most vivid are—that of the twenty thousand inhabitants of Havre, by far the greater portion are women and soldiers—that the buildings all look toppling, and insecurely antique and unsightly—that the privates of the regular army are the most stupid, and those of the national guard the most intelligent-looking troops I ever saw—that the streets are filthy beyond endurance, and the shops clean beyond all praise—that the women do all the buying and selling, and cart-driving, and awesoping, and even shoe-making and other sedentary craftwork, and at the same time have (the meanest of them) an air of ambitious elegance and neatness, that sends your hand to your hat involuntarily when you speak to them—that the children speak French, and look like little old men and women, and the horses (the famed Norman breed) are the best of draught animals, and the worst for speed in the world; and that for extremes ridiculously near, dirt and neatness, politeness and knavery, chivalry and petitesse, of learning and language, the people I have seen to-day must be pre-eminently remarkable, or France, for a laughing philosopher, is a paradise indeed! And now for my pillow, till the diligence calls. Good night.

LETTERS FROM WASHINGTON.

Intercepted for the New-York Mirror.

NUMBER TWO.

Washington, Tuesday, January 10th, 1832.

I stood this morning on the capitol, as the members lazily picked their way along Pennsylvania Avenue, and looked for some minutes on the prospect before me. Softened and partially obscured by a light haze, the picture, even in winter, is not without its beauties. High grounds in the distance form a vast amphitheatre; on your left winds the broad Potomac; and beneath the city, from the height and distance appearing more compactly built than it actually is, presents a respectable appearance, though neither vast nor splendid. When the trees are in full foliage, the plain clothed in green, the river unlocked, with here and there a white sail swelling in the breeze, and the whole lighted by the sinking glories of an autumnal sun with its rich canopy of clouds, I can easily imagine the scene to be one upon which a poet or a painter may gaze with enthusiasm, and which even a plain man like myself may acknowledge fair and goodly.

But, at the best, Washington, as a city, is but an unworthy monument to him whose name it bears. The plan, a large metropolis—the result, a little straggling town; wide streets and mean houses. You are everywhere struck with the mixture of grandeur and meanness—the lamentable disparity between the design and the execution. The worst of it is, there is little hope of improvement—the place has no business, no commerce; it is supported solely by government; and that a democratic, economical, penny-saving government.

So let it be. I will not deny that I could wish many things otherwise; but my pride, as an American, is too deeply seated to be affected by petty mortifications. We want the splendors of an empire; the palaces, the lofty monuments, the paintings, the statues, the trophies won from conquered nations; these we have not; but we have what is far more valuable. When the Roman matron was asked for her jewels, she pointed to her children. The glory of our republic is her millions of happy people. I would not give the common schools of my native state for all the art that adorns fallen Italy.

When a Frenchman under the old regime was told of the liberties of an Englishman; that even the king could not touch the property of his meanest subject; he shrugged his shoulders in wonder and contempt. He pitied such a king; he pitied such a people.

In very much the same spirit, such men as Basil Hall, when they deign to visit our country, conduct their inquiries and form their conclusions. Our judges are without wigs, and our lawyers without gowns; they whose arms have wielded the axe that has felled forests, are deemed suitable persons to make laws; the men smoke or chew tobacco; the women don't flirt; and every ragamuffin in the land may vote for whom he pleases, and turn up his nose at a member of congress. And these people are proud of their country! And these people think they are happy! It is more than he can comprehend! What though the laws are equal and intelligible, and the judges without wigs, learned and impartial? As to this he cannot speak. Nor has it occurred to him to inquire whether wives love their husbands, and children obey their parents; whether the churches are filled, the clergy esteemed, God worshiped, and the laws respected.

* Captain Hall makes this a subject of serious complaint. He says, "he does not think he witnessed a flirtation while he was in America." † "Is this true?" But is it quite true, my fair countenance? I don't know; but I have an impression upon my mind of having once been confoundedly jilted.

But there is one fact—since I have mentioned Captain Basil Hall—there is one circumstance stated in his book which speaks volumes. To do him justice, I believe its insertion an oversight; (I would not injure him with his publisher) for he presents it with the greatest bonhomie in the world, by way of complaint. It is this: "The Americans," he says, "have a detestable habit of praising their country, with vast want of tact, in the presence of foreigners, and of appealing to them continually for their opinion. And this is not general merely, but extends to every thing, to all their institutions; their government, and every part of it." Now this was an annoyance to the captain; because, though it was his practice to tell them the plain truth, yet it was unpleasant to say disagreeable things to people who were so very polite. Such, however, was the fact. From one end of the land to the other, in all places, in all societies was heard this universal voice of self-adulation; he was perfectly astonished at the blindness with which they loved and admired their country and every thing connected with it. (I don't pretend to quote exactly, but this is the substance of the captain's remarks.) Well, now, (as you say) captain, this must have been very annoying; but don't you think, considering how perfectly agreed they seem upon this point, that there may be something in it? And that they are actually—though very absurdly—a happy people? If it had been otherwise, would you not have heard here and there a murmur of discontent? Would there not have been some indication by which you could have discovered the truth, however artfully concealed? To illustrate—you recollect when you were in Canada there was a little grumbling and fault-finding; they thought Great Britain ought to do some things that she did not, and ought not to do some things that she did; and party spirit ran high; and they were rather tumultuous and disorderly; and at a dinner-table, one day, you told them they were great fools; that independence was good for nothing; that you had just come from the United States; that a husband was not happy unless he was hen-pecked; and, to conclude, that they themselves were actually the happiest people in the world. And they did not seem to take at first; but when you had finished your speech they all laughed. You see, these Canadians, who are the happiest people in the world, (more particularly because they are not plagued by being obliged to govern themselves) do yet occasionally show some symptoms of not being perfectly satisfied! But in the United States you saw nothing of this! I fancy now, that if I should land on the shores of Ireland, or even of "merry England," I should meet with something similar to what you experienced in Canada. There have been rumors here that castles have been pulled down, the clergy irreverently spoken of, and certain members of parliament treated with indecorum. Don't you think, captain, that if somewhat of this American foible of lauding their government and institutions could be communicated to your countrymen, it might have, in some respects, a happy influence? The lords possibly might sleep more comfortably in their country-seats, and your favorite bishops wear their mitres with more dignity. But I suggest this with great deference.

But the captain is right—it was not for him to go farther and draw inferences which might affect the sale of his book—the captain is right, nevertheless, and I will uphold him—fas est ab hoste doceri; isn't there some such Latin? Americans have this habit, and it is a vile habit. A reviewer, in the North American, argues very ingeniously through five or six pages that the captain is incorrect; it is the truest thing in his book. I have been present fifty times when I have heard a fellow, whose opinion I would not take on a brass button—though perhaps worth more on that subject than on any other—appealed to for his opinion of us and of our country. How did he like the country? What did he think of us? Oh, my countrymen, and oh my countrywomen, I wish I could teach you a deeper confidence, a more quiet satisfaction, a national pride which would lift you as much above the opinions of all other nations as in all that is most valuable you are in fact superior to them. Care not for these people—care not what they think or what they say. Be neither disturbed by their censure nor elevated by their praise.

I love a little touch of patriotism in a woman. But there it is—the women. Republican simplicity has seldom charms for them; in their secret souls there is (is there not?) a love for pomp, for titles, for dress. They sigh, at times, for the splendors of a court. A count, a duke overawes them. This it is that in spite of themselves makes them regard as superiors those who come from countries where such things are, and are common; that makes them ashamed, now and then, of their own democratic country.

Oh for a little of the old Roman pride that looked down so superbly upon the nations of the earth! Barbarians! A Roman matron, a Roman virgin were titles above queen and empress.

For myself, if I ever love a woman (as I hope I shall) she must love her country—she must more than love it; she must be proud of it; she must prefer it to every other.

WEDNESDAY 11th.—This morning I heard Mr. Clay. The subject was the tariff; the occasion, a resolution introduced by himself, a day or two before, declaring the expediency of taking off the duties from all articles unprotected, (except wines and silks) and instructing the finance committee to report a bill to that effect.

No little interest had been felt to hear Mr. Clay once more in a legislative hall, and especially to hear him on this topic. When he rose, the senate chamber, gallery and lobby, was crowded to excess. The lobby, on the floor of the senate, is accessible only to persons introduced by senators. Here comes not the profanum vulgus; and partly for this reason, I presume, it is generally preferred by the ladies. On the present occasion they filled not only the lobby, but kept encroaching until they formed a complete circle, extending in front of the president's chair, and literally encompassing the reverend signors on every side. Some senators were even dispossessed of their seats. You may imagine what a ridiculous effect this produced; the gray heads peeping forth here and there amid the rustling silks and waving plumes. But soon your attention would have been so enchained that you would not have noticed this incongruity.

In manner, I think Mr. Clay the best speaker I ever heard. I have heard men more fluent—happier in their language—but I never yet have heard a man who, by mere manner, communicated more force to what he said. And it is difficult to say to what this is owing. He has no marked peculiarities like most great orators—no mannerism. Earnest, simple, with no false vehemence, saying apparently rather less than more than he feels, you never doubt that you are listening to a man who is impressed with a conviction of the truth of what he utters. His voice is clear, distinct, thrilling when raised, and in its low tones sweet and persuasive.

While Mr. Clay spoke, the vice-president turned round his chair so as directly to face him. They were but a few yards apart—their known variance of opinion on the vital subject under discussion gave to this somewhat of a dramatic effect, which was enhanced when Mr. Clay said with great emphasis, "Sir, upon one point I agree with you perfectly; it is that this question ought now, at this time, to be definitely settled." And this I believe was the only point upon which they did agree.

You will, of course, see the speech in the papers.

INTRODUCTION.

DEAR and courteous reader,—if it were my intention to accompany you throughout this eventful history, I would give you a faithful portrait of myself, my habits and manners, for then if you resolved to travel with me, and if you found my company disagreeable, you would have no person to complain of but yourself. But as my nephew is to be your guide through the labyrinth of this folio, I shall hasten my departure, and withdraw myself from public gaze, for no vanity has thrust me before you, but a sense of duty towards my venerable deceased friend, Doctor Josiah Knyphausen, and I now acquit myself of the pledge I gave him on his death-bed. Endearing was our intercourse through a long life, and hallowed has its memory been.

In the summer of 1811, my beloved friend closed his eyes for ever, dying as he had lived, a Christian and a philosopher. Age had been wasting him away for many years, until the candle which had burned so brightly and so long, sunk extinguished into its socket. One fine day, about noon, I received a message from him by his black servant Achilles, or, as he was called, by way of abbreviation, Shilly, informing me that he was very desirous of seeing me. I immediately ordered my gig, and was soon on my way to the dwelling of my friend, attended by Achilles, who was mounted on one of his master's steeds. As he was a very respectable negro, I directed him to ride alongside of my carriage, that I might converse with him by the way. He had been the faithful follower of his master in all his wanderings, even from boyhood to senility, and had imbibed from the doctor all his perseverance in research, all his patience, and all his mildness. His hair, or wool, as some naturalists plausibly maintain it is, was grizzled, and presented a pepper-and-salt-like appearance, or that mixture which is called iron gray. His face, even I, though partial to the black, cannot denominate intellectual. It possessed the usual quantity of nasal and labial appendages, and the usual whiteness of the teeth which distinguish those who wear "the livery of the devil," as my friend, Captain Goodheart, of the second continentals, used to designate a black skin. But Shilly had a good heart, and a deferential behaviour towards all whom Dr. Knyphausen in any manner esteemed, and I therefore invited him to ride near me.

"Is your master worse, Shilly?" said I.

"Oh, much a worse, and he talk all a while about old times on Allegany mountains, and say he go again to-morrow; but I 'spec massa nebbor go again: old Carlo howl all las' night roun de house jus as if he old heart break, and when old dog do so, somebody die soon."

"Dogs often howl in the night, Shilly," said I; "it is not a sign of death always."

"Massa say so," replied Achilles—"massa know all about such things; and old Carlo he come to me an' he lay down at my feet, and he gib one cry just like child, and look up in my face so sorry, that old nigger nearly cry: so I pat him on he head, and say 'old doggy, massa goin' to die soon,' and den he howl again, and go and scratch at massa's door, and lay down under he bed, and he wont come away. And massa say, 'Shilly, when I die, take care of old Carlo; massa must die afore new moon.'—Here Achilles shook his head very mysteriously, repeating, at intervals, "massa must die afore new moon."

Reader, pardon my "narrative old age;" Achilles was the servant of my friend. I concluded that Knyphausen was drawing near his end, because his mind had begun to wander to the earlier part of his life, and, as Achilles informed me, he was perfectly incoherent, save at intervals, on all other subjects. As we approached his house, which was situated on a small stream which empties into the Hudson, on the west side, a more than usual stillness seemed to pervade the place. The shutters of the lower part were closed; the farming and gardening utensils were gathered in a heap in the barn-yard; not a solitary person could be discovered around the dwelling, and even the dumb animals, missing the kindly offices of men, seemed to participate in the general gloom. Having given my horse in charge to Achilles, I immediately directed my steps to the room of my friend. When I entered he was in an uneasy slumber, and I silently took my seat near the chair of his old housekeeper, who was sitting in a corner, resting her elbow in the palm of one hand, while with the other she supported her chin. She was, like myself, stricken in years, and the thought of losing her long-tried friend and benefactor, had rendered her very sad. Mrs. Gray had been left a widow at the age of thirty, and death had, since that period, taken from her her only child. She had since found an honest refuge from poverty in the house of Dr. Knyphausen, where her superintendence was of the most material necessity. Her respect for the doctor had become habitual, instead of having been destroyed by their long and intimate acquaintance. I have heard it said that she had, what is vulgarly called, a "sneaking kindness" for the doctor, he having been one of her favorites prior to her marriage; but he had always been so devoted to his mistress—science, that I believe he was never (except in one instance) found in the least wavering. Her form was erect, and her frame delicate; and although the bloom had left her cheek, and her forehead was wrinkled, some traces of beauty were still discernible in her dark eyes and well-formed features. I recollect her when she was the belle of the village, and that I have always lived a bachelor, is, perhaps, owing to Patty Allison: age, of course, has cured me of my folly, but I always considered and esteemed Mrs. Gray as a favorite. She was, in youth, of a gay and lively disposition, which time and old age converted into loquacity, and in her company I have spent many a sociable evening, at the house of my friend. When I entered the room she raised her head, and her sad look confirmed all my fears. He was, as I have said, in a light slumber, but at intervals his respiration was so difficult that I feared he was expiring. In the mean time I conversed, in whispers, with Mrs. Gray, who informed me that he had gradually, but perceptibly, grown weaker since the morning, and had repeatedly expressed a desire to see me. He had talked through the day, at intervals, but incoherently, about his travels and researches many years ago, but seemed to have no consciousness of circumstances which had transpired but the day before. Scarcely had Patty, (I should say Mrs. Gray) informed me of these particulars, when the doctor awoke. His eye wandered with a vacant gaze around the room, until it rested on my countenance, which seemed like an old landmark of the mind to point out the division between things past and present, for his eye immediately lit up with a portion of its former intelligence, and showed that he was not indulging in the reveries of memory, but took a sensible interest in passing events. He desired me to be seated at the head of the bed, motioned Mrs. Gray to leave the room, and raising himself partially on his couch, he said, "I have not long to live; my will, you know, is drawn, and I have set my house in order. Yonder box contains the diary which I kept during all my wanderings, with a short memoir of my life to be prefixed to the work. He then gave me his instructions in respect to the intended publication. "It was not right," he continued, "to publish that while I lived, because it had appeared vanity, but it were sinful to conceal my knowledge from the world after my death. To you I commit the task of its preparation. Send a copy to Yale College, my alma-mater, and—" here he fell back exhausted. His breath came short and thick, as if his spirits were flurried at the approach of death, but it was but the pertinacity of nature, which resists disease, and even death, to the last; for a man pure of intentions, and single in purpose, as my friend, could have felt no fear in leaving this world of woe to go and join the holy band of the "spirits of just men made perfect." I then called Mrs. Gray into the room, as I was persuaded from his pulse that he was near his end. Achilles also came, introducing a brother servant, and the female cook with him. Carlo, noticing a disturbance, came also from his place of rest, and raising his fore-feet on the foot of the bed, gazed wistfully at his master. We conversed in that subdued tone which the approach of death always induces, and if any moved it was with a stealthy pace, lest the passing spirit should be disturbed. Mrs. Gray sank into the seat which I had occupied, covering her face with her hands, which rested on the bed. Achilles gazed on his dying master with an unmoved expression of sorrow, and the other domestics with a feeling of fear and wonder, while I stood by the bedside, holding my friend's stiffening hand in my own. When I felt his grasp contracted in the extremities of life, and saw that he was conscious of my presence, I realized the strength of the expression "to smooth down the pillow of death." His pulse gradually stopped, his breathing ceased, and the relaxing of the lower jaw told me that all was over. Carlo, howling, left the room, followed by Achilles, whose cheeks were wet with tears. Mrs. Gray raised her eyes to his stiffened countenance, burst into tears, and again burying her face in her hands, exclaimed, "He is gone, sir, he is gone for ever." "Better take off he spectacles and put on a clean night-cap," whispered the black, who had remained, to the female domestic; "get new night-cap; massa so thin, old one no fit him now. Massa no more, Dinah."

There was something in those last words "no more" that went to my soul. I realized at their sound the bitterness of separation, and that agony which tongue cannot utter. What now would avail to me his instructive learning, his familiar conversation, his pure affection? I should never enjoy them more. The friend nearest and dearest to me was gone. "An unit had been struck from the sum of life," and millions yet remained, but to me that unit was all; without it I was a mere cipher. I had barely consciousness enough to perform the last sad office, to straighten his limbs, and to close his eyes; and as I pressed his cold hand for the last time, I exclaimed, "Farewell, farewell, my friend. Though there be many nobler and greater than thou—though I have many friends, nay, kinsmen left, there are none, no not one, can recompense me for thy loss, thou brother of my heart!"

On the afternoon of the next day, the remains of my esteemed friend were committed to the earth, and I have caused a simple monument to be erected over the spot, with an inscription by myself, which having been generally admired, modesty forbids me to insert. By his will he bequeathed his library and cabinet to me, and also recommended to my protection Achilles, to whom he had given his freedom. Mrs. Gray is employed in her accustomed capacity in my house, I having had occasion shortly after my friend's decease to dismiss my housekeeper, who had lived with me eight or ten years preceding that event.

The care of arranging, preparing and copying the works of my friend has been intrusted to a suitable scientific gentleman, and that of his memoirs to my nephew, who, although he be disposed to turn all other things into levity and ridicule, will, I am sure, faithfully fulfil this trust.

Instead of publishing the doctor's autobiography and diary as the doctor left them, by his persuasion I have consented to allow him to throw them together in the form of a connected narrative, but have enjoined him in no wise to alter the meaning of a single sentence, or to make a single omission, only adding whatsoever its form may require.

SPECIMEN OF THE MORAL SUBLIME.

When at the close of the American revolution the "last armed foes" were retiring from our shores, some exultation might have been reasonably indulged by the soldiers, who had brought the doubtful and long-contested conflict to such a favorable issue. For eight years they had waged a sanguinary war with a powerful and determined foe! they had voluntarily debarred themselves of the pleasures of their firesides, and all the enjoyments which make life happy; they had combated the oppressors of their country at all times, and in all places, in the cold of winter and in the heat of summer, in the frozen hills of the north, and amid the sun-scorched wildernesses of the south. And now they fancied all their trials and perils were over—their troubles were ended, their miseries ceased, and with such belief angels could not have blamed the pride which swelled their bosoms. For what, though, had they combated so fiercely and so long? Did they follow in the train of a victorious prince who gave them kingdoms for their plunder? Alas! there was no land for their spoils but their own trampled, oppressed, and wronged country. Did they march beneath the banners of a beloved king to avenge his insults or protect his honor? No! for their monarch, who should have cherished and shielded them, had trampled their rights, and beneath his oppression their once loyal bosoms had been "parched, wearied, wrung, and riven." What then: did they succeed when a despot led the unwilling vassals of a despot's will? No! or if so, it was as the willing followers of the despot liberty, who ruled their bosoms with almost iron away, for she had torn them from wives and children, kinsmen and friends. Yes, it was the indomitable spirit of liberty which had filled their hearts with giant strength—that spirit which, though it slumbers, never dies, and which, like Samson, will sooner or later arouse from its sleep and snap asunder the cords which treachery and oppression have twined round her. These soldiers could well have exclaimed,

"Thy spirit, independence, let me share,
Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye;
Thy steps I follow with my bosom bare,
Nor heed the storm that howls along the sky."

Yes, it was often with bosom bare that they pursued their long-lost liberty. Often were the soldiers of the revolution constrained to march with naked limbs over fields of snow, to lie down without covering, and again, cold, wet, and hungry, to resume their march. In the ever-memorable retreat through New-Jersey, and during the encampment at Valley Forge, what miseries did they not suffer? But they suffered in silence—they suffered like men—and when their agony of misery was extreme, their lips were unopened in complaint. The story of their misery and forbearance is without a parallel. They fought for their country, and they fondly believed that country would remember them in their old age, and their children after them. In this patriotic, this generous confidence, many who had noble fortunes expended them in the common cause: but alas! how have their hopes and expectations been met and answered save the rich legacies of their father's virtues, their children have nought. But wonderful as was their forbearance, there is one point which concentrates in itself more honor than all their preceding actions together. I refer to that period when their victorious arms were still in their grasp, and congress denied the small pittance of their mighty labors, and would have disbanded and dispersed them penniless, powerless, and succorless to their homes. In that critical hour there were not wanting men, ay, influential and eloquent men, men who participated in their disasters and triumph, to inflame their wounded spirit, and incite them to vengeance. The only armed force in the country, the victors in a contest with Europe's best soldiers, a stinging sense of injury rankling in the heart, and a kingdom spread before their eyes, what was to hinder them from seizing, at the point of the sword, their rights, and setting up one to rule them who would richly reward them for their sacrifices. Congress was a weak, powerless body, without a cent in the treasury, or the least credit in the nation; a handful of troops could have dispersed them for ever, and they would be the sole arbiters of a nation, which, though then prostrate, gave signs of great promise.

Disabled, wounded, maimed, and scarred, they were to be dismissed, to seek their former homes—those homes which had been burned, destroyed, or converted to others' uses. There was but one alternative—whether to seize the rich prize, to appropriate to their own use the riches of the country, to clothe themselves in purple, to obtain splendid palaces for their habitation in old age, and as a patrimony for their children, or to retire to their pillaged dwellings without the use of limbs with which to gain a livelihood, to embrace poverty and misery, and to transmit them to their children—it was either to roll in splendor, riches, and luxury, or to lie down in want and contempt, and die in neglect and obscurity. And what did these gallant soldiers choose? Flushed with success, they felt the unjust denial of their claims poignantly, and they knew the riches and comforts which awaited them on one hand; but strength was given to their spirits to sweep "adown the gulf of time," and they saw on the other hand dimly in its dark bosom a huge nation, rising up to bless them and to do them honor. They saw treasured up an immense reward in their grateful recollections; and they dashed the proffered cup of rich pollution from their lips, and at the calm address of their beloved chief they disbanded without hesitation, retiring from the ranks maimed and poverty-stricken, but unhurt in their integrity, and rich in the honest pride of patriots. Such was the last noble act of the soldiers of our revolution; thus they added a crown of glory to their princely virtues, and presented a spectacle of moral grandeur unequalled in the aggregate, and only rivalled individually. Thus they added the last stone to the pyramid of their fame, over which in future ages the sweet flowers of memory and gratitude shall blossom sweetly and for ever.

HISTORY OF THE IRON MASK.

The history of the unfortunate being, who is known under this name to a world he was not permitted to see or know himself, must always remain a mystery. The only historical secret which has been equally sacred is that of the authorship of Junius; nor are even his lasting monuments of political rancor covered with half the darkness which broods over the name and fortunes of the solitary captive of the Bastille. We have learnt nothing new respecting him: we can, indeed, express openly the wonder, the pity, and the horror which his contemporaries hardly dared to breathe to their own thoughts, but we are no nearer a discovery than they.

Our attention has been turned to this subject by a paragraph which lately went the rounds of our papers, purporting to be an extract from the unpublished Memoirs of Cardinal Dubois. This relates an interview between Louis the fourteenth and the duke of Orleans, in which the king revealed the secret, and stated the man with the iron mask to have been Fouquet, the disgraced minister of finance. The names of Louis of Orleans and his minister may, perhaps be taken for prima facie evidence; but there is contrary testimony which proves this passage to be false, as the whole work whence it is taken is probably a fabrication. It is the late publication and extensive currency of a report so groundless that leads us to throw together a few remarks rather of others than our own; and show what is known, and what further may reasonably be conjectured.

Voltaire was the first who gave the fact a place in history, and he has, according to custom, colored and embellished it to the obscuring of the true simple outline. He relates, that some months after Mazarin's death, a prisoner, young, tall, and of pleasing figure, was sent, in the strictest secrecy, to an island on the coast of Provence. His face was always covered with a mask, so fitted with steel springs that he could eat without removing it. In 1690, St. Mars, the governor of the fortress, having been appointed governor of the Bastille, the prisoner was removed there. The minister, Louvois, went to the island on purpose to see him, spoke to him standing, and treated him with respectful attention. He was allowed every indulgence consistent with the strictness, or rather absolute secrecy of his confinement. He was passionately fond of lace and fine linen, and this taste was amply gratified. One day, it is said, he scratched some words with a knife on a silver plate, and threw it from his window into the moat of the castle. It was picked up by a poor fisherman and carried to the governor, who questioned the man closely as to whether he could read, and dismissed him with the remark that he was very lucky in his ignorance. In the Bastille he was treated with the same respect, and watched with the same strictness. The governor seldom sat down in his presence, yet his physician was never allowed to see his face. But he is described as having been of a clear brown complexion, remarkably well made, of a pleasing voice, and having something in his whole deportment inexpressibly noble and touching. The leaf containing the entry of his arrival at the Bastille, was carefully removed from the records, but an entry is found of his death, which took place in 1703, in these words, "Marchiali, aged about forty-five years."

These facts prove that it could not have been Fouquet who was pursued with this unrelenting and ingenious cruelty. The proud Louvois would hardly have treated a disgraced predecessor with such respect, nor would his jailer have been so anxious to lighten and adorn his confinement. In the same way may we refute a theory warmly urged in the Quarterly Review that the prisoner was the agent of Ferdinand, Duke of Mantua, by whom Louis had been grossly deceived in negotiating for the transfer of his dominions. It is certain that this agent, Matthioli, who betrayed Louis's intrigues, and yet was infatuated enough to put his head into the lion's mouth, to trust himself within the power of the monarch's emissaries, was secretly carried a prisoner into France, and committed to the custody of this same person, M. de St. Mars. But St. Mars had another prisoner guarded with the same care as this unhappy victim of his own imprudence, and one of the two is known to have died before he went to the Isle de St. Marqueri. This one must have been Matthioli. He who had wronged the proud and sensitive monarch of France in the nicest point, would not have been allowed the indulgences and honors which were paid as a matter of right to the prisoner of the Bastille. A stretch of high-handed power brought Matthioli within reach of Louis's vengeance, which was to be poured out upon his head as long as life animated it. He was decoyed into the power of the French general, in Piedmont, and carried a prisoner into France, but his death, luckily we may say for him, eluded the schemes of his enemies. Besides, no one known to the public as was Matthioli could have been thus confined for any time without exciting the inquiries of his prince, his friends, or his family. The prisoner must have been some one whose existence had always been a secret—some one who had no sympathies at work for him in the world. We must then conclude, that he was a state prisoner of high importance, and at the same time of high birth and rank—the child of shame, perhaps, and born in secrecy and sorrow; one who passed from the cradle to the dungeon, and had nothing in common with the world but the form that was always concealed from view, and the life that wasted away "unpitied and unknown."

This is the conclusion to which Gibbon arrives, and he does so with his usual ingenuity. After stating the facts, he mentions several other circumstances connected with them. These are, the birth of Louis Fourteenth, who, born after twenty-three years of a sterile union, was of at least doubtful legitimacy—the weakness, the almost impotency both of mind and body of his father, Louis Thirteenth—the known propensity of his mother, Anne of Austria, to gallantry—her strong attachment to Mazarin, whom no political reasons could ever make her abandon—an attachment, which though it began in policy, might easily have ended in love, particularly when its object was an Italian of agreeable person, loose morals, and artful address. The conclusion drawn from all this we give in Gibbon's own words. "If Anne yielded to such opportunities and so artful a lover, if she became a mother after her husband's death, her weakness and its consequences would have been carefully concealed. Louis Fourteenth was deeply interested to keep the secret, lest he should increase the suspicion on account of his own doubtful birth. If the strong grasp of Louis Fourteenth retained the sceptre, the doubt and the danger were entailed on future ages. In some feeble or infant reign, an ambitious Condé might embrace the fair pretence to assert the right to his genuine branch, and exclude from the succession Louis Thirteenth's spurious posterity. In a word he must have been his sovereign's brother, and most dangerous enemy. The humanity of Louis Fourteenth might have declined a brother's murder; but pride, policy, and even patriotism must have compelled that prince to hide his face and his existence within an iron mask and the walls of the Bastille."

It is the custom of all orthodox divines to wind up their discourses with some practical remarks, and we are loth to quit a subject that prompts so many "thick coming fancies" without uttering some of them. We promise to be very brief, and on that ground hope for our reader's indulgence for a few moments.

When the rain and hail beat against our windows from without, while we are comfortable and happy by our own firesides, when we can see the tempest rage and yet are sheltered from it ourselves—we feel more intensely the blessings of our own lot. So it is only when some such tale of armed oppression and helpless suffering reaches us, that we begin to feel the value of our quiet, secure domestic pleasures. At other times we are apt to regard them as matters of course—blessings as free to man as the sun which shines, and the air which breathes alike on the joyous and the sorrowful, on master and slave, the oppressor and the oppressed. But the captive whom we lament without being able to name, was shut out even from these free gifts of nature—from the sunshine and the breeze, which, no more than mercy or hope, ever passed the gate of the Bastille. And for the moral blessings we enjoy daily, yet unthankfully and half unconsciously,

"Society, friendship, and love Divinely bestowed upon man:"

they were words without meaning to his ear, for they were strangers to his heart. Such were the punishments which sovereign power was in those days always able and ready to inflict. Exemption from these evils is cheaply bought by the loss of a little gilding and dress—of a few empty names and a little idle show—would we but think so. It is human nature, however, to forget what we have, and sigh for what we have not. Our wishes are like telescopes, which magnify distant objects while they regard not those which lie in our path and under our eyes. We envy courts and monarchies their splendors, and forget to be thankful for those

"Fireside enjoyments, homeborn happiness,"

the pure and sacred pleasures we above all others possess—

"O fortunati nimium, sua si bona norint!"

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

PECULIAR HABITS OF MUSICAL COMPOSERS.

GLUCK—In order to warm his imagination, and transport himself to Aulis, or Sparta, was accustomed to place himself in the middle of a beautiful meadow. In this situation, with a piano before him, and a bottle of champagne by his side, he wrote his two Iphigenias, his Orpheus, and other works.

SARTI—On the contrary, required a spacious dark room, dimly illuminated by a lamp suspended from the ceiling; and it was only in the silent hours of night that he could summon musical ideas.

CIMAROSA—Was fond of noise; he liked to have his friends about him when he composed. Frequently, in the course of a single night he wrote the subjects of eight or ten charming airs, which he afterwards finished in the midst of his friends.

CHERUBINI—Was also in the habit of composing when surrounded by company. If his ideas did not flow very freely, he would borrow a pack of playing cards from any party engaged with them, and fill up the pipe with faces caricatured, and all kinds of humorous devices, for he was as ready with his pencil as his pen, though certainly not equally great with both.

SACCHINI—Could not write a passage except when his wife was at his side, and unless his cats, whose playfulness he admired, were gambolling about him.

PAISIELLO—Composed in bed. It was between sheets that he planned Il Barbiere di Siviglia, La Molinara, and other chefs d'œuvre of ease and gracefulness.

ZINGARELLI—Would dictate his music after reading a passage in one of the fathers of the church, or in some Latin classic.

HAYDN—Solitary and sober as Newton, putting on his finger the ring sent him by Frederick II. and which he said was necessary to inspire his imagination, sat down to his piano, and in a few moments soared among the choirs. Nothing disturbed him at Eisenstadt, the seat of Prince Esterhazy; he lived wholly for his art, exempt from worldly cares, and often said that he always enjoyed himself most when he was at work. EXTRAVAGANCE.

A London paper, describing the dresses of some ladies on a late public occasion in that city, makes the following statements:

"The Duchess of Argyll, in a dress of massive gold tissue, her raven locks, and a prodigious plume of feathers of the same color, produced a contrast with her diamonds, equalled only by

"The Duchess of Bedford, whose jewelry astonished all by its glitter and glare. The latter made a prodigious display indeed. Independently of the necklace, which cost fifty thousand guineas, (50,000!) chains of diamonds, with amethysts in the centre, decorated her grace's dress, from the thick velvet Spanish hat, to the girdle or cestus.

"The Hon. Mrs. Pope, was a meteor in the throng! that lady was a moving firmament, and it was said that the cost in brilliants alone, in a dress of sombre magnificence, (crimson) exceeded seven hundred thousand pounds!" or three millions one hundred and ten thousand dollars!!

BREVITIES.

People who affect a shortness of sight must think it the height of good fortune to be born blind.

Lounging, unemployed people, may be called of the tribe of Joshua, for with them the sun stands still.

Fanatics think men like bulls—they must be baited to madness ere they are in a fit condition to die.

There is an ancient saying—"Truth lies in a well." May not the modern adage run—"The most certain charity is at a pump."

Some connoisseurs would give a hundred pounds for the painted head of a beggar, who would threaten the living mendicant with the stocks.

If you boast of a contempt for the world, avoid getting into debt. It is giving to gnats the fangs of vipers.

The heart of the great man, surrounded by poverty and trammelled by dependence, is like an egg in a nest built among briars. It must either curdle into bitterness, or, if it take life and mount, struggle through thorns for the ascent. Whittaker's Magazine.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1832.

Editor's study.—It is night. We are alone. Nothing is heard but the watchman, sometimes striking his club against the pavement, or the quivering peals of the bell, as it notes the never-ceasing flight of time over the sleeping city; or now and then the voice of some half-intoxicated straggler from the theatre, humming fragments of the opera. A friendly correspondent has supplied us with a communication, describing almost the scene upon which we have been gazing. We extract a few stanzas, and may give the rest at some future period:

Night in a mighty city, still and vast;
Lo, the broad square, and dimly-lighted street.
Deserted as if some dread plague were cast,
Like ancient curse, o'er them whose many feet
Late wore the pavements, and who now aghast
Had fled, and left this voiceless scene to meet
The pestilential air that o'er it brood,
A costly desert, an unnatural solitude.

Silence, in leafy wood, on grassy plain,
O'er mountain summit, in the bending vale;
Mid the rent arches of the ruined fane,
Or on the endless ocean, when the gale
Rests in her distant cave, may hold her reign;
Where strong proud men some awful grief bewail;
Or in the church-yard, where the skeletons lie,
Or in the dungeon dark or the deep midnight sky.

But in the city's walks the muser strays,
Mid objects by ambitious human hands
Reared lofty; proud things meet his wondering gaze:
See where the palace like a picture stands,
And here the late thronged theatre upraise
Its silent walls, where yonder square expands,
And not a voice or step the silence breaks,
And not a creature stirs, an answering echo wakes.

Night o'er the city, hanging like a spell,
And all the jostling crowd unconscious sleep;
For so at least the white closed shutters tell;
Though some there be, perchance, who wake and weep;
Alas! that 'neath these stately domes may dwell
Foul guilt and racking doubt and anguish deep;
Thoughts on the wearied mind that weigh like lead—
Some bending awful o'er the sick, perchance the dead.

And here but now the human current moved
Promiscuous medley: misery and joy,
Hope and despair, the hated and the loved,
Beauty all radiant, and the laughing boy;
Commingle, shifting, on the thousands roved;
Each chasing, like a child, its favorite toy;
And many a tired heart rests in slumber now:
Beguiling dreams shed light on many a care-worn brow.
Sleep on, ye thousands, rest ye while ye may;
Brief interval. The rolling earth will turn,
Soon, your smooth dreams dispersed, the breaking day,
Lighting his gradual eastern fires, will burn,
And call ye to your doom, &c.

There is a strange feeling in looking over the communications, newspapers, new publications, pamphlets, engravings, and the other ordinary paraphernalia of an editorial table at this dead hour of the night. A solitary midnight chamber has in it to us almost the solemnity of a sepulchre without its horrors and gloom, and these various articles strewn confusedly about, these fragments of the living, cheerful world, thus bent over in silence and seclusion, wear a different aspect from those seen in the liveliness and hurry of the day. And then the occupation of writing is not without its excitement, and the thought that by the aid of an art, so simple in itself as printing, the half-dreamy reveries which we are now venting with no other sound than the noise of the pen as it hurries over the paper, are addressed to so many, and may be perused by those yet unborn, when we shall be the tenant of some nameless grave, while it almost causes us to shrink from our task, fills us with admiration of the stupendous power of the press. Our thoughts were turned this way by a perusal of the proceedings of the Columbia Typographical Society at Washington, which occupy a page of the Globe. Our interest in them was by no means diminished by the observations of Mr. Gulian C. Verplanck, who, after the reading from the chair of a toast highly complimentary to him, addressed the assembly in a short speech, from which the following is an extract:

"Amongst the earliest recollections of my boyish days," he said, "were the amusing and instructive incidents of the early life of Benjamin Franklin, as related by himself; and one of the circumstances which most struck and excited my boyish imagination in that beautiful narrative, was that of his calling the office in which he worked in London, a chapel, according to the traditional phrase of English printers. It is a term that has gone much out of use, I have since learnt, on this side the Atlantic. In this chapel, however, about which our great philosopher and patriot printer first excited my curiosity, it has been the fortune—I think the good fortune—of my life, to have since passed many hours. These were hours which I sometimes used to flatter myself might be useful to others—they were certainly always agreeable and interesting to myself. I was there very early, and very frequently struck with the general intelligence and information of the craft; and I was often delighted with the native talent, the literary acquirement, the liberal principles, and the ardent minds of many of them with whom I there became familiar. I there made many acquaintances amongst your fraternity, whom I shall always remember with respect and kindness, and not a few friends whom I honor and esteem. I have received amongst them the best offices, as a friend; (nor can I forget it) aid, suggestions, corrections, as an author. One instance of this occurs to me at this moment, and the time and occasion will not allow me to pass it over. I was engaged some years ago in a miscellaneous literary work, in conjunction with two or three friends, whose writings are amongst the most valued productions of native literature. The volumes were most accurately, as well as most beautifully printed. Before the sheets had reached the binder, and long before they had fallen under the eyes of any regular editorial critic, I was surprised with a review of the work in one of our best and most widely-circulated literary journals. It was written with great talent, as well as elegance and sprightliness of style, and in the most friendly spirit. On inquiring for the name of our good-natured and able critic, the authors were surprised to learn that he was the compositor who had set up the whole of the manuscript, and who knew it only in that way. Our friend has since laid down the stick for the pen, and is now, as I trust, winning his way to fame and fortune in another country."

Our readers will be pleased to learn that this compliment, respecting the review, paid by one whose approbation must be gratefully received, was addressed to no other than Mr. Cox, our old friend and correspondent C. The work reviewed was the "Talisman," and the article appeared originally in this journal.

We copy from the American a humorous little poem, entitled "Extract from the loves of the Shell-Fishes." Is it not Shakespeare's Juliet who asks, "What's in a name?" We think there is much in a name; and if these lines had made their appearance, as an unpublished effusion of Lord Byron, how many sapient critics by this time would have discovered their beauty?

Not in the land where beauty loves to dwell,
And bards to sing that beauty dwell there;
Not in the land where rules th' enchanter's spell,
And fashion's beings, beautiful and rare;
Not in such land are laid the scenes I tell:
No odors float upon its sunny air;

No ruddy vintage, and no tinted flowers
Gladden its fields or bloom within its bowers.
Mine is a lowlier lay—the unquiet deep—
The world of waters; where man's puny skill
Has but along its surface dared to creep;
The quaking vassal of its wayward will:
Exultant only when its calm waves sleep,
And its rough voice is noiseless all and still,
And trembling when its crested hosts arise,
Roused from their slumbers by the wind's wild cries.

None but the dead have visited its caves;
None but the dead pressed its untrampled floor;
Eyes, but all sightless, glare beneath its waves,
And forms earth's worshippers might well adore,
Lie in their low and ever freshened graves,
All cold and loveless far beneath its roar.
The bright-eyed maiden and the fair-haired bride,
And sire and son there slumber side by side.

The decorated dead—there's nought above
More calmly soft or delicately fair.
Our picturing fancies, when in dreams they rove,
Create no forms that may with them compare.
Match me, ye eyes of light—ye forms of love,
That glad the dimness of our upper air;
Match me your living beauties like to those
The sea's vast charnel hold in deep repose.

What though our gorgeous sun deny its light—
What though its nights are starless—yet there beams
Within its element, all pure and bright,
A living radiance, that by far outgleams
The kindred glory of our day or night,
Flowing from out a thousand radiant streams,
The very essence of that lower world,
Where night's dark drapery never is unfurled.

The festering fingers of earth-born decay
Mar not the forms that sleep in beauty there;
The change that visits all of human clay,
Passes as lightly as the summer air
Over the slumberer's face: the wayward play
Of living passion, or the tread of care,
Leave on our brows their foot-prints far more deep,
Than the soft change that marks their dreamless sleep.

Smile not, ye wise ones, at my lowly lay,
Nor deem it strange that underneath a shell
High thoughts exert their ever-ruling sway,
And soft affections scorn not there to dwell.
That in an oyster's breast the living ray
Of mind beams forth; or that its young thoughts swell
Less vauntingly in pride of place or birth
Than aught that breathes upon our upper earth.

Of blighted hopes and confidence betrayed—
Of princely dames and wights of low degree—
The story of a high-born oyster maid
And her clam lover, of low family:
And how they met beneath their oft sought shade,
The spreading branches of a coral tree,
Attended by a periwinkle page,
Selected chiefly for his tender age.
Sing, scaly muse.**

The annexed letter comes to us in a fair manuscript, of a tempting neatness, and although it discusses a rather antiquated theme, we admit it with the hope of alluring the author (whom we half suspect) to some more elaborate effort.

GENTLEMEN—I do not know a more disappointed and disheartened girl than Rose Bradshaw: when I meet her in the street she appears abstracted and bewildered, and although she is situated in such a manner that money could not be of use to her, still she is unhappy. Her father, God bless him, is one of the most amiable men in existence, and her mother is a good easy kind of woman, who would not harm a fly. Rose has all the amiable qualities of her father, and, consequently, she was beloved by all who knew her. This was when she was fifteen years of age. I hardly ever saw a good-natured young girl that did not make my heart jump—there is something so elastic in their dispositions—so bird-like in their singing, that, do what I will, I cannot resist the temptation to seek their company. You may talk about the blues, and a few other "ills that flesh is heir to," but if you wish to be happy, do not think it a condescension to visit young ladies. No, no—leave off reading "The art of prolonging life," and bear witness to the practical utility of my suggestions.

The first time I saw Rose she was engaged in her father's study dusting his great easy chair, and doing as much as possible (with the best intentions however) to derange his papers; in the evening she used to bring her father his slippers, and then recite the lessons which she had learned through the day at school.

On May-day Rose was elected queen for the year, (for this good old custom is not entirely extinct in Old Jersey;) still, I cannot help thinking it did Rose no good. When her father removed to New-York, it served to render her beauty a subject of conversation, and Rose now made her appearance as bride's-maid at Jane Smith's wedding, Jane being an old play-mate.

When Esther Clark sent out notices for her party, Rose Bradshaw's card of invitation was written first; and if she wanted any thing, she could always secure it. She had a season ticket sent to her from this and that institution, and if her father had a compliment paid him, Rose came in for a share. Her very artlessness made every body love her.

But poor Rose was vain—if not so by nature, she became so by flattery, and her best friends were neglected if they omitted any trifling punctilio. As she formed many new acquaintances, she forgot many old ones. If Miss Bradshaw wished to gratify her vanity, she looked at her card-rack; and when she wanted to walk in Broadway she had only to signify to that gentleman whose name was least familiar to her ears, and she had a beau to flirt with, and then too she had the pleasure of mortifying her Alfred, as she used to call him when they played together at school.

Well, Miss Rose is now forsaken by her old acquaintances, and the butterflies who swarmed so thickly around her but recently, have been chilled by the first indication of her homeliness. You may see her now perusing her album, with an ill-natured, dejected countenance; she has become disgusted with society, and society has become disgusted with her; in her desire to improve her person, she resisted all attempts to inform her mind. It is a settled thing that Miss Rose will die an old maid. B t.

It is a common practice to undervalue the results of our native industry, and to give preference to specimens of foreign workmanship; but we are pleased to perceive the manufactory of Mr. Bussing, William-street, has recently attracted much attention. It displays such numerous evidences of taste and enterprise, and so many articles likely to attract female visitors, that we cheerfully spare sufficient space to make our fashionable lady readers acquainted with the establishment. The Evening Journal concludes a notice of it, with the following observations:—"The peculiar neatness and excellence of workmanship which distinguish the commodities from this manufactory, are unrivalled on this side the Atlantic, and are not outdone in any of the workshops of Europe. Among the many new and elegant affairs which were shown to us, were several highly-finished souvenirs, or pocket remembrancers, designed both for ladies and gentlemen, bound in beautiful embossed morocco, and ornamented with polished steel trimmings—an article extremely appropriate for the present season. But it is impossible here to specify the diverse sorts of companions for the pocket and for the toilet which the ingenuity of the manufacturer is constantly producing for his customers and the public."

Our resolutions last week, touching puns and quotations have put us already to some trouble. We have kept a little list of those expunged from several pieces read, and either presented in this number or to be published at a future period. "Golden opinions from all sorts of people," was taken out of a very good piece, and the sentence reconstructed. "They fought like brave men, long and well," shared the same fate. "The course of true love never did run smooth," was discarded—nem. con. And the "gems of purest ray serene, the dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear," has been in the Mirror once or twice before. A very pretty letter on rose-colored paper, dated Rochester, and signed Ephemeris Consequentia, is over-run with lines, half-lines, and couplets from popular authors, and the "gems of purest ray serene" were shining there also, though the sin in this instance is partly palliated by the author's only giving the first three words, and then modestly retiring under cover of several etceteras.

P. calls our attention to an article in the Courier and Enquirer of the nineteenth inst. setting forth the confusion and injustice arising from our present system of insolvent laws, and pleading the strong necessity of a general bankrupt law. We should be glad, in common with thousands, to promote the passage of such a bill, but the subject does not come within the plan of the Mirror. We may, however, without any impropriety, add, that the essay in the Enquirer is, in every respect, just, and will amply repay a careful perusal.

The author of the beautiful poem, "The Fall of Jerusalem," on our first page, has our thanks, and we solicit a continuation of his favors. We suggest to him, however, the propriety of reducing his future productions to a more regular measure. Although it has, in the present case, been evidently his resolution not to restrain himself within the rules of blank verse, for which he has several authentic writers as precedents, yet a more studied regularity would be preferred by the general reader.

Mr. Whittier, long known as the editor of the New England Review, which, under his direction, has been ably conducted, has recently surrendered his charge to a very talented successor. We cannot compliment the present editor more than by saying that the journal has lost nothing of its former value in his hands. We have omitted the mention of this hitherto through inadvertence.

After a debate of some sixty years, the corporation has at length appointed a committee to adopt measures for supplying this city with pure and wholesome water. Two millions of dollars are to be appropriated for the purpose. It is to be hoped that the public will no longer be trifled with on this extremely interesting subject.

The "Albany Literary Gazette" announces that the premium of a hundred dollars has been awarded by a committee of gentlemen, to Mr. Willis Gaylord Clark, for a tale entitled "Retribution;" and fifty dollars to Mrs. Sigourney, for the best poem, called the "Western Emigrant."

It has been suggested by a writer in the American, that our government should invite the exiled and unfortunate Poles to settle in this country, invest them with lands, and afford them facilities for reaching these shores.

The twenty-second of next month will be the centennial birthday of Washington. We trust that the occasion will be celebrated throughout the land with every appropriate demonstration of respect to his memory.

THERE'S NOTHING TRUE BUT HEAVEN.

ARRANGED FOR THE SPANISH GUITAR, AND PRESENTED TO THE NEW-YORK MIRROR, BY OTTO TORP—THE WORDS BY THOMAS MOORE.

Andante pastorale.

This world is all a fleet-ing show, For man's il-lu-sion giv'n, This world is all a fleet-ing show, For man's il-lu-sion giv'n; The smiles of joy, the tears of woe, De- ceit-ful shine, deceit-ful flow, There's no-thing true but heaven, There's no-thing true but heaven, There's no-thing true but heaven.

SECOND VERSE.

And false the light on glory's plume,
As fading hues of even;
And love, and hope, and beauty's bloom,
Are blossoms gathered for the tomb—
There's nothing bright but heaven!

THIRD VERSE.

Poor wand'ers of a stormy day,
From wave to wave we're driven;
And fancy's flash and reason's ray
Serve but to light the troubled way—
There's nothing calm but heaven.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

POLISH FEMALES.

THE Court Journal lately mentioned that among the arrivals at Warsaw was that of the Hon. Miss Plater, commander of the Samogitian Lancers, with her aid-de-camp, likewise a young lady of quality! The editor adds that another young girl had signalized herself in the Polish army, and expressed her determination to cut her way to farther distinction. This is nothing more than was frequently done in the American revolution. Our history contains several striking anecdotes of female courage in battles, and services rendered by them of great importance.

GALENA.

Galena is a town in Jo Davies county, Illinois; situated near the north-west boundary of the state, on Fever, or Bean river, six miles from its junction with the Mississippi, and about four hundred and eighty miles from St. Louis, Missouri, to which place three steamboats ran regularly in 1831. The lead mines in the vicinity of Galena are very valuable, and extend more than fifty miles in every direction. The ore yields seventy-five per cent of pure lead. The number of pounds of lead made at the mines in this vicinity from 1821 to 1830 inclusive, was over forty millions. Galena stands on the side of a steep hill, and the lower street is subject to inundations from the river. Most of the buildings are shops, taverns, or boarding houses for the accommodation of adventurers attracted here by the lead mines. Distance, three hundred and twenty-two miles from Vandalia—one thousand and eighty-six miles from Washington city.

SUNDERLAND.

Sunderland is a seaport of England, in the county of Durham—two hundred and sixty four miles north of London, and eleven miles south of Newcastle, at the mouth of the river Wear. It was formerly only a part of Bishop Wearmouth, but is now a populous town, (containing in 1831, about seventeen thousand inhabitants.) The harbor is formed by two piers at the mouth of the river, on one of which is a light-house. The iron bridge over the Wear is an elegant structure, and celebrated as one of the wonders of modern mechanism. It was erected in 1796, and consists of a single arch of two hundred and thirty-six feet span, which at its centre rises one hundred feet above the river, so that ships can pass under it. The principal trade of Sunderland is the exportation of coal, in which upwards of five hundred vessels, and as many lighters are engaged. There are also manufactories of glass, earthenware, &c. The public buildings are several churches, assembly-rooms, and a theatre. Near the town is a chalybeate spring.

COAL.

The Philadelphia National Journal remarks that the managers of the Lehigh coal company deserve well of the public for not taking advantage of the inclement weather, the scarcity of wood, and the demand of coal to raise their prices.

EXTRACTS FROM A MODERN DICTIONARY.

Public abuse—The mud with which every traveller is spattered on his road to distinction.

Slander—An invisible venom spit out by toads and serpents in the human shape.

Political honesty—Previous lexicographers have not noticed this word, treating it, I presume, altogether as fabulous—for definition, vide self-interest.

Love—A disease.

Happiness—A dream.

Hope—A traitor.

The grave—An ugly hole in the ground, which lovers and poets wish they were in, but take uncommon pains to keep out of.

Modern literature—Fragments of the feasts of the old writers served up in new dishes.

Constable—A species of snapping turtle.

Modesty—A beautiful flower that flourishes only in secret places.

Sensibility—A quality by which its possessor in attempting to promote the happiness of other people loses his own.

A young man of talents—An impertinent scoundrel who thrusts himself forward; a writer of execrable poetry; a person without modesty; a noisy fellow.

Lawyer—A learned gentleman, who rescues your estate from your enemy and keeps it himself.

Enemies—Borrower and lender.

My dear—An expression used by man and wife at the commencement of a quarrel.

Watchman—A man employed by the corporation to sleep in the open air.

Office of street inspector—A sinecure.

Honesty—An excellent joke.

Dentist—A person who finds work for his own teeth by taking out those of other people.

Poetry—A division of affected prose into lines of a certain length.

Example—extract.

Count. I hear her shriek, and fly to save her life,

But what time, Simon, is it of the clock?

Simon. Alas! my lord, it must be more than three,

For late upon the drowsy air of night,

The iron swinger, in the steeple high,

(Which like a man of genius tops above

The other houses which, like little men,

Do stand obscure and lonely far beneath)

Did with three deep reverberating strokes

Awake the echo. Please you good, my lord,

Swift as the lightning from the cloudy heavens,

Or as the thought through heated fancy rolled,

And brave as lion, at whose dreadful voice

The beasts of all the forests trembling hide,

Let us, oh let us haste to save this maid.

Count. Aye, Simon, as some eagle whom the heavens, &c.

NOTICES OF DISTINGUISHED CHARACTERS.

CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN.

THE life of a man of genius is very different now from what it was but a few centuries ago. Then it was a spirit-stirring tale of devious wandering and various adventure; of moving accidents, exciting perils, and riotous pleasure. Now it is a monotonous detail of struggles against misfortune, of shifts against poverty, of daily, mercenary drudgery. The days are past when Froissart rode round on his stately charger, followed by his servants with hounds and horses, collecting at every castle the materials of his history, and received in all with princely hospitality—when the troubadours sallied out with the world “all before them, where to choose their place of rest,” protected by the sacredness of their poetical calling—safe among hostile chieftains, and loved even by rude barbarism. Those were ages of darkness, perhaps, but at least it was then something to be a man of genius. Men of genius were then men of the world. Ability and information were not then so common that they could be shut out of the busy public walks of life, to meditate in closets and starve in garrets. For precisely the same reason that in our new settlements the leading man is called on to be judge, colonel, postmaster, and deacon, was the poet then called on to play the orator, the monk to become the historian, the bishop to sit as judge. Rubens was ambassador to England, Petrarch was entrusted with embassies to almost every court in Europe, Machiavelli was secretary of the Florentine republic, Dante a soldier and magistrate, Garcilaso a skilful captain, Raleigh a warrior and statesman; while in Surry were united

“The courtier’s, soldier’s, scholar’s eye, tongue, sword.”

How different such a life—spent in such animating variety of object and employment—accompanied with such grateful and exciting popularity, from the biography of the man of letters of the nineteenth century! The poet or artist cannot hope now, as then, “ante oculos omnium versari.” He cannot enter into the political arena or judicial forum. Every class has now its chosen walk—its allotted beaten path of business, into which no stranger can enter. The very reputation of poet—the nick-name of a genius will be enough to condemn him to the cutting neglect, or more cutting pity of his fellow-men. The busy, the scheming, the ambitious, pass him by as an idler, an excrescence on the world of action. He may have the talent of Scott or Byron, and yet languish unknown unless he have their popularity—then indeed he will find plenty of speculators ready to traffic in the labors of his brain as in any other merchantable article—but if he have not, what is then to adorn, to endear, to soothe his life? He may cherish his fervid temperament—his keen susceptibilities—but they only make his misery more poignant, and in the lowest deep, open a lower deep of despair. His mind destroys itself—the blade wears out the scabbard. He flies at last to the bowl to purchase a short respite from care at the price of health and honor, and then,

“Last scene of all,

That ends this strange eventful history,”

we have the brilliant orgies of Burns, the mad despair of Chatterton, the beastly degradation of Savage.

These remarks have been suggested to us by a glance at the life and writings of the gifted author whose name is placed at the head of this article. Not that Brown was one of those victims of morbid sensibility, whose errors are most inexcusable, yet most easily forgiven, or that he wanted strength to buffet with the world. But if we were asked for an example of the love which follows learning for itself alone, of the consequences of such a spirit, and of the history of such a self-devoted student, this is the example we would give. We are accustomed to talk with admiring wonder of the untimely promise of Chatterton, and the absorbing enthusiasm of Kirke White; yet we have seen in our own city an instance of devotion to letters fully as ardent as theirs, and of a sacrifice to genius brighter than either.

Charles Brockden Brown was of a quaker family. In him, in Bernard Barton, and in West we see the germ of talent flourishing where every thing conspired to “eat its bud” and “bringing forth its fruit in due season.” The peace-loving sect that shuns the contagion of taste and refinement as the machinations of the evil one, has already had its poets, painters, and novelists—proofs enough, if proofs were wanting of the old adage—that no quaker precision, no drab-colored simplicity can utterly destroy man’s strong innate love of the beautiful.

“Naturam expellas furca, tamen usque recurret—”

The life of our author is not as brilliant or romantic as that of Petrarch or Cervantes. It was even more honorable, perhaps, from the quiet domestic virtues that shine in every line of its brief history; but it offers few materials for the biographer. We can tell, indeed, how he panted and thirsted after knowledge from his earliest years, and how he displayed that premature quickness of thought, and those early ripened powers which always seem the forerunners of an untimely end; how he labored only to strengthen the mind, neglecting the body till it became too weak to struggle against lingering and deeply-seated disease; how he abandoned a profession which opened invitingly before him because it would call him away from literary pursuits, and how he left the broad road of business and the highway of wealth to “loiter beneath the laurel’s barren shade”—how devoted he was to this, to him a sacred calling, how unpretending he was in his mental superiority, how kind and gentle in his modest walk through life. We may follow that life to its early end, and show how all his labors and projects were broken off by death, and how he fell a martyr, and a willing one, to study, at the age of thirty nine. But here the office of the biographer ends, though half his character remains untold. So quiet and retired were his merits, that it seems almost like presumption to bring them to the light. We feel almost as if we were violating the sanctity of that domestic life wherein they took shelter. His fame as an author is the property of the public—his character as a man, a sacred legacy to friendship.

When we turn from the writings to the character of an author, or indeed from the public conduct to the private walk of any man, we often meet the most striking inconsistencies; of this we might multiply examples almost without end. The philanthropic St. Pierre, whose writings overflow with the love of nature and of man, was avaricious and unprincipled; and Rousseau, the most eloquent of sentimentalists, sent his children to a foundling hospital. The stern republican, Alfieri, was a gay profligate noble; the aristocratic old Count Mirabeau a zealous apostle of liberty. So in other walks of life. We have all heard of the actor, who, while he made all Paris laugh, was himself dying with melancholy; and Liston is famous for his staid seriousness of deportment and his lurking inclination for tragedy. The bloody persecutor, Claverhouse, was of even feminine beauty and delicacy; the good king Peter of Castile, was rude and harsh; while Ali Pasha and Djezzar were two of the mildest of men. None of these instances, however, are more curious than that of our author. He was himself child-like in his simplicity and purity; full of all generous and gentle impulses;

“He had a tear for pity, and a hand
Open as day to melting charity—” yet his pen was exercised only on the most profligate characters, the severest trials, the strongest passions, the most heart-rending sorrows of our nature. He is even less successful when he would describe the mild and benevolent emotions which were the familiar inmates of his own breast, than in laying bare the fearful workings of the evil passions that never found shelter there. He does not linger in the bowers of pleasure, or the sacred shades of home—he seems to begrudge to his characters the calm and quiet life he loved himself, and not to be satisfied till he has sent the delighted spirit to bathe in fiery floods of pain, perplexity, and sorrow. This is a curious propensity, and how to account for it might puzzle wiser heads than ours. We can only suppose it a freak of that perverse spirit which always makes us look wishfully away from ourselves to others, which makes it happen

“*Ut nemo, quam sibi sortem
Sen ratio dedit, seu fors objecerit, illa
Contentus vivat, laudet diversa sequentes*,”

it is one of the countless anomalies of the human mind—one of those inconsistencies of which man’s whole nature seems made up.

The gloomy and the terrible is Brown’s peculiar walk. In all his works we “sup full of horrors.” In this taste he has been called an imitator of Godwin. But Godwin was a sneering, sceptical misanthrope. His pen was tinged with the gall and bitterness of his own spirit. He held up to view

“The oppressor’s wrong, the proud man’s contumely,” with a morbid pleasure at seeing so much misery in a world of which he himself was sick. He had made evil his good, and he seems proud to show the power and set forth the triumphs of the principle he advocated. Brown’s genius wandered in the same gloomy paths of sorrow and suffering, but it sought another object. His novels aimed at what the critic calls the true end of tragedy; to purge the passions by means of pity and terror. He never leads us to doubt of the divinity of virtue, though he subjects it to every variety of fearful temptation. Every incident is another illustration of the majestic prophecy:

“Virtue may be assailed, but never hurt,
Surprised by unjust force, but not enthralld;
Yea, even that which mischief meant most harm,
Shall in the happy trial prove most glory.”

He who reads Brown will learn much of the secret weaknesses of his own heart, much of the trials to which his nature is subject—but there is no fear that he will rise a stoic or a misanthrope.

Though Brown be ranked as a pupil of the writers who “love darkness rather than light,” he has at least the merit of having struck out a new path through the world of horrors. He is not a follower of Mrs. Radcliffe, or a terrorist of the German school. With ten times Mrs. Radcliffe’s creative and imaginative power, he was not obliged to call in supernatural agency to give dignity to virtue, or majesty to sorrow. He rejected all the clumsy machinery of enchanted castles, spirits, and apparitions, once thought as necessary to a novel as its heroine and its love scenes. He was one of the first who proved that a story could be framed without the usual allowance of noblemen and palaces; that the attention could be held captive by an awkward country boy, when he spoke, with nature’s eloquence, of wild and thrilling adventures; and that the unbidden tear would flow even over the homely sorrows of untitled plebeians.

When we reflect, indeed, how many of the usual ornaments of fiction Brown has discarded, we cannot but rate very highly his skill and success. In him we find none of those speciosa miracula of human pride and pomp, attractive even on paper, brilliant even in description. He does not, like Scott, introduce us to the ancient abbey and frowning castle—to the glittering court and thronged tournament; he does not lead us into the brilliant shifting show of wealth, power, and luxury—he takes us with him into the wilderness of the new world. Like Sterne, singling out the solitary captive, he chooses a single group from among their inhabitants, and tells you its adventures and trials. Here are none of those names which in themselves adorn a tale—Cœur de Lion, Rob Roy, Charles of Burgundy, Cromwell, Elizabeth, Mary, and the other immortal names newly embalmed in Scott’s pages. Arthur Mervyn is only the adventures of a simple country boy, who, in search of employment, comes to Philadelphia during the yellow-fever, and Edgar Huntly but the history of a night or two of a sleep-walker. The plot of Jane Talbot is yet freer from “the foreign aid of ornament.” The heroine is forbidden to marry the man of her choice, and abandons him sooner than bring down upon him the anger of his father and condemn him to a life of misery, perhaps of self-reproach. These are but slender materials to be spread out through hundreds of pages—to give life and variety to volumes. Wherein then is the secret of their deep and gloomy interest—the power by which the author can “take the prisoned soul” and make it follow Edgar Huntly on his dim and perilous way, or soar with Wieland to his dizzy height of rapt devotion? Here are no coruscations of wit, no splendor of rhetoric—here are neither the rainbow hues of fancy, the mellowed richness of history, the plausible extravagance of romance, the pleasing terror of the supernatural. What then do we see to interest us so deeply in the rude outlines and plain coloring of his homely pictures? We answer, we see ourselves. The copy of nature is so fresh, so true, so speaking, that we recognize it at once. He seizes all the evanescent shades of thought and passion which blended in the hearts of the actors in his scenes; the lurking selfishness, the half-formed desires, the suppressed fears that shook their souls. His is the bold and skilful anatomy that lays bare all the dark and secret corners of the heart—its subtle windings of deceit—its thousand folds of self-love—its thick coverings of pride, fear, and meanness. We realize the feelings of his characters—we identify ourselves with them. The train of thoughts is so natural that we fall into it and prolong it insensibly ourselves. It is this nature which lends such attraction to Brown’s simple scenes and homely narrative. We may find Wieland’s mysticism dull, or Edgar Huntly’s pursuits insipid, or Arthur Mervyn’s simplicity rough and clownish; but when we see Wieland’s noble nature clouded and disturbed to madness, and see the man of sorrows rejoicing over the corpses of his wife and children, and the beloved sister struggling for her life with the brother; when Edgar Huntly escapes, almost by miracle, from the savage and the wild beast; or when Arthur Mervyn tells us of his journey to the infected city and enlarges on all the minutiae of horror—on the grass growing in the streets—the doors swinging idly on their hinges—the wretches groping for booty among the dead—the wasting fever—the pine coffin—and the slovenly burial—then we feel the spell of the mighty master, and hope or fear, shudder or struggle, at his bidding.

We would not part from our author with the words of censure in our mouth, therefore we shall not now speak of his faults. They are as familiar, as obvious as his beauties, and as much his own. His object was strictly to present truth with a simple apparel—not to hide the native beauty of the goddess under the profusion of ornament. He despised the tawdry tinsel of fine writing—the “shreds and patches” of metaphor and simile with which ordinary minds seek to cover their nakedness. His logical strength of mind—his depth of penetration—his power of argument—his wide range of judgment, are carried even into his novels. We are told of a young lady who was in raptures with Plutarch’s Lives as the most delightful romances she ever read, till she found them to be true; so, on the contrary, the grave philosopher might enjoy Brown’s novels as profound, moral, or metaphysical essays till he was told they were fictions.

FROM THE PAPERS OF AN IDLER.

FEELING AND SENTIMENT.

THERE are two men of my acquaintance, of nearly the same age, property, and standing in society, one of whom is a man of feeling, and the other a man of sentiment. Sentiment is rather a more gifted man than Feeling; writes and talks well, and on no subject does he write or speak so often and so well, as on the duty of doing good to each other. Feeling never wrote a paragraph in the newspapers, nor spoke where ten people could hear him; but there is not a cellar or a garret in — street that he has not been into, and there are hundreds of people that pray for him every day of their lives. Sentiment is the admiration of his acquaintances; Feeling, the delight of his friends. No better illustration can be given of the difference between them, than was shown in their conduct on one particular occasion. A mutual friend of theirs had died suddenly, under circumstances of peculiar affliction, and leaving a large family nearly destitute. Sentiment heard of his death as he was going to an evening party, where he spoke of his departed friend, and of his irreparable loss to his widow and children, in such a way as to bring tears into the eyes of all who heard him; but in a short time the conversation turned upon other subjects, and Sentiment became as lively and entertaining as ever. Feeling also heard of it as he was going to this same party, and he turned about and went home, for he loved his friend too well to feel in the mood to join a gay crowd while he was yet unburied. The next day Sentiment sat down and wrote a beautiful letter to the bereaved widow, while Feeling went about and collected a subscription for her use. Sentiment published an eloquent obituary notice of his friend, while Feeling paid his funeral expenses. Feeling adopted one of his sons, and educated him, while Sentiment named one of his own after him.

I have two cousins, however, in whom the two qualities are more strikingly displayed than in any persons of my acquaintance. I shall call one of them by the familiar name of Mary, and the other by the more romantic one of Matilda, assigning to each an appellation somewhat consistent with her character. Mary has a great deal of strong sense, uniform cheerfulness, and a fund of deep and quiet feeling. Matilda has more imagination, more liveliness, more enthusiasm and more sentiment. Mary is slow in forming attachments, and is very constant to her old friends; but Matilda is apt to be bewitched with new faces, and to repose confidence in those whom she soon finds to be unworthy of it. In literature their tastes are widely different. Matilda hangs with rapture over the passionate dreamings of Byron, and the mystical speculations of Shelly; but Mary prefers the tenderness of Cowper, and the deep philosophy of Wordsworth. If Matilda could find out some beautiful being that was dying of a consumption, or a broken heart, or any such interesting disease, in a chamber tastefully adorned with flowers, and dressed in robes of spotless white, she would devote to her all her time and energies, and be the most assiduous of nurses, and the most sympathizing of friends; but she cannot endure smoky houses, unwashed children, nor any repulsive form of sickness. I remember very well how differently they behaved on an occasion when I happened to be present, when the wife of a poor sailor and the mother of many children, and who lived near them, rushed into the house with the utmost disorder of look and manner, and told them, with the passionate lamentation customary to persons in her rank in life, in circumstances of overwhelming grief, that she had just heard that her husband was lost at sea, when within two days sail of the harbor. Matilda was dreadfully overcome, and had nearly fainted, and on recovering flew to her purse and emptied it in the woman's lap, and then sat down and wept in helpless impotence. Mary, on the other hand, retained her self-possession throughout, and applied herself at once to the soothing and comforting of her afflicted and humble friend, and by suggesting to her reflections and consolations in a manner equally creditable to her judgment and her feelings, soon succeeded in converting the hysterical violence of grief into a more calm and subdued state of feeling. And this was but the beginning of her good deeds. She made a decent suit of mourning for her, went about and procured situations for two or three of her children, and spoke of her case to some wealthy friends, with that eloquence which comes from the heart and goes to the heart, so that they became interested in her, relieved her present necessities, and provided her with the means of gaining a permanent livelihood. All this Matilda could not have done, though she would have loaded her with gifts if she had the means. Mary had as limited means as her cousin; but how much good can be done by one who has a willing heart and a resolute spirit?

These young ladies have a grandmother, who is somewhat in her dotage, and is, moreover, confined to her room by infirmities, and it is curious to see how unconsciously they display their different characters by their treatment of her. Matilda is truly attached to her; often speaks of her with deep feeling, and is ready to do anything for her, and to contribute to her happiness in any way she can. She goes to see her almost every day, and lights up the invalid's chamber, like a sun-beam, with her sweet looks. She delights to carry her flowers, pictures, or any thing that will amuse her childish mind; but her lively fancy cannot endure the "bald disjointed chat" of the poor old lady. She is restless, and fidgets on her chair while she is in the room, and soon makes an excuse to be gone. But Mary regularly devotes a certain portion of her time to her. She will read the newspaper to her by the hour together, and listen, without the least sign of impatience, to the thread-bare scandal that is half a century old, and to the pointless story that she knows already by heart. She will tell her, too, who is married, and who is engaged, and who have failed, and who has come into town, and who has gone out of it, and who have given parties, and who are going to,—and in short empty the basket of gossip to its last chip. And she will do all this, though in addition to her excellent sense, she has a very vivid perception and keen enjoyment of the ludicrous.

When they were both about seventeen years old, they heard of the death of a schoolfellow, whom they both fondly loved, from whom they had parted only about a year, and whose residence was only a day's journey from their own. Matilda was almost heart-broken at her loss, and, in the touching language of Scripture, "refused to be comforted." She hardly slept for several nights, and scarcely tasted food for several days. She mourned for her friend long, as well as deeply; but her grief was of that stunning and absorbing nature, that it occupied her whole mind to the exclusion of every other image. Mary, though deeply afflicted, and disposed to yield to the torrent of grief which came over her, remembered, even in that trying hour, that her obligations to duty yet remained. She thought of the mother and sisters of her friend, and said to herself, "their sorrow is yet greater than mine." She flew to them on the wings of love. She soothed and consoled them. She took upon herself all those household duties for which they were unfitted, and so occupied herself that she was obliged to forego the luxury of tears, till she had retired to rest. She remained with them till the bitterness of their anguish was over, and then came home and resumed her own duties as quietly as if all she had done had been a matter of course.

I recollect another instance where the difference in their characters was shown. A poor man, in the village where they reside, was slowly recovering from a disorder, which had confined him to the house for several months. The physician had recommended him to drink Madeira wine, and he might as well have prescribed nectar, so far as the poor man's ability to procure it was concerned. Matilda heard of it, and gave up to the charitable purpose of procuring him the wine, a sum of money which she had laid aside for the purchase of a new bonnet, and wore her old one another winter; and (I may remark, en passant) never did she look so beautiful to my eyes, as she did the next time I saw her with it on. On another occasion, this same sick man expressed a wish to have some particular delicacy, of which his family had not the ingredients, nor did they know how to make it. When Mary heard of it, she immediately sent a servant with the materials to their humble abode, and soon followed herself and cooked the dish with her own hand, bending and toiling over their only fire as if she had been Sterne's "fat, foolish scullion" herself. There is, in short, hardly a day in the year in which their peculiar traits do not manifest themselves. I have often seen Matilda stop and caress a beautiful child in the street, addressing it with a look and tone that the child always remembered; but I never shall forget seeing Mary, when I was once riding in the stage with her, hold in her lap for two or three hours, an infant that was neither clean nor pretty, to relieve its poor mother, who looked sick, and faint, and broken-hearted. And never shall I forget the grateful look with which the woman expressed her thanks, telling her, with a manner and in language much above her appearance, "that she hoped she would never be in a condition to receive the kindness that she had shown towards her."

Such are my two cousins, each charming in her way, and I love them both with a truly cousinly affection, and if I were a fairy, each of them should marry a prince. But, perhaps, some fair reader may ask, "suppose they were not your cousins, which of them should you prefer?" Why, in truth, that is one of that numerous class of questions, which are more easy to ask than to answer. But if I must give a reply, I should say, that I prefer a twilight walk in the woods with the romantic Matilda, or to sit by her side in a summer evening when the rich moonlight is steeping, in its silver beauty, her dark hair and spiritual eyes; but if I were going to select a companion to walk hand in hand with, through this vale of tears, I am pretty certain it would be the affectionate and kind-hearted Mary.

SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN JOURNALS.

SAMUEL ROGERS.

MR. ROGERS' first work, we believe, was an "Ode to Superstition, and other poems." This was followed by his most popular, certainly not his greatest poem, the "Pleasures of Memory." But though not his greatest poem, how beautiful it really is! What simplicity, what grace, what sweetness? Just let us suppose that Lord Byron had written a poem on the same subject: would it have been equally touching?—certainly not. His pleasures of memory would not have been the pleasures that live for all. Here we have the mirror of the Hungarian wizard—it presents to every man an image like his own, but flattered into beauty.

"As o'er the dusky furniture I bend,
Each chair awakes the feelings of a friend."

Who does not feel those lines to his heart's core?—an idiot would. But here is a deeper thought:

"On yon gray-stone, that fronts the chancel door,
Worn smooth by busy feet now seen no more;
Each eve we shot the marble through the ring,
When the heart danced and life was on the wing.
Alas! unconscious of the kindred earth,
That faintly echoed to the voice of mirth;
The glow-worm loves her emerald light to shed,
Where now the sexton rests his hoary head;
Oft as he turn'd the green award with his spade,
He lectured every youth that round him play'd."

This is a picture: the gay-hearted urchins playing on the grave-stones—the old sexton pausing on his spade beside them. This, too, is nature! and there is something of a moral beneath it, a moral sad, and yet utterly void of gloom.

Pure, in all that is best in poetry, is the allusion to—

"The blithe son of Savoy journeying round,
With humble wares, and pipe of merry sound."

But every one knows those lines—we would not forget them for half our library.

"Human Life" abounds in beauties of a loftier strain, and thoughts of a far deeper mood than we find in the "Pleasures of Memory."

The picture of the mother and child is unequalled for truth and sweetness:

"As ever, ever, to her lap he flies,
When rosy sleep comes on with sweet surprise."

There is a startling beauty in these two lines:

"When by a good man's grave I muse alone,
Methinks an angel sits upon the stone."

Lastly, we incline to think the plan and conception of "Human Life" to be the witness of a very noble order of inventive faculty; but in the execution, we blame the ambition that sought, and we question the judgment that selected the peculiarities of a new school as an admixture with the graces of the old. A man should be very young to change a method of writing in which he has been successful. A happy mannerism either comes early, or must be brooded long. But turn we to the last and greatest of our author's poems, "Italy."

An edition has lately been published of this work that has brought it, almost as a new poem, again before the world—an edition that so highly honors the arts which have adorned it, that we look upon it with a national pride, as a sort of epoch in the history of letters. "Italy" is before us; as we turn over its pages, the verse and the engraving make the divine land visible. The forms, the vases, the palace, the ruin, the lake, the beings of history, the creatures of legend, yea, the very sky, the very moon of Italy—all—we see them all:—

"Venice
The glorious city in the sea,
The sea is in the broad—the narrow—streets,
Ebbing and flowing, and the salt sea-weed
Clings to the marble of her palaces."

St. Mark's palace.

"Not a stone
In the broad pavement—but to him who has
An eye—an ear, for the inanimate world,
Tells of past ages."

The great character of this poem, as it is in the "Pleasures of Memory," is simplicity; but here simplicity assumes a nobler shape. Along the shores and palaces of old glides one calm and serene tide of verse, wooing to its waters every legend, and every dream, that can hallow and immortalize. — Abridged from the New Monthly.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE RECENT CAMPAIGNS IN POLAND.

BY A POLISH LADY OF DISTINCTION.

At a time when the Polish officers, attached to the person of the grand duke Constantine, were throwing up their commissions in the Russian service, M. Turno, one of the Czarowitz's aides-de-camp, though no less anxious than they to enlist under the banners of his native land, nobly deferred resigning his post until he had seen his commander safe across the Polish frontier. Turno did not quit his side till they reached it; but, when their horses' feet had touched the boundary, the generous Pole bade him farewell, and raising his hand to his hat, drew the feather, which the Russian government had added to the national uniform, from it, and exclaimed, "I pledge you my honor, monseigneur, that I dismiss this badge never to wear it more!" and, spurring his horse's side, he darted from his highness's presence; whilst the latter, gazing motionless at the last Pole who had adhered to him, remained for a time rivetted to the spot, and then disappeared, at full speed, under the covert of a snow-storm.

General Chlopicki, during his brief dictatorship, having learnt that Rosen, the Russian commander, was collecting a force on the frontiers, evidently with hostile intentions, sent one of his officers to warn him, that, if he advanced one single foot on Polish ground, he should consider the act as a declaration of war, and lay the whole responsibility at his door. De Rosen endeavored to quiet the dictator's anxiety by pacific assurances, though, at his interview with the message-bearer, he entered into a lengthy enumeration of the formidable array which Russia exhibited; adding, by way of astounding the officer by the novelty of the comparison, "Look ye, sir! Russia is like a tun, and Poland nothing better than a barrel." "May be," retorted the Pole, "but it is a barrel of gunpowder." This repartee reminds me of what dropped from M. de Novosiltzoff, when conversing one day on the union of Poland with the Muscovite dominions, he incautiously let fall a truism, by observing that it was "a political blunder." "You will allow," observed a Polish lady, who was standing by, "that it brings increase of dominion." "Madam," replied Novosiltzoff, "tis an increase, engendering debility. This nook of land may prove our ruin."

On one of the fields of battle, a soldier was mortally wounded. "This is not the spot where I am doomed to die," he exclaimed. And he immediately raised himself from the spot, rushed upon the enemy, fired, brought his adversary to the ground, and then sank, a lifeless corpse.

A second officer had just pointed a cannon, when a ball severed both his legs in twain. "The piece points true—fire!" he exclaimed, as he fell to the ground. The ball struck a tumbril, and threw the enemy's ranks into confusion.

The enthusiasm which my countrywomen displayed, was soul-stirring and almost indescribable. Judge what were the feelings of the people of Warsaw, when they witnessed above a hundred village-maidens marched through the town in full gala, each with a spade thrown across her shoulder, to lend their aid in strengthening the fortifications of Praga? A young woman, the elegance of whose form was the theme of universal admiration, advanced at the head of her fellow-heroes, waving one of the national banners, which bore a device that spoke to every heart amongst us. In the midst of the train, Madame Kalewaka, one of those matrons, whose hoary years and exalted character recalled the patriarchal age of human kind, was an object of general interest. On either side she was supported by one of her grand-children.

The female peasantry deserted their distaffs during the preceding winter. Instead of circling around that social occupation, they spent their hours in making lint. "If our sons and husbands," I have heard them observe, "should drive out the enemy, our lands will yield us flax enough in the spring. If they fail, what will they need but a winding-sheet?" Alas! my poor country!

A DESPERATE KIDNAPPER.

In the spring of the year 1816, Mr. McMillan had dispatched ten Canadians in a canoe down the Flathead River, on a trading excursion. The third evening after quitting the fort, while they were quietly sitting round a blazing fire, eating a hearty dinner of deer, a large half-famished bear cautiously approached the group from behind an adjacent tree; and, before they were aware of his presence, he sprang across the fire, seized one of the men (who had a well-furnished bone in his hand) round his waist, with the two fore-paws, and ran about fifty yards with him on his hind-legs before he stopped. His comrades were so thunder-struck at the unexpected appearance of such a visitor, and his sudden retreat with poor Louison, that they for some time lost all presence of mind; and, in a state of fear and confusion, were running to and fro, each expecting in his turn to be kidnapped in a similar manner; when, at length, Baptiste Le Blanc, a half-bred hunter, seized his gun, and was in the act of firing at the bear, but was stopped by some of the others, who told him he would inevitably kill their friend in the position in which he was then placed. During this parley, Bruin relaxed his grip of the captive, whom he kept securely under him, and very leisurely began picking the bone which the latter had dropped. Once or twice Louison attempted to escape, which only caused the bear to watch him more closely; but, on his making another attempt, he again seized Louison round the waist, and commenced giving him one of those infernal embraces which generally end in death. The poor fellow was now in great agony, and vented the most frightful screams; and, observing Baptiste with his gun ready, anxiously watching a safe opportunity to fire, he cried out, "Fire! fire! my dear brother, if thou wouldst save thy friend. Fire for the love of God! At his head—at his head." This was enough for Le Blanc, who instantly let fly, and hit the bear over the right temple. He fell, and at the same moment dropped Louison; but he gave him an ugly scratch with his claws across the face, which for some time afterwards spoiled his beauty. After the shot, Le Blanc darted to his comrade's assistance, and with his hanger quickly finished the sufferings of the man-stealer, and rescued his friend from impending death; for, with the exception of the above-mentioned scratch, he escaped uninjured. They commenced the work of dissection with right good-will; but, on skinning the bear, they found scarcely any meat on his bones; in fact, the animal had been famishing, and, in a fit of hungry desperation, made one of the boldest and most successful attempts at kidnapping ever heard of in the legends of ursine courage.

THE MOB.

The mob is a demon—fierce, ungovernable. It will not listen to reason; it will not be influenced by fear, or pity, or self-preservation. It has no sense of justice. Its energy is exerted in frenzied fits—its forbearance is apathy or ignorance. It is a grievous error to suppose that this cruel, this worthless hydra, has any political feeling. In its triumph it breaks windows—in its anger it breaks heads. Gratify it, and it creates a disturbance; disappoint it, and it grows ferocious; attempt to appease it, and it becomes outrageous; meet it boldly, and it runs away. It is accessible to no feeling but one of personal suffering; it submits to no argument but that of the strong hand. The point of the bayonet convinces; the edge of the sabre speaks keenly; the noise of musquetry is listened to with respect—the roar of artillery is unanswerable. How deep, how grievous, how burdensome, is the responsibility that lies on him who would rouse this fury from its den! It is astonishing, it is too little known, how much individual character is lost in the aggregate character of a multitude. Men may be rational, moderate, peaceful, loyal, and sober, as individuals; yet heap them by the thousand, and, in the very process of congregation, loyalty, quietness, moderation, and reason evaporate, and a multitude of rational beings is an unreasoning and intemperate being—a wild, infuriated monster, which may be driven, but not led, except to mischief; which has an appetite for blood, and a savage joy in destruction, for the mere gratification of destroying. THE DEY OF ALGIERS AND DON PEDRO.

These worthies attend the opera regularly, and, to use a theatrical phrase, they draw good houses. The Dey—who, by the by, has very modestly put upon his visiting cards, "Hussien, Ex-Dey d'Alger," is always dressed in the first style of Turkish magnificence. Don Pedro usually appears either in uniform, or in a plain frock. He is a fine-looking man, but with a cold and pensive air. Not so the ex-empress, his wife, who appears always in good spirits. She, too, dresses very plainly, but so as to display to advantage her natural beauty, particularly her hair, which is very fine. She is much admired, and as simplicity is at present the fashion, she is regarded as quite a femme à-la-mode. French paper.

INSTINCT IN SHEEP.

About the middle of April last, I observed a young lamb entangled amongst briars. It had seemingly struggled for liberty until it was quite exhausted. Its mother was present, endeavoring with her head and feet to disentangle it; after having attempted in vain for a long time to effect this purpose, she left it, and ran away, bawling with all her might. I fancied there was something peculiarly doleful in her voice. Thus she proceeded across three large fields, and through four strong hedges, until she came to a flock of sheep. From not having been able to follow her, I could not watch her motions with them. However, she left them in about five minutes, accompanied by a large ram that had two powerful horns. They returned speedily towards the poor lamb, and as soon as they reached it, the ram immediately set about liberating it, which he did in a few minutes, by dragging away the briars with his horns. Its mother seemed all joy.

CONSEQUENCE OF GIVING ADVICE.

The friendship of two young ladies, though apparently founded upon the rock of eternal attachment, terminated in the following manner:—"My dearest Jane, I do not think your figure suited for dancing, and as a sincere friend I advise you to refrain from it in future." The other, naturally affected by such unsolicited candor, replied, "I feel very much obliged to you, my dear, for your advice; this proof of your friendship demands some return—I would as sincerely recommend you to relinquish your singing, as some of your upper notes actually resemble the squallings of the feline race." The result of this precipitancy was, that the advice of neither was followed; the one continued to sing, and the other to dance; but they never after met as friends. Drawing-room Scrap Sheet.

A CURE FOR GALLANTRY.

A young officer of the National Guard has just received a check which will probably cure him of gallantry for life. He had tormented the pretty wife of a dyer during a long time, with letters and compliments, followed her about like a shadow, and, at last, became so terribly importunate, that she revealed the affair to her husband, who desired her to give him an appointment. Hardly had the conference begun, when the dyer and several of his workmen appeared, and seizing the unhappy lover, gave him a good sousing in a tub of indigo. Then, in order that the dye might be solid and durable, they made him stand before a large fire till he was entirely dry. Unfortunately, he was obliged to attend parade the next day, and in consequence he made such plentiful use of soap and Eau-de-Cologne that the tint of indigo disappeared, but it was to give place to a beautiful sky blue! DANGER OF BEAUTY.

In the first attempt made by Mary Queen of Scots to escape from her imprisonment in Lochleven castle, she disguised herself as a laundress, with whom she had changed clothes; and when seated in the boat, and putting off from the shore, she was discovered by lifting her hand to her head. The extreme beauty of her hand, with its whiteness, discovered her at once, and she was carried back to her chamber in bitterness and tears. Atheneum.

THE SNOW-BIRD.

The snow-bird of America is remarked among ornithologists for the obscurity which hangs round its history. On the first approach of winter it suddenly makes its appearance at the farm house, apparently driven by the inclemency of the weather to court the society of man. Whence it comes no one can tell; and whither it goes, (for its exit is as sudden as its entrance) no one has yet been able to discover. It is supposed by some to be in reality another bird; only that its plumage, by some mysterious and irresistible power, has been suddenly changed. It delights to hover near haystacks, feeding on the seed they contain; while in very bleak weather, when the ground is clad with universal snow, and the air is piercingly cold, it may be easily attracted to the parlor window by throwing forth a few crumbs; the desolation of its lot causing it to forget its natural fear of man. There is a feeling of melancholy passing over the mind when the bleak and dreary landscape, deserted by all other tenants of the air, is only enlivened with the presence of the mournful snow-bird. Yet, even in the bitterest weather, he is always gay and lively; and the gloominess of the scenery around him seems to have no saddening effect upon his cheerful heart. Literary Gazette.

BREVITIES.

Those who are rendered unhappy by frivolous troubles, seek comfort in frivolous enjoyments.

Where there is one man honest from principle, there are ten men honest from prudence.

A wife, who is only mistress of a frivolous style of conversation, is a poor companion over a dull fire in a long winter's evening, unless her husband be as foolish as herself.

We can bear with a man who is only peevish when the wind is in the east; but it is intolerable to live with a man who is peevish in every point of the compass.

When you have strangers at the table, avoid introducing a forward blustering man. His noise and nonsense will effectually seal up the mouths of the company, and you will have the mortification of passing an unpleasant day from your want of discernment.

When you are at another person's table never call for bread, beer, or wine, in an authoritative manner.

Before you make a promise, consider well its importance, and when made, engrave it upon the tablet of your heart.

Truth is clothed in white. But a lie comes forth with all the colors of the rainbow. Whittaker's Magazine.

THE BELLE OF THE BALL.—AN EVERY-DAY CHARACTER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF LILLIAN.

Years—years ago—ere yet my dreams
Had been of being wise or witty;
Ere I had done with writing themes,
Or yawn'd o'er this infernal Chitty:
Years—years ago—while all my joy
Was in my fowling-piece and filly;
In short, while I was yet a boy,
I fell in love with Laura Lily.

I saw her at the county ball—
There, when the sound of flute and fiddle
Gave signal sweet in that old hall,
Of hands across and down the middle,
Hers was the subtlest spell by far
Of all that set young hearts romancing,
She was our queen, our rose, our star;
And then she danced—oh, heaven! her dancing!

Dark was her hair; her hand was white;
Her voice was exquisitely tender;
Her eyes were full of liquid light;
I never saw a waist so slender;
Her every look, her every smile,
Shot right and left a score of arrows;
I thought 'twas Venus from her isle,
And wonder'd where she'd left her sparrows.

She talk'd of politics or prayers;
Of Southey's prose, or Wordsworth's sonnets;
Of danglers, or of dancing bears;
Of battles, or the last new bonnets.
By candle-light, at twelve o'clock,
To me—it matter'd not a tittle;
If those bright lips had quoted Locke,
I might have thought they murmured Little.

Through sunny May, through sultry June,
I loved her with a love eternal;
I spoke her praises to the moon,
I wrote them to the Sunday Journal.
My mother laugh'd; I soon found out
That ancient ladies have no feeling;
My father frown'd; but how should gout
Find any happiness in kneeling?

She was the daughter of a dean,
Rich, fat, and rather apoplectic;
She had one brother, just thirteen,
Whose color was extremely hectic;
Her grand-mother, for many a year,
Had fed the parish with her bounty;
Her second cousin was a peer,
And lord lieutenant of the county.

But titles, and the three per cents,
And mortgages, and great relations,
And India bonds, and tithes and rents,
Oh, what are they to love's sensations!
Black eyes, fair forehead, clustering locks,
Such wealth, such honors, Cupid chooses;
He cares as little for the stocks,
As Baron Rothschild for the muses.

Shesketch'd; the vale, the wood, the beach,
Grew lovelier from her pencil's shading;
She botanized; I envied each
Young blossom in her boudoir fading:
She warbled Handel; it was grand—
She made the Catalani jealous;
She touch'd the organ, I could stand
For hours and hours to blow the bellows.

She kept an album, too, at home,
Well fill'd with all an album's glories:
Paintings of butterflies and Rome,
Patterns for trimming, Persian stories;
Soft songs to Julia's cockatoo,
Fierce odes to famine and to slaughter;
And autographs of Prince Leboo,
And recipes for elder water.

And she was flatter'd, worshipp'd, bored;
Her steps were watch'd, her dress was noted;
Her poodle dog was quite adored;
Her sayings were extremely quoted.
She laugh'd, and every heart was glad,
As if the taxes were abolish'd;
She frown'd, and every look was sad,
As if the opera were demolish'd.

She smiled on many, just for fun—
I knew that there was nothing in it;
I was the first, the only one
Her heart had thought of for a minute:
I knew it, for she told me so,
In phrase which was divinely moulded;
She wrote a charming hand; and, oh!
How sweetly all her notes were folded!

Our love was like most other loves—
A little glow, a little shiver;
A rosebud and a pair of gloves,
And "Fly not yet" upon the river;
Some jealousy of some one's heir,
Some hopes of dying broken-hearted;
A miniature, a lock of hair,
The usual vows, and then we parted.

We parted—months and years roll'd by;
We met again four summers after;
Our parting was all sob and sigh—
Our meeting was all mirth and laughter;
For, in my heart's most secret cell,
There had been many other lodgers;
And she was not the ball-room's belle,
But only Mrs. Something Rogers."

LETTERS FROM THE ABSENT EDITOR.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER FOUR.

PARIS.

It seems to me as if I were going back a month to recall my departure from Havre, my memory is so clouded with later incidents. I was awaked on the morning after I had written to you by a servant, who brought me at the same time a cup of coffee, and at about an hour before daylight we were passing through the huge gates of the town on our way to Paris. The whole business of diligence-traveling amused me exceedingly. The construction of this vehicle has been often described; but its separate apartments, (at four different prices,) its enormous size, its comfort, and clumsiness, and, more than all, the driving of its postillions, struck me as equally novel and diverting. This last-mentioned performer on the whip and voice, (the only two accomplishments he at all cultivates,) rides one of the three wheel-horses, and drives the four or seven which are in advance, as a grazer in our country drives a herd of cattle, and they travel very much in the same manner. There is leather enough in two of their clumsy harnesses, to say nothing of the postillion's boots, to load a common horse heavily. I never witnessed such a ludicrous absence of contrivance and tact as in the appointments and driving of horses in a diligence. It is so in every thing in France, indeed. They do not possess the quality, as a nation. The story of the Gascoigne, who saw a bridge for the first time, and admired the ingenious economy that placed it across the river, instead of lengthwise, is hardly an exaggeration.

At daylight I found myself in the coupé, (a single seat for three in the front of the body of the carriage, with windows before and at the sides,) with two whiskered and moustached companions, both very polite, and very unintelligible. I soon suspected, by the science with which my neighbor on the left hummed little snatches of popular operas, that he was a professed singer, (a conjecture which proved true,) and it was equally clear, from the complexion of the port-feuille on the lap of the other, that his vocation was a liberal one—a conjecture which proved true also, as he confessed himself a diplomat, when we became better acquainted. For the first hour or more my attention was divided between the dim but beautiful outline of the country by the slowly approaching light of the dawn, and my nervousness at the distressing want of skill in the postillion's driving. The increasing and singular beauty of the country, even under the disadvantage of rain and the late season, soon absorbed all my attention however, and my involuntary and half-suppressed exclamations of pleasure, so unusual in an Englishman, (for whom I found I was taken,) warmed the diplomatist into conversation, and I passed the three ensuing hours very pleasantly. My companion was on his return from Lithuania, having been sent out by the French committee with arms and money for Poland. He was, of course, a most interesting fellow-traveller; and allowing for the difficulty with which I understood the language, in the rapid articulation of an enthusiastic Frenchman, I rarely have been better pleased with a chance acquaintance. I found he had been in Greece during the revolution, and knew intimately my friend, Dr. H—, the best claim he could have on my interest, and I soon discovered an answering recommendation of myself to him.

The province of Normandy is celebrated for its picturesque beauty, but I had no conception before of the cultivated picturesque of an old country. I have been a great scenery-hunter in America, and my eye was new, like its hills and forests. The massive, battlemented buildings of the small villages we passed through, the heavy gate-ways and winding avenues and antique structure of the distant and half-hidden chateaux, the perfect cultivation, and, to me, singular appearance of a whole landscape without a fence or a stone, the absence of all that we define by comfort and neatness, and the presence of all that we have seen in pictures and read of in books, but consider as the representations and descriptions of ages gone by—all seemed to me irresistibly like a dream. I could not rub my hand over my eyes, and realize myself. I could not believe that, within a month's voyage of my home, these spirit-stirring places had stood all my life-time as they do, and have for ages, every stone as it was laid in times of worm-eaten history, and looking to my eyes now as they did to the eyes of knights and dames in the days of French chivalry. I looked at the constantly occurring ruins of the old priories, and the magnificent and still used churches, and my blood tingled in my veins, as I saw in the stepping-stones at their doors cavities that the sandals of monks, and the iron-shod feet of knights in armor a thousand years ago, had trodden and helped to wear, and the stone cross over the threshold, that hundreds of generations had gazed upon and passed under.

By a fortunate chance the postillion left the usual route at Balbec, and pursued what appeared to be a by-road through the grain-fields and vineyards for twenty or twenty-five miles. I can only describe it as an uninterrupted green lane, winding almost the whole distance through the bosom of a valley that must be one of the very loveliest in the world. Imagine one of such extent, without a fence to break the broad swells of verdure, stretching up from the winding and unenclosed road on either side, to the apparent sky; the houses occurring at distances of miles, and every one with its thatched roof covered all over with bright green moss, and its walls of marl interlaid through all the crevices with clinging vines, the whole structure and its appurtenances faultlessly picturesque, and when you have conceived a valley that might have contented Rascelas, scatter over it here and there groups of men, women, and children, the Norman peasantry in their dresses of all colors, as you see them in the prints—and if there is any thing that can better please the eye, or make the imagination more willing to fold up its wings and rest, my travels have not crossed it. I have recorded a vow to walk through Normandy.

As we approached Rouen the road ascended gradually, and a sharp turn brought us suddenly to the brow of a steep hill, opposite another of the same height, and with the same abrupt descent, at the distance of a mile across. Between lay Rouen. I hardly know how to describe, for American eyes, the peculiar beauty of this view; one of the most exquisite, I am told, in all France. A town at the foot of a hill is common enough in our country, but of the hundreds that answer to this description, I cannot name one that would afford a correct comparison. The nice and excessive cultivation of the grounds in so old a country gives the landscape a complexion essentially different from ours. If there were another Mount Holyoke, for instance, on the other side of the Connecticut, the situation of Northampton would be very similar to that of Rouen; but, instead of the rural village, with its glimpses of white houses seen through rich and luxurious masses of foliage, the mountain sides above broken with rocks, and studded with the gigantic and untouched relics of the native forest, and the fields below waving with heavy crops, irregularly fenced and divided, the whole picture one of an over-lavish and half-subdued Eden of fertility; instead of this, I say, the broad meadows, with the winding Seine in their bosom, are as trim as a girl's flower-garden, the grass closely cut, and of a uniform surface of green, the edges of the river set regularly with willows, the little bright islands circled with trees, and smooth as a lawn; and instead of green lanes lined with bushes, single streets running right through the unfenced verdure from one hill to another, and built up with antique structures of stone, the whole looking, in the coup d'œil of distance, like some fantastic model of a town, with gothic houses of sand-paper, and meadows of silk velvet.

You will find the size, population, &c. of Rouen in the guide-books. As my object is to record impressions, not statistics, I leave you to consult those laconic chronicles, or the books of a thousand travellers, for all such information. The Maid of Orleans was burnt here, as you know, in the fourteenth century. There is a statue erected to her memory, which I did not see, for it rained; and after the usual stop of two hours, as the barometer promised no change in the weather, and as I was anxious to be in Paris, I took my place in the night diligence, and kept on.

I amused myself till dark watching the streams that poured into the broad mouth of the postillion's boots from every part of his dress, and musing on the fate of the poor Maid of Orleans; and then, sinking down into the comfortable corner of the coupé, I slept almost without interruption till the next morning—the best comment in the world on the only comfortable thing I have yet seen in France, a diligence.

It is a pleasant thing in a foreign land to see the familiar face of the sun; and as he rose over a distant hill on the left, I lifted the window of the coupé to let him in, as I would open the door to a long-missed friend. He soon reached a heavy cloud, however, and my hopes of bright weather when we should enter the metropolis departed. It began to rain again; and the postillion, after his blue cotton frock was soaked through, put on his great-coat over it—an economy which is peculiarly French, and which I observed in every succeeding postillion on the route. The last twenty-five miles to Paris are uninteresting to the eye; and with my own pleasant thoughts, tinged as they were with the brightness of immediate anticipation, and an occasional laugh at the grotesque figures and equipages on the road, I made myself passably contented till we entered the suburb of St. Denis.

It is something to see the outside of a sepulchre for kings, and the old abbey of Saint Denis needs no association to make a sight of it worth many a mile of weary travel. I could not stop within four miles of Paris, however, and I contented myself with running to get a second view of it in the rain while the postillion breathed his horses. The strongest association about it, old and magnificent as it is, is the fact, that Napoleon repaired it after the revolution; and standing in probably the finest point for its front view, my heart leaped to my throat as I fancied that Napoleon, with his mighty thoughts, had stood in that very spot, possibly, and contemplated the glorious old pile before me as the place of his future repose.

After four miles more, over a broad straight avenue, paved in the centre and edged with trees, we arrived at the Porte St. Denis. I was exceedingly struck with the grandeur of the gate as we passed under, and referring to the guide-book I find it was a triumphal arch erected to Louis the fourteenth, and the one by which the kings of France invariably enter. This also was restored by Napoleon, with his infallible taste, without changing its design; and it is singular how every thing that great man touched became his own, for who remembers for whom it was raised while he is told who employed his great intellect in its repairs?

I entered Paris on Sunday at eleven o'clock. I never should have recognized the day. The shops were all open, the artificers all at work, the unintelligible criers vociferating their wares, and the people in their working-day dresses. We wound through street after street, narrow and dark and dirty, and with my mind full of the splendid views of squares, and columns, and bridges, as I had seen them in the prints, I could scarce believe I was in Paris. A turn brought us into a large court, that of the Messagerie, the place at which all travellers are set down on arrival. Here my baggage was once more inspected, and, after a half-hour's delay, I was permitted to get into a fiacre, and drive to a hotel. As one is a specimen of all, I may as well describe the Hotel d'Etrangers, Rue Vivienne, which, by the way, I take the liberty at the same time to recommend to my friends. It is the precise centre for the convenience of sight-seeing, admirably kept, and, being nearly opposite Galigani's, that bookstore of Europe is a very pleasant resort for the half hour before dinner or a rainy day. I went there at the instance of my friend the diplomat.

The fiacre stopped before an arched passage, and a fellow in livery, who had followed me from the Messagerie, (probably in the double character of porter and police agent, as my passport was yet to be demanded,) took my trunk into a small office on the left, over which was written "Concierge." This person, who is a kind of respectable door-keeper, addressed me in broken English, without waiting for the evidence of my tongue that I was a foreigner, and, after inquiring at what price I would have a room, introduced me to the landlady, who took me across a large court, (the houses are built round the yard always in France,) to the corresponding story of the house. The room was quite pretty, with its looking-glasses and curtains, but there was no carpet, and the fire-place was ten feet deep. I asked to see another, and another, and another; they were all curtains and looking-glasses and stone floors! There is no wearying a French woman, and I pushed my modesty till I found a chamber to my taste—a nut-shell, to be sure, but carpeted—and bowing my polite housekeeper out, I rang for breakfast, and was at home in Paris!

There are few things bought with money that are more delightful than a French breakfast. If you take it at your room, it appears in the shape of two small vessels, one of coffee and one of hot milk, two kinds of bread, with a thin, printed slice of butter, and one or two of some thirty dishes from which you choose, the latter flavored exquisitely enough to make one wish to be always at breakfast, but cooked and composed I know not how or of what. The coffee has an aroma peculiarly exquisite, something quite different from any I ever tasted before; and the petite-pain, a slender biscuit between bread and cake, is, when crisp and warm, a delightful accompaniment. All this costs about one third as much as the beefsteaks and coffee in America, at the same time that you are waited upon with a civility that is worth three times the money.

It still rained at noon, and finding that the usual dinner hour was five, I took my umbrella for a walk. In a strange city I prefer always to stroll about at hazard, coming unawares upon what is fine or curious. The hackneyed descriptions in the guide-books profane the spirit of a place. I never look at them till after I have found the object, and then only for dates. The Rue Vivienne was crowded with people, as I emerged from the dark archway of the hotel to pursue my wanderings.

A walk of this kind, by the way, shows one a great deal of novelty. In France there are no shop-men. No matter what the article of trade—hats, boots, pictures, books, jewelry, any thing and every thing that gentlemen buy—you are waited upon by girls, always handsome, and always dressed in the height of the mode. They sit on damask-covered settees, behind the counters; and when you enter, bow and rise to serve you, with a grace and a smile of courtesy that would become a drawing-room. And this is universal.

I strolled on until I entered a narrow passage, penetrating a long line of buildings. It was thronged with people, and passing in with the rest, I found myself unexpectedly in a scene that equally surprised and delighted me. It was a spacious square enclosed by one entire building. The area was laid out as a garden, planted with long avenues of trees and beds of flowers, and in the centre a fountain was playing in the shape of a fleur-de-lis, with a jet about forty feet in height. A superb colonnade ran round the whole square, making a covered gallery of the lower story, which was occupied by shops of the most splendid appearance, and thronged through its long sheltered passés by thousands of gay promenaders. It was the far-famed Palais Royal. I remembered the description I had heard of its gambling-houses, and facilities for every vice, and looked with a new surprise on its Aladdin-like magnificence. The hundreds of beautiful pillars, stretching away from the eye in long and distant perspective, the crowd of citizens, and women, and officers in full uniform, passing and re-passing with French liveliness and politeness, the long windows of plated glass glittering with jewelry, and bright with every thing to tempt the fancy, the tall sentinels pacing between the columns, and the fountain turning over its clear waters with a fall audible above the tread and voices of the thousands who walked around it—who could look upon such a scene and believe it what it is, the most corrupt spot, probably, on the face of the civilized world?

LETTERS FROM WASHINGTON.

Intercepted for the New-York Mirror.

NUMBER THREE.

SATURDAY.—Last evening there was a great collection at the capitol of the friends of temperance. I am myself, I hope, a friend of temperance; but having abstract doubts as to the principle of total abstinence, and being fond occasionally of a glass of good old Madeira, I don't know whether I deserve to be classed among the zealous friends of all temperance societies. However, I toiled up the hill with the rest, for two tolerably good reasons: it had been given out that Mr. Webster was to speak, and I did not know what else to do with myself. I was disappointed; Mr. Webster made no speech; he did, to be sure, utter some half-dozen sentences; but does he think that was enough to compensate one for all the sufferings of a hot and crowded room? There was speaking, however; a Mr. Grundy spoke, a senator; and Frelinghuysen. I was disappointed in Frelinghuysen; I had heard his talents so highly lauded. He was in earnest, to be sure; that is much; but I thought he showed rather an uncharitable spirit, and no great ingenuity in excusing it. He directed his anathemas principally against the moderate drinkers: a confirmed drunkard he pitied, but a moderate drinker he abhorred. Nine times out of ten (in this I quote him literally) a moderate drinker became a drunkard; there was no safety but in total abstinence. I was considerably amused by the remarks of a worthy gentleman, who made himself acquainted with me, and delivered his opinions with great energy.

"Now, sir," said he, "all this seems to me vastly foolish. Gentlemen, unquestionably, as a matter of prudence, (knowing best their own weaknesses,) or, for the sake of example, may govern their conduct by what rules they please; but when they condemn, as a sin, an enjoyment which, not carried to excess, is perfectly innocent, social, uncensured by the strictest moralist, commended even in holy writ; when they say to others, you must do as we do, and think as we think, you must adopt our rules, give us your pledges, empty your decanters, and put your wine in phials, otherwise upon your heads be the accumulated sin of all the drunkenness of the land; I, for one, when it comes to this, feel inclined to resent a little this dictatorial language, and accuse in turn my accusers. Why do they not carry their doctrine a little further? Is drunkenness the only sin, or only cause of sin? Let them live on water-creases, lest they may become gluttons; clothe themselves in skins, that they may not be led astray by the vanities of dress; turn hermits, for fear of the seductions of society; let them, in short, totally abstain from every pleasure in life, but the strict performance of their imperative duties; and then, being able at least to lay claim to the merit of consistency, they may, perhaps, preach with more effect, if not with more confidence."

As for me, Tom, you know I am a quiet sort of person, and having listened to the arguments on both sides, I made the best of my way down the hill, without committing myself to either party.

MONDAY.—To-day Mr. Hayne answered Mr. Clay. He spoke like a man who thought deeply and earnestly, and felt strongly. Of course he was eloquent. His speech was much longer and more labored than Mr. Clay's; much more, evidently, intended for a great speech; it would, therefore, be unfair to compare them. In reply, I understand Mr. Clay is coming out.

They are discussing in the house the bill fitting the ratio of representation; the debate is very uninteresting. For myself I should be in favor of having the lower house a very numerous body. I would not care if there were as many as five hundred members. Business would be just as quickly dispatched as it is now; a body so large would be more liable to sudden impulses, more likely to be carried away on great occasions, by a strong appeal, and at the same time less manageable by party influence; better men would be chosen; where the ratio is very large, the representative cannot, especially in new countries, where the population is thin, be known to his constituents; he is, in fact, the choice of a few; and finally, bored, from the very necessity of the case, would not be endured; no man would be suffered to speak who had not really something to say.

By the by, they coughed down a man very handsomely the other night at a public meeting. I wish the practice may become general. The patience of a Yankee audience is really marvellous. At all general assemblies, and upon all occasions, they seem to think it absolutely necessary to sit quietly, and let a man say whatever he pleases, and talk as long as he pleases, without testifying the slightest mark of disapprobation. They do these things differently in England. Nothing can exceed there (I know, for I have often witnessed it) the despotism of a public audience. They hiss, they cough, they groan; and, if every thing else fails, resort to positive violence; put a man out head and shoulders. And they are right; at least nearer right than we are; though they do sometimes carry it too far.

What is commonly called a very sensible man told me, however, the other day, in a very oracular manner, that all this was contrary to the spirit of our institutions; that a member of congress (he is in congress himself) had a right to speak, and that coughing or scraping was an infringement of that right.

That a member of congress has a right to speak, I will not deny; but other members of congress certainly have a right not to listen to, nor to be influenced by, any thing he says. Now, as the object of speaking (in general) is to be heard, and, being heard, to produce some effect upon the persons spoken to, if the persons so spoken to are obstinately determined not to hear or not to be influenced by any thing that is said, it appears to me that an intimation by them of this purpose, is calculated to effect a saving of time and labor to both parties; and thus, in some degree, advance the public interests. But if the man still persists, if he will speak, if his object is not to be heard, but to have it afterwards said that he has made a speech in congress! let him go on, I say: his purpose at least is clearly understood, and his constituents will have an opportunity of determining whether it is worth while for them to send a man to Washington for the reflected glory of making speeches that no one listens to.

THURSDAY.—I don't know what is the matter with me, Tom. For the last week I have been in bad humor, and in bad spirits. The fit comes stronger upon me, whatever I do. Are you never affected with a sense of your own unworthiness? Do you not sometimes despise yourself, and feel as if every one else despised you? It is the plague of an idle man, whose youth is running away without having been either improved or enjoyed. It is nothing, you will say, but the blue devils. No, there is something more; there is the want of some engrossing pursuit or passion; or some one to love, or some one to hate; of something to do, or something to suffer. There is an unhealthy craving for excitement that becomes stronger and stronger as the capability of being excited passes away. "Give me back—give me back the wild freshness of morning." The dear days of boyhood! the animal spirits, worth more than fame or fortune or power! When the past was without regrets, and the present and the future all enjoyment and hope. I can recollect when I never saw a bird that I did not long to shoot it; or a fish, that I did not wish to catch it; or a woman—a woman! (provided she was young, and tolerably pretty) without a wild world of wishes, undefined—indefinable; but it is all a delusion, which there must be another creation, another state of existence before we can understand. And now, what are they to me? The birds of the air, and the fishes of the sea, and the women of the earth: they may fly, walk, swim, sing, leap, chatter—But no, it is not so far gone with me neither.

I saw the prettiest creature the other morning; (I swear I believe it is that alone that ails me, for it has run strangely in my head ever since) just at the age—the only age I care about. Such a face!—and who and what she was, and whence she comes, and whither she goeth, I know not—I never shall know. But, I believe, if I had written a piece of poetry about it I should have been easier.

What does the fellow write such stuff to me for? I am sure I don't know, Tom, except that it is my habit. In essentials you are a good fellow; but to expect sympathy from one without sorrow, or to sentimentalize, or talk nonsense to—I know you of old—I might as well talk to a stone.

I thought that I must see some of the things to be seen here, so I went the other day to the National Museum. It is a noble collection of curiosities, embracing one bear, three monkeys, nine dirty wax figures, and a fine collection of shells, chiefly clams and muscles. Below these are flying horses—do you know what flying horses are?—and on these flying horses ride spirits—white, yellow, and black.

Then, in the evening, I went to the theatre, which certainly, I think, merits this distinction, viz. that of being the smallest and dirtiest in the Union. The orchestra consists of two broken fiddles, a fife, and other abominations. The actors paint high, and rant loud. The actresses are any thing but attractive. But, I believe I am ill-natured. There is — who certainly has talent, though she likewise has a double chin, and has all lost one of her side teeth. Why cannot I see all things (as you do) on the fair side?

I am going to try a remedy I have seen prescribed for the blues, namely, five or six mile-stones, to be taken before supper. V.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

A DRAWING-ROOM SCENE.

ONE of the most interesting, although not always the pleasantest occurrences that can happen to a young author, is to be incognito in a company where his writings are the theme of conversation. I was caught in this way some time ago, and received several hints which will be useful to me. They may not be without value to the editors of the Mirror, so I shall narrate what took place. The party consisted of seven or eight young ladies and gentlemen, of various ages, and being drawn in a cheerful circle around the fire, the conversation was not suffered to flag. One asked what arrivals there were that day; another mentioned Masaniello as an excellent opera; a third spoke of the weather, and so on. At length the Mirror, several numbers of which were lying on the table, attracted the eyes of a good-humored girl, and, in a few moments, it was the sole object of attention. You can scarcely conceive the improvement bestowed upon one's composition by a woman's accent, nor the gratification, derived under such circumstances, from listening to her praise. I am pleased to assure you, gentlemen, that the company laughed heartily at one of my characters, and the language I had placed in his mouth was pronounced very correct and amusing. The fair reader instantly fitted the description to her brother, and observed that he had used the very words in her presence, besides other phrases of the same kind. She declared that, although he is a young man of a very good education, he had been so spoiled by going to the theatres, and frequenting Tattersall's, and keeping bad company; that he brings all the cant terms afloat into the drawing-room; and addresses her as if she were a stage-driver, or a horse-jockey. "When," added she, "he wishes me to make haste, he desires me to push a-head. I happened the other day to speak while his friend was performing a piece on the piano, when he begged me to shut up, which, causing me to burst into a fit of laughter, he said I ought to be hustled out; and then commended the player by declaring that he was no fool, but understood how to put on the double touch scientific!"

I was agreeably surprised to find my piece productive of so much mirth, which was only broken by a very young lady, who said that the "chapter supposed to be in Coke upon Littleton" was very dull; but she was interrupted by an elderly gentleman, who observed that he did not know—he "thought it one of the most capital attempts at satire he had seen for many a day." "I think, however," said a third, "that a paper of this kind should always contain a heavy article—a good sermon, or something of that sort. The literature of the day is altogether too frivolous. The object is more to amuse than to instruct." "Here," added he, taking two or three numbers, and turning over the leaves carelessly, and with increasing marks of disapprobation, "what does all this amount to?—theatre—music—engraving!" (the fellow was reading off the titles of the various articles that met his eyes)—"editor's study—foreign literature—Mirabeau—first fee—literary notices—letter from Washington—this, that, and the other; it's all a mistake, you may depend upon it. We want something solid, something deep and valuable—something —"

"About the tariff, and General Jackson, and woollen goods," interrupted a young girl, laughing. "Now that's just what we do not want."

"You would not discard music?" exclaimed the gay Marianne, (she plays divinely,) reproachfully.

"Hate the theatre!" added Mr. Riley, (who is in love with one of the actresses,) opening his eyes into a stare of astonishment.

"I am sure," said a modest, blue-eyed creature, who had scarcely uttered a word before, "you cannot find fault with the design of giving us a sketch of new literary works. Here are Mr. Bryant's poems. I never liked poetry more than I do this very week. I was induced to purchase that book by a review in the Mirror; and I am grateful to any person or any paper which has been the means of placing in my hands so delightful a volume."
